CHRONICLE

President Taft.—In his speech at Portland on the occasion of the corner-stone laying of the First Universalist Church, the President explained his attitude towards the various churches. "I don't know," he said, "that anyone questions the propriety of my being here and officiating on such an occasion as this, or that an explanation of any sort is called for. But I want to say I believe it to be the duty of the President of these United States to welcome and to suggest every instrument by which the morals and religion of the community may be elevated and maintained. Not long ago I officiated at the corner-stone laying of an orthodox Congregational church in Washington. Then I appeared in the pulpit of a Jewish tabernacle at Pittsburg. But a few days ago I helped to lay the corner-stone of a Catholic institution at Helena, Mont. And now it is my great pleasure to assist here to-day in laying the corner-stone of this Universalist church, which, like my own, the Unitarian church, is known as a liberal one. I am glad always to be present at such occasions as these, for I believe the corner-stone of modern civilization must continue to be religion and morality." Mr. Taft added, that on the occasion of his visit to Rome, he ventured to tell the Pope that, while in America the sentiment was strong for the separation of Church and State, there was nothing in the American Government or the American people which opposed the Church in its higher development; that in no European country had the Catholic Church flourished as it had in America. On leaving Portland the President spent the following week visiting Sacramento, San Francisco, the Yosemite National Park, and Los Angeles.

Rumors in Washington.—Much comment has been excited in public journals by the calling back to Washington of Charles R. Crane, the new Minister to China, on the eve of his departure for his new post. The official explanation of the incident, as the journalists had surmised, is that Mr. Crane had been indiscreet in making public the State Department's policy in the Far East. He has been requested to resign.—It is reported that Japan's recent appointment of a Consul General at Bogotá is connected with the proposed construction of a new canal by Colombia to rival the American canal in Panama.

The Recent Maneuvers.—Major General Leonard Wood has denied the reports that the Boston campaign of last summer will be the last of joint maneuvers of the regular army and the national guard. He asserted that the amount of sickness incident during the campaign among the militia was extraordinarily small and that the lessons learned were invaluable. The total cost of the campaign has been less than $100,000.

Home News.—The Fire Underwriters' Association, meeting in Chicago, urged state regulation of fire insurance rates.—Dudley Buck, the well-known composer, died at West Orange, New Jersey, on October 6.—On Wednesday, October 6, 15,000 Italians paraded in New York in honor of Giovanni de Verrazano, the earliest discoverer of the Hudson River. A statue of the explorer was unveiled at the Battery as a climax of the parade.—In a wreck last week on the Illinois Central at Parnell, Illinois, one passenger was killed and thirty-five injured.—A blizzard, accompanied by snow, sleet and hail, visited Duluth on October 11. On the same day snow fell over a wide area in Nebraska, Iowa and Missouri.

—A violent storm on Monday caused great damage in Havana, Key West, and the southern and eastern coast of Florida. In Key West scores of buildings were wrecked and the city cut off from telegraphic communication with the outside world.—The three candidates for Mayor of New York on the Republican, Democratic and Independent tickets respectively, are Otto T. Bannard, Judge Gaynor and W. R. Hearst.—Official figures from Washington give the Indian population in the United States as 300,000, indicating an increase of 40,000 during the last twenty years.—The Mauretania arrived at Queenstown on October 11, breaking again the Eastward transatlantic record. Her trip from New York was made in 4 days, 11 hours and 24 minutes.—The Catholic Total Abstinence Union of Washington, D. C., is reported to be planning the erection of a hospital for the care of drunken men found in the streets. The movement is considered necessary in view of the number of inebriates who die in the cells of police stations.—An official report of the Canadian Government states that during the fiscal year ending March 31, 60,000 Americans entered Canada, carrying on an average $1,000 in stock, cash and effects. The newcomers are farmers and have settled in the Canadian West. They have come from almost every State in the Union.—In the course of the hearing of Charles R. Williams and Delevan Smith, proprietors of the Indianapolis News, whom the Government is seeking to remove to the District of Columbia for trial on the charge of criminal libel, Judge A. B. Anderson, of the United States Court, made the comment that the case was more or less of a political matter and that the rules for libel of private character scarcely apply to it.—Mr. Larned, Assistant Commissioner General of Immigration, stated in the course of a recent official enquiry that steamship agents on the other side of the water induce poor people to mortgage their property to buy tickets for America. The tickets are sold at exorbitant rates, and the immigrant frequently has to pay six per cent. on twice the amount of money it should have cost for his ticket. This Government will cooperate with Greece to stop the practice.—Columbus Day, October 12, was a legal holiday this year in nine States. The Italians of New York celebrated the day with a parade.

The United States as a Banking Power.—A special writer in one of the daily papers gives the following interesting figures in the course of an article in which he claims that the United States is the greatest banking power in the world. The figures of the last Government report show an aggregate capital of $1,833,805,203; of surplus, etc., $1,794,470,084; with deposits of $13,400,766,024; and circulation of $613,663,963. When these items are added together they give the staggering total of $17,642,705,274. At the same time, in 1908, the total banking power of all the rest of the world was set down as $28,107,600,000. Thus it will be seen that the United States now holds more than one-third of the banking power of the whole world, our nearest competitor, the British Empire, being represented by only $11,157,000,000.

Public Religious Demonstration.—On last Sunday 30,000 persons knelt in the open at Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament in West Side Park, Jersey City. Bishop John J. O'Connor officiated, assisted by priests of the diocese. The Benediction services followed upon the annual parade of the Holy Name Union of Hudson County. There were 15,000 in line, representing twenty-five societies from various parishes.

Legislative Building at Regina.—Last week the ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the new legislative buildings in the capital city of Saskatchewan was made memorable by a speech from Earl Grey, the Governor-General of Canada. He said he considered himself exceptionally fortunate in that the double privilege of presiding over the official birth of the two new sister provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and of laying the corner-stone of their executive and legislative buildings had fallen to him during the term of his Governor-Generalship. He went on to congratulate the province of Saskatchewan on the phenomenal growth in the output of its cereals. Ten years ago the total crop was nine million bushels of grain of all sorts. Five years ago, the year before Saskatchewan became a province, the total grain crop reached thirty-seven millions. The more than fourfold increase from nine millions in 1899 to thirty-seven millions in 1904 has been followed by a still greater increase in the last five years, rising from thirty-seven millions in 1904 to upwards of two hundred millions in the present year. Of these two hundred million bushels more than eighty millions have been wheat.

Newfoundland Pulp Mills.—On the 8th inst. the Anglo-Newfoundland Development Company, of which Lord Northcliffe, proprietor of the London Daily Mail and numerous other daily, weekly and monthly publications, is the leading spirit, formally inaugurated its paper and pulp wood plant, excelled in size only by the paper mills at Millinocket, Maine. Lord Northcliffe's company has already spent more than six million dollars in founding and developing the new town of Grand Falls, which has sprung up in a wilderness in the centre of Newfoundland. It is situated on the Exploits River, a stream which has its source in a chain of lakes and at Grand Falls forms a heavy cataract. The task of damming the river was a difficult engineering problem, but it was finally accomplished at great expense, and an immense water power was thus created. The mill buildings are now completed and are of course equipped with the most up-to-date machinery. Comfortable dwellings for the thousands of factory hands and lumbermen have been built; churches, schools and a library are under construction. At the inauguration dinner on Friday of last week five hundred visitors from England and the towns of Newfoundland were the guests of Lord and Lady Northcliffe. On that occasion the new Governor of Newfoundland, Sir Ralph Williams, made his first public speech. Premier Morris also spoke of development in agriculture, coal and peat mining and fishery methods.

Prairie Fires and the Buffalo.—Last week prairie fires did incalculable damage in the province of Alberta. The national park at Wainwright had all its fences burnt up, and the herd of eight hundred buffaloes rounded up with so much difficulty quite lately near Pablo, Montana, and supposed to be safely lodged in the Canadian national park, are now roaming the northern prairies.

Roman Affairs.—The Abbé Jules Fontaine, well known as one of the first to raise his voice against Modernism in his work Les Infiltrations du Protestantisme dans le Clergé Français, has received from the Holy See a letter of extraordinary distinction on his new work, Le Modernisme Sociologique. The Holy Father joins this book with the others, and speaks of it in terms of the highest praise, enumerating the particular points that make it worthy of so high an honor. This must bring great consolation to the learned and devout abbé, who has known what it is to be misunderstood by those who think they are serving God in hindering such work as his. A letter hardly less honorable has been received by Fr. Thomas à St. Etienne, O.C., on the publication of the first volume of his work, La Santa Casa dans l'histoire, treating of the Holy House of Loretto.—The centenary of the birth of the late Cardinal Massaia, O.M.Cap., has just been celebrated at the Capuchin monastery near Frascati, where he spent his last days after thirty-five years of missionary labors in Abyssinia, dying about twenty years ago. During his African life he suffered persecution, exile and imprisonment, but came in the end to be perhaps the most powerful personage at the court of Menelik.—The Osservatore Romano has found it necessary to deny once more the reports that from time to time are set afloat by interested parties of immense sums of money having been given to the Holy Father. He has received none of these gifts nor any like them, but is absolutely dependent on the charity of the faithful.—The Congregation of Religious has issued an important decree regulating the administration of the temporalities of religious orders and congregations. In future not even the General of a religious order will be able to authorize the contracting of a debt exceeding $2,000 without permission of the Holy See.

Great Britain.—Capt. Condon was given an enthusiastic reception at Manchester by the Irishmen of that city, where more than forty years ago he stood beside Allen, Larkin and O'Brien to be sentenced to death. Mr. Dillon took the opportunity to claim for the Committee of the Irish Convention the absolute control of the Irish Catholic vote in England, saying that the chief Catholic question of the day is Home Rule, and that the defence of the Catholic schools ought to be left to the Irish Parliamentary Party. The following day Archbishop Bourne paid tribute to Ireland's services to English Catholics, but said that it belonged to the Catholic Church in England to decide the best method of promoting its own well being.—General Botha, who has been in England in connection with the new constitution for the South African Confederation, on leaving for home expressed his gratitude to the King and to the Government for all they have done for South Africa. He told of the great things he hoped were in store for the united colonies, and asked that they be left alone to solve their difficulties and to build up by cooperation, reconciliation and mutual forbearance a nation the mother-country might be proud of.—Admiral of the Fleet Lord Walter Kerr, having reached the statutory age of 70, has been put on the retired list. His career has been distinguished. He saw service in the Crimean War, and during the Indian Mutiny was present with the naval brigade at the siege and taking of Lucknow. He was First Sea-Lord of the Admiralty from 1899 to 1904. He is the fourth son of the seventh Marquis of Lothian, and at fifteen followed into the Church his mother, the Marchioness, who was one of the famous converts of the last century.—The London papers notice with great satisfaction the cordial reception given to the British Squadron that took part in the Hudson-Fulton celebration.—It is positively asserted, and denied with at least equal positiveness, that the Princess Alexandra of Fife, granddaughter of the King, is to marry King Manuel of Portugal.—The country is much gratified at the courtesy of General De Wet in attending the unveiling at Bloemfontein of a monument to the men of the South African Constabulary who fell fighting against him in the South African War.

General Elections in England.—All parties agree that a dissolution of Parliament is imminent, whether on the Land Bill or the Budget or the question of the House of Lords. Mr. Redmond, M.P., already cabled, October 7, to the President of the U. S. Irish National League for assistance in the forthcoming elections, which he says will mark a crisis in the Irish struggle for land and liberty. The results of the election will be also of vital importance to English Catholics, especially in educational matters, and a better balance of parties would greatly advantage both. At present there are 367 Liberals, 83 Nationalists, 52 Labor members, 2 Socialists, and 166 Unionists. The Unionists have gained 9 seats since the General Election of 1903. To obtain a majority they would now have to win 170 seats from the Liberals, and these chiefly in England, for Wales and Scotland are regarded as hopeless by the Unionists. The latter claim that only 350,000 votes are needed to turn the tide, and that they are in as good a position as in 1900, when they defeated the Liberals 3 to 1. Their opponents reply that for this the Boer War was responsible, and that the present Government's satisfactory settlement of the Boer question will help them at the polls.

Ireland.—The House of Lords has passed the Irish Land Bill but in a mutilated form, having eliminated its most valuable features, among them the powers vested in the Estates Commissioners of naming a compulsory price when landlord and tenant fail to agree, and also the elective element in the Board that conducts the purchase of lands for small holders in the congested districts. With the exception of Lord Granard, the Irish landlords both Liberal and Tory, opposed the Bill, some because it was too generous to the tenants, Lord Dunraven because it was not generous enough, and Lord Castletown because it would postpone Home Rule indefinitely. The Irish Party is determined to have the Bill in its original form or not at all, and Mr. Birrell declared, October 8, that the Land Bill is as important as the Budget.—A new Irish grievance is the Stamp Tax on land sales, which has been so framed as to fall four times as heavily on Irish as on English purchasers.—Lord Killanin of the Galway Co. Council declared that the Government, in imposing unnecessary police and a consequent taxation of $200,000 on the Galway district, was "goadng a peaceful people into crime."

India.—Surendanath Banerjee, editor of The Bengalee, who while in England declared that he was in favor of cooperating with the Government, has since his return openly joined its opponents.—The Hindus are showing much ill-feeling against the Mahometans because these have obtained from the Government separate representation in the new councils under Lord Morley's Act. They had hoped to swamp them in the elections by their superior numbers and thus to exclude their representatives from the councils.

Congo.—The trial of the suit for libel brought by the Kasai Company against Messrs. Morrison and Shepherd, American Protestant missionaries, took place at Leopoldville on September 17. M. Vandervelde, leader of the Belgian Socialists, defended the missionaries, having gone out especially to do so. Judgment was reserved till October 4. A despatch of this date from Leopoldville announces that it has been given in favor of the missionaries on the ground that the Company has not proved that it had suffered any damage, and that the Company had taken an appeal. The alleged libel consisted in the publication of the so-called revelations of the Company's barbarous treatment of the natives, which have contributed to the agitation for reform in the Congo.

General.—Two cases of cholera have been reported officially from Hansweert, a village of Zeeland in Holland.—The agitation in Greece is being renewed. A petition was presented to the King lately complaining of abuses in the army and of the termination of Greek occupation of Crete, and asking him to head the national movement. The real object of the agitation is far from clear.

Despatches of October 11 announced that Ferrer, the revolutionary propagandist, was sentenced to death in Barcelona. He had been tried by court martial for having been the principal instigator of the recent attempt at revolution in Spain.

Germany.—According to reports in the daily press, the German Ministry of the Interior has ordered an investigation into the effects of the American tariff on various branches of German industry. The results of this enquiry will be used for a new trade arrangement between Germany and the United States.

Early Session at Ottawa.—It is announced that the opening of the next session of the Canadian Parliament will take place on Thursday, November 11. This is the earliest date since the second session of 1896, when, after the turnover of parties, the Houses convened for the transaction of business on August 19. The principal measure which the Cabinet will present during the coming session is a bill for the erection of a Canadian navy and the participation of Canada in Imperial defence. The details of the Dominion's cooperation in the Imperial navy, as discussed by the Canadian ministers at the London conference, are still under consideration. One great difficulty will be to determine whether the estimated expenditure of twenty million dollars will be met by a loan or by taxation. Another important matter which will come up for discussion is the insurance law which needs amending. There will also be an effort made to change the rules of debate so as to expedite parliamentary work.

Ambassador Crane's Resignation.—Last Tuesday, Secretary of State Knox demanded the resignation of Charles R. Crane, of Chicago, Minister Designate to China. The circumstances of the official demand for the Minister's resignation are somewhat spectacular and are unprecedented in the history of America's diplomacy. Mr. Crane was about to embark at San Francisco for his new mission when he was recalled to Washington. His failure upon his arrival at the Capitol to absolve himself from the charge of indiscreetness in his public speeches and especially in a certain interview, granted to the representative of a newspaper, determined the action of the Secretary of State. Mr. Crane has departed from the traditions of diplomacy by drawing up a public answer to the Secretary, in which he protests that in his public utterances he was merely following the personal instructions of the President and that in the specific matter of the newspaper interview he disclosed nothing that was not generally known. He appeals to the President against the action of the Secretary.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Dignifying Anarchist Lerroux

Alejandro Lerroux, Spanish Revolutionary leader and deputy for Barcelona, is now a refugee in England. On September 13th the London Daily News (which has always a leaning towards foreign Revolutionists and often displays an anti-Catholic bias) published a long interview with Lerroux. The heading, "The Hope of Spain," showed editorial sympathy with his views. He spoke of calling in the forces of "international European Radicalism" to work by a secret propaganda for a "social Revolution" in Spain. This on the morrow of the Barcelona atrocities!

Naturally Lerroux attacked King Alfonso's government and the Catholic Church in Spain. Incidentally he uttered an atrocious calumny against the Bishop of Lugo, which the editor reproduced without a word of cautionary comment. Lerroux said:

"Remember that the murder of sixteen innocent peasants in the monastery of Osera, on behalf of the Bishop of Lugo, has remained unpunished."

Remark how Lerroux takes it for granted that his statement cannot be challenged. He brings it forward as a proof that the Government is culpably weak and inefficient. For the average British newspaper reader Spain is the land of the Inquisition, and a Spanish bishop is capable of anything. Many a reader of the Daily News must have imagined a theatrical scene—a gloomy cloister where cowed monks murdered poor country folk by order of the Bishop of Lugo, after luring or dragging them into the "monastery of Osera." If the story had been told of anyone but a foreign Catholic bishop I feel sure the editor would have run his blue pencil through it, or at the very least held it pending inquiries.

The story is so extravagant that it refutes itself. The Bishop of Lugo was here in London last year for the Eucharistic Congress, and is one of the generous benefactors of our new cathedral at Westminster. He has many friends in London. Lerroux, by making such a charge only gave proof that he himself is, to put it mildly, not quite as incapable of lying as George Washington.

When I read the statement in the Daily News I decided to investigate the facts, not to clear the Bishop of Lugo of an absurd libel, but to track the lying calumny to its ultimate source. I wrote to the Bishop of Lugo, and in due course received his reply. He informed me that Osera was not even in his diocese, but in that of the Bishop of Orense, and he forwarded to me official papers containing a full statement of the facts on the basis of which the Spanish Revolutionary party had made attacks—quite unjustifiable attacks—on the Bishop of Orense.

So far I had proof that Lerroux and the Daily News had blundered badly, so badly that if the Bishop of Lugo cared to institute proceedings in an English court of law he could recover heavy damages against them both, and they would not have a vestige of a defence. But let us take it that Lerroux merely made a mistake about a name, and meant to talk of the Bishop of Orense. And let us look at the plain facts about the affair of Osera. Osera is a small town in southern Galicia on the river Miño. The church there is not a monastic establishment, but a parish church. Last January an architect made an inspection of the building and reported to the Bishop of Orense that the baldachino, a massive stone canopy supported on pillars over the high altar, was in a dangerous condition. It was badly flawed and might come down at any time and lead to much loss of life if the accident occurred during a service.

The bishop temporarily closed the church and took expert advice as to what should be done. He was informed that no mere repairs would meet the case. The baldachino would have to be either completely rebuilt or entirely removed. At the same time the experts advised the latter course, as the baldachino was of comparatively recent date and had no artistic value or historical interest. Further, they said it was rather a disfigurement than a decoration to the church of Osera, as its huge mass concealed a beautiful apse behind the high altar.

Acting on this advice the Bishop of Orense authorized the removal of the baldachino. (I dare say as you read this you are wondering where the "murdering" comes in.) But now an agitation began in Osera. Even pious folk who could not understand the reasons that had compelled the bishop's action were sorry to hear that their church was to lose its baldachino, which for them was a marvel of art. But if this had been all, no serious result would have followed. Unfortunately there is an un-Catholic and even anti-Catholic element in the town, people who support a secular school and swear by a local Revolutionary paper, El Miño. The editor of El Miño began a campaign against the proposed removal of the baldachino. Till then he and his following had taken scanty interest in the local church. Now they posed as its defenders against wicked spoliation. They proclaimed that Osera was being robbed of one of its artistic monuments, and hinted that the priests were taking down the baldachino in order to sell it and put the price in their own pockets.

The preservation of the ruinous structure thus became a plank in the local anti-clerical platform. The contractor arrived with his workmen to begin the demolition, and straightway men, who had seldom if ever been inside the church, and so perhaps knew the baldachino's existence only by current report and not by sight, gathered in a riotous mob, threatened the parish priest and drove the workmen out of the town.

In order to allow time for the agitation to subside and common sense to prevail, the bishop did nothing till the middle of April. Then, anxious to remove the dangerous structure and reopen the church, he again authorized the contractor to get to work. This time the Civil Governor of the district, remembering the previous riot, sent a party of eight civil guards (armed police) to keep order and protect the workmen. But again the agitators gathered a mob, and the attack was so fierce and determined that the civil guard fired and loss of life resulted. Then the anti-clerical party raised an outcry against the Bishop of Orense. They said he had imprudently provoked a conflict that had ended in bloodshed. The plain facts refute the allegation. The responsibility of firing on the mob rests on the officer who was on the spot. Of course he may have acted hastily, but we know from the story of Barcelona that a Spanish mob may prove to be a dangerous wild beast. In any case the Bishop had nothing to do with it.

Let me sum up the facts: Some men are unhappily killed in a riot by the civil force charged with the preservation of order. The rioters were trying to prevent the execution of work in the parish church of Osera necessary for the public safety, this work having been authorized by the Bishop of Orense on expert advice. On this Lerroux and the Daily News declare that the Bishop of Lugo has been a party to the murder of innocent peasants in "the monastery of Osera." It is not easy to talk calmly of such blundering lies.

By the way, some years ago when Mr. Asquith, the present British Premier, was Home Secretary, a mob of strikers attempted to destroy the buildings of a mine at Featherstone. A detachment of troops, guarding the mine, fired on and killed some of the rioters. The English Socialists cried out that "Asquith was a murderer," and the Daily News energetically protested against such language. Now it gives the hospitality of its columns to a refugee revolutionist and allows him to utter an even more outrageous attack on a public man. But the man in question is not a British official but a foreign Catholic bishop, so the revolutionist is permitted to spread his insulting calumnies before the British public. The Daily News would have been cautious about stating that a street tramp had been picking pockets. But its prudence is forgotten when it is a question of a Catholic prelate being described as a murderer!

The Parochial and Religious Census

I.

The United States Government is going to spend millions of dollars of the people's money to make the coming census one of the most comprehensive the world has known, and we may confidently look for most valuable information on every phase of the nation's secular life. The schedules relating to population will include for each inhabitant, "the name, relationship to the head of the family, color of his skin, sex, age, conjugal condition, place of birth of parents, number of years in the United States, and citizenship." Our laws, however, do not authorize inquiries into the religious belief of the citizen, and for this recourse will be had to the religious bodies themselves or to such agents as they severally may recommend. This will leave the relative numerical strength of the various Christian or quasi-Christian denominations as much unascertained as ever. It is to be regretted that the recent attempt of the Government to obtain the exact Catholic population should, for one reason or another, have proved abortive. If similar attempts are made in regard to other religious bodies, there can be but little doubt, that, because of more hearty cooperation, the result will be more satisfactory to the denominations concerned.

The Metropolitan of St. Louis, who had the matter in hand, reported the number of Catholics in the United States as 14,235,451. He has been quoted in several journals as stating that he believed this number to be far below the actual population, yet Dr. Henry K. Carroll, the United States statistician, has reduced it 15 per cent., crediting us only with 12,394,731, on the flimsy and unwarranted pretext that Communion constitutes initiation into the Catholic body, though no such tests are applied to Jews, Unitarians, Friends and other religious organizations. His Grace, the Archbishop of St. Paul, in a communication to the London Times, dated February 4, 1909, expresses the opinion that 17,000,000 is a conservative estimate. He justly laments the fact that in the recent taking of the census under Archbishop Glennon, three or four dioceses (among which is found one of the most populous in the country) sent no report to the Metropolitan of St. Louis, so that he was obliged to credit them with only the figures printed in older numbers of the "Directory." "In his report of some other dioceses," continues his Grace, "no adequate allowance, it seems to me, was made for the masses of newly arrived immigrants, especially those of Oriental rites. Throughout, too, I could read vestiges of older habits of some parish priests to claim as Catholics only those who are pew-holders or regular contributors to the church fund" (Western Watchman, March 18, 1909).

The enormous discrepancy of nearly six millions (11,645,495 of some and 17,000,000 of others) between various unofficial and as many quasi-official statistics would almost justify us in appropriating the favorite A. P. A. slogan: "the Catholic uncounted millions."

The gross inaccuracy of Catholic statistics will be readily admitted by all who have submitted the subject to any impartial test in almost any parish. With our ever-growing cosmopolitan population, how many individuals and families are annually drifting away from Catholic moorings onto the ocean of indifferentism or infidelity who could, and would, have been saved to the Church if proper definite pastoral care had been extended to them! How often we meet families, especially in the congested districts, who will tell you that no priest has been in their homes for five or ten years. Of course, these do not live on boulevards and own automobiles, but are plain, simple souls whose outward shell is covered with cheap calico, the poor blood-relations of Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of all, who is no respecter of person, the last and least here, but perhaps the first and greatest beyond—Isidores with hayseed in their hair and hoe and pick and spade in hand, Zitas of the kitchen and Labres of the highways. They are sheep and lambs of the one fold, but no representative of the one Shepherd claims them, and yet their souls will be required at some one's hands.

To give just a few instances that came under my personal observation quite recently: A newly consecrated western bishop appointed two young clergymen to make an honest house-to-house visitation to ascertain the number of Catholics in a certain city. The result of their labor showed fully three times the number of Catholics previously estimated and was followed by the almost immediate foundation of several now flourishing congregations, and the building of a cathedral and college.

The bishop of a rapidly growing southern city found urgent need for the establishment of new parishes in the outskirts. The territorial limits of the older parishes were curtailed in consequence, whereat one of the pastors appealed, on the plea that no more than fifty families had been left to him. The bishop employed a former United States census enumerator to canvas the territory, and he reported 262 Catholic families. I know a priest who was assigned to a parish supposed to contain from 100 to 175 families, but who after a correct enumeration found himself pastor of 300 families, with an immediate need of a larger church and a Catholic school.

If all secular governments have the census taken at stated intervals and derive great benefits therefrom, why should not the Catholic Church, of whom St. Peter says: "You are a chosen generation, a holy nation, a purchased people," have a similar enumeration and derive from it far-reaching benefits redounding to the glory of God? As we are an eminently practical people, in view of the great expense connected with it the questions will be asked and must be satisfactorily answered, "Will it pay, and is it possible?"

To the first question there is but one answer. Apart from the encouragement and enthusiasm with which it would animate the Catholic body, it must be evident from the hue and cry of "padding," "unfairness," "exaggerated estimates," in Archbishop Glennon's report, and the perhaps consequent reduction of 15 per cent. to quiet popular clamor, how numbers of a certain kind affect the American public.

With definite information as to location, name, nationality, state of life (married or single) and parish affiliation as a basis of operation, the pastor can accurately judge what provisions he must make for the spiritual needs of his people; he can determine the size of the church and schools to be erected, the number of Masses required on Sundays, the convenient hours for

Divine service, confessions, etc. Knowing the condition both spiritual and financial of his flock, he can judge what societies are to be encouraged and what financial aid he can reasonably expect without degrading the priesthood by becoming a tax-gatherer or a Shylock. It will enable him to stir up gently and prudently, but effectively, the drones in the hive, whose spiritual life is often quickened and awakened by the material aid they are induced to render under one pretext or another. The congregation would move in a solid phalanx with the captain at their head. Unity of action would be furthered among the clergy and thus greatly strengthen the arms of the hierarchy by presenting a solid front to the enemy. An accurate enumeration of each parish cannot confine its benefits within its own narrow circle, but by its very nature is bound to have national results. I shall take the liberty of pointing out the leading consequences:

1. A correct and accepted census of each parish, thus revealing our numerical strength as a religious body, would in the first place be a crushing answer to such ominous predictions as appeared in the New York Nation of January 30, 1868, when it said: "Undoubtedly political equality, free public education under Protestant auspices, and a national rule which compels sectarian toleration, are forces, which must in time either destroy Catholicism in this country, or essentially change its nature."

2. It would be a decisive answer to the much-mooted question: "Is this actually, or is it at least growing to be a Protestant nation?" It would open the eyes of all fair-minded and well-informed Americans to the fact that the Catholic Church in the United States is becoming every day more thoroughly acclimated and at home, that as ex-Secretary Bonaparte recently expressed it in a public address, "She is no carpet-bagger, but her cross is planted to stay." An honest census would bring home the fact, that, while the number of American citizens during the last century and a quarter has increased some twenty or twenty-five fold, the number of Catholics in America has increased four hundred fold.

3. A complete census of each parish would point out the Catholic Church in America as "the Church of the people," the natural, genial home of the laboring classes, as she alone of churches was founded by a workman, the divine carpenter of Nazareth. As the truth of George Washington's words, "that morality cannot be separated from religion," is becoming daily more recognized by social reformers, the Church would loom up as the only hope of this country to save it from the impending consequences of atheism, anarchy and socialism. It would prove that she lives not as a sickly exotic, but grows, flourishes and waxes strong with a sound and healthy growth, "living much less for and with the rich and learned, than with and for that great mass of humanity whose passions, untamed by letters, are daily goaded by physical wants." (Citizen, May 16, 1909.)

4. A forcible presentation of our numerical strength revealed by parish census would, it seems to me, materially aid in obtaining proper recognition and fair representation on all civic committees, v. g., on the Board of Public Charities, penal and reformatory institutions, the school board, etc., where opportunity and means of preventing evil and doing good are afforded in such vast variety that only personal experience can make us properly appreciate their value and extent.

5. Irresistible force would be given to the words of our archbishops and bishops when presenting our just claims in these matters, if it were clearly understood that they spoke with the volume of perhaps twenty million voices. The demands of such a body can no longer be ignored.

6. It would discourage such movements as the A. P. A. from undertaking the herculean task of driving out by far the greatest religious body in the country.

7. It would certainly carry great weight in the final settlement of the school fund division, which is ever and anon clamoring for just solution, and is one of those questions that will not "stay down." It would make our protests more effective against Socialism and freakish legislation.

Ireland's Commercial Progress

The close of the fifth All Ireland Industrial Conference marks a definite move forward. The first of these Conferences was held in Cork in November, 1905, and had for its immediate result the institution of the Irish National Trade Mark. In subsequent years the cities of Dublin, Limerick and Galway invited delegates from all parts of Ireland to hold this representative gathering within their walls. When, at the end of the Galway Conference, we were invited by the Belfast delegates to meet in that city in 1909, it was felt by all that the adhesion of the great industrial city of the North set a crown on the efforts which were being made to promote the permanent revival of Irish industries. North, South, East and West are thus shown to be in earnest in securing increased production and consumption in the home market, with the natural result of an increasing determination to find an outlet abroad for those wares in which Ireland excels.

Without going elaborately into the statistics of Irish trade, it will not be out of place if I cite here the official figures for the past few years, published by the Irish Department of Agriculture:

Imports ..	£54,140,075	£55,480,926	£57,611,944	£61,617,225
Exports ..	51,037,545	52,569,548	57,233,698	60,521,245
Total ...	£105,177,620	£108,050,474	£114,845,642	£122,138,470

The industrial revival, though it has been brought to prominent notice by these annual conferences, does not owe its origin to them. At various periods during the past thirty years spasmodic efforts have been made to inculcate the doctrine of the duty of the individual Irishman to support home manufacture; but the success and the permanency of the present movement are to be traced to the birth of the Gaelic League.

In the political sphere there has continuously been evident the feeling, translated into action, which has won reform after reform, and maintains an unbroken rank of eighty members in the Irish Party, insistent on winning legislative independence. In this other sphere of Irish life, other forces have operated. Ever since the day, now some sixteen years ago, when a small group of men started the movement for the restoration of our national language to its proper place in the national life, there has been operating on the national conscience a two-fold prick: "Am I, an Irishman, content to see that distinctive mark of a nation, its language, lost for ever, and, am I doing my duty to my country if I do not give a real preference to Irish manufacture?" The national consciousness being thus affected, the natural law of supply and demand operates to bring about the increased production of Irish goods. With the spread of technical instruction one should include also that of the cooperative movement as important factors in the industrial revival. In the distribution as well as in the increased production of agricultural wealth, cooperation has proved most helpful; but perhaps the most efficient factor has been the registration of the Irish National Trade Mark. Outside Ireland there are many who are as yet unaware of its existence. Still more—to whom it is becoming familiar now that at least 430 Irish firms are using it,—have not grasped the fact that Ireland is the only country in the world which owns a legally registered Trade Mark applicable to all its products.

Registered on December 8th, 1906, under the provisions of the Trade Mark Act of 1905, The National Trade Mark gives an absolute guarantee that the article to which it is affixed is of Irish origin. The Irish Industrial Development Association, which controls its use, is now recognized as the leading industrial association in the country. It issues licenses only under the most stringent conditions, and under regulations approved by the Board of Trade. In addition, it has instituted a number of successful prosecutions against British and other firms for endeavoring to pass off spurious articles as genuine Irish. In this way a stop has been put to French-made crochet being palmed off as Irish lace, and it is no longer easy for Yorkshire shoddy to masquerade as Donegal homespun. But the activities of this Association have not been limited to Police Court prosecutions. Its influence has been exerted in still more far-reaching directions.

A British firm endeavored to register as a trade mark the Irish word Slaintè. After protracted legal proceedings this was refused by the authorities on the grounds, as advanced by the Irish Association, that the use of the Irish language would suggest an Irish origin and would be likely to mislead purchasers. In another case the Association secured the rejection of the registration of a shamrock as a trade mark by a firm whose headquarters were in England. Thus there has been obtained the valuable recognition by the Courts of Law that the national language and the national emblems are to be used only by genuine Irish firms. Public bodies throughout Ireland are now demanding that the Irish Trade Mark shall be branded on the goods supplied by public contract as a proof of their genuine Irish origin, and now that their right to give a reasonable preference to Irish goods has been legally recognized, the use of the National Trade Mark will in a few years become universal.

Whilst the main efforts are being directed to secure the home market, the steady existence of foreign trade has been a marked feature of Ireland's commercial progress, especially during the last few years. Indeed, it is a remarkable proof of the natural capacities of the country, that hampered by the restrictions imposed by an alien government and taxed by millions annually beyond her taxable capacity, Ireland has been steadily increasing her export of agricultural produce and of manufactured goods. A few years ago, I secured through Parliamentary action that some of the most important foreign states should distinguish, in their trade statistics, between Irish and English trade. The United States Government, I am glad to say, is amongst that number and agreed to make the distinction at the earliest possible moment. In future, therefore, instead of finding Ireland's trade figures lost under the general designation of "United Kingdom," it will be possible for economists to trace Ireland's commercial dealings with foreign countries from year to year.

Practical steps have been taken to push Irish trade abroad by means of retail stores. Buenos Aires now has a regular Irish Store and Agency under the capable direction of Mr. Bowen, and a valuable connection for Irish laces, tweeds and other products has been established with Irish residents in the Argentine Republic. In London, central premises in the West End have been secured by the new Irish Direct Supply, which makes a representative display at 94 Victoria street, S. W., of Irish goods, drawn from all parts of the island. This store, indeed, is an example of private enterprise carrying out what, in the case of the British Colonies, is done at Government expense. Every important British Colony has now in London a well-arranged display of what the Colony produces, and is able to secure substantial trade in consequence. Ireland, handicapped by not having control of her own finances, is unable to spend her money in a similar way. With the progress which has already been made by private enterprise in developing an export trade and in opening Irish stores in large centres of population, I confidently anticipate that before long the Irish Store will become a feature in every community where Irish people are to be found, in Australia as well as in North and South America.

To conclude this rough summary of Ireland's commercial progress, I am not without hope that the newly-established National University of Ireland will play an important part in the country's industrial future. The University Commissioners, of whom I am one, charged with the duty of framing the statutes, recognized from the first the urgency of providing for an adequate faculty of commerce. Accordingly, amongst the chairs is that of National Economics, in addition to Political Economy. Without doubt, the focussing of the nation's mind on National Economics as distinct from the general study of economics, marks a development far in advance of the older Universities of the United Kingdom. Ireland's University thereby strikes a note which is bound to influence the whole current of thought in the country. Trade, and above all, honest trade, should be held in high estimation if a country is to succeed. For years, whilst Ireland was grappling with the land problem, now happily nearing solution, observers noted with pain that success in the learned professions and in securing posts in the English Civil Service was the goal to which Irish education in every grade was directed. In the new and freer conditions created by the establishment of a National University, and in the formation of a peasant proprietary in place of the old vicious system of land tenure, fresh vital forces have come into play. Increased production and increased consumption of home manufacture, the building up of an export trade—these are the goals to which, inspired by an unfaltering determination to secure legislative freedom, the best thought in Ireland is resolutely directed.

JOHN P. BOLAND, M. P.

How Fads Grow and Go

The word fad is used so much of late that probably very few have any idea how recent the word is. The earliest example given in the "New English Dictionary" is dated 1834. There were fads before that date, and the word existed in dialects. Suddenly fads became the fad, and a rare word became common. Fad has now gone the way of many an English word, and has raised a large family of connected words. What did people say a hundred years ago, when they spoke of fad? Perhaps they used the word hobby. Hobby, however, is limited. A hobby might be styled a personal fad. Many fads begin in hobbies, but they do not stop there. A crotchet expresses a like idea, but seems to be even more restricted than a hobby. Is not a crotchet an odd or peculiar hobby? Has it not something unusual about it? Fashion comes nearest to fad. Yet even here we feel conscious of a great difference. Fashion has not so long a life as a fad; it is based on a whim, concerns itself, as a rule, with things of lesser importance. A fad goes back to some truth, and considers itself all important. Slang is a fashion in language; the exclusive or excessive use of Anglo-Saxon words in English is a fad. Fashion says "Everybody does it"; fad, "Everybody ought to do it."

A fad, then, seems to be a theory applied too extensively, an overgrown or over-emphasized truth. It is one answer to all difficulties, the key to all locks, the panacea to all diseases. A faddist has no horizon; he has a vista. He looks at life, health, happiness and everything else in the universe through the brass cylinder of a telescope; he has a deeper, better view than everyone else, but it is a partial view. He thinks that view should be everybody's view because it is so fully and perfectly his own view. He is like people who live in fewer dimensions than others and cannot lift themselves above their environment. A man with a fad lives in one dimension; he has position, but has not length, breadth or depth.

There is truth in a fad, but it is uncharitable truth. It will not speak to its neighbors or recognize them. If one facet of a diamond saw a reflection of its brightness, it would grow so conceited (you know how small a thing a facet is) that it would ignore all its fellows and think it was the only jewel in the world, reflecting, too, the whole round glory of truth. Imagine a teapot exhibiting its tempest as the sole, copyrighted, patented article, while all others were spurious imitations. We should pity the teapot, but what else can the poor thing do? It is conscious of one only tempest, and that is gigantic enough for it. Therefore it wishes to make its truth the measure of all truth. The man with a fad has no general view. For him one truth is all truth. He has opened his eyes once; he has seen what he has seen, and now he has closed them forever and goes plunging towards the goal of destiny, bowling over all interference until he has planted the little truth tucked under his arm beyond the line and in the land where victory lies.

The first famous faddist in history was Æneas, who exhorts us to apply to all the Greeks what he found true of Sinon. An induction from one example makes poor logic, but may make a respectable fad. Ab uno disce omnes should be the motto of the faddist. Father Hardouin, the learned Jesuit, was a long time librarian, read so many manuscripts, and knew so much about copies, that he forgot that there was an original. Father Hardouin is responsible for the fad that among the glories of the thirteenth century is the composition of all the writings of antiquity, with a few exceptions, which he was careful to point out. Professor Frederick Aug. Wolf was the originator or, at least, the propagator of a fad somewhat akin to Father Hardouin's. He is the one who made popular the higher criticism fad, which last century had full control of Homer and all other early literature. It has taken nearly a hundred years for the literary world to get over the excesses of that fad. In the realms of Scripture the fad is running the same course as unconcernedly and as ludicrously as in Homer. It takes a long time for faddists to learn the limitations of the truth they possess.

There must be some reason why the English language became conscious about seventy-five years ago of the need of a new word, which it elevated from the provincialism of a dialect into national idiom. The reason is partly found in the prevailing traits of these last three quarters of a century. Science and journalism are characteristic of this portion of modern history, and they make the fruitful field wherein has grown our harvest of fads. Perhaps there have been periods in the world's history more fertile in theories than the one we speak of, but they were not periods of fads because the theories never grew beyond the dimensions of a hobby. The medieval alchemist rode his hobby around his bubbling crucible; the modern alchemist mounts his theory on the wings of journalism and it grows to the dimensions of a fad. For nearly a century we have been living in an age of discoveries. The true scientist, of course, will not stretch his facts beyond due dimensions. His enthusiastic followers have not always his saving common sense and scientific spirit. They in their enthusiasm, and faddists are always enthusiasts, must translate discoveries into solutions of the secret of the universe. Darwin was content to assert what he thought the fact of evolution; Spencer made evolution a fad and crushed the whole universe into his little formula. Darwin tried to prove by experimentation that some parts of the organic world were the product of evolution; Spencer by excogitation roundly asserted that everything was the product of evolution.

Some years ago a book was translated from the French by a professor of Columbia College, or under his auspices. In it a French philosopher developed the thought that imitation was the solution of the world's mystery. If both of these fads were true in their universal application, the world would have been brought to a standstill long ago. Evolution demands unceasing change; imitation demands ceaseless reproduction of the same. There is no evolution without a difference; there is no difference with imitation. The whole truth is in neither system; both systems have a little truth, but their authors were not content with that fact; they desired their truth to be the only truth, and they succeeded in producing fads. But theorizing and journalism were the order of the day these last seventy years or more. It is more convenient to buy your thinking already done than to do it yourself, and it was a poor journal that did not furnish its readers with a brand new theory of the universe every morning at a very low rate.

Fads arise from mental sloth as well as mental pride. It is fatal to self-love to admit that one's knowledge is limited; it is disastrous to confess that, in the language of the advertiser, any other mind has a commodity just as good. It requires mental humility to do that. Yet one must have some answer, and it saves thinking to take another's answer. To be modest is to be ignorant; to be humble is to be incompetent. We want instantaneous, complete and lasting cures in all our patent medicines; we expect no less from our patent theories. Indeed, the patent medicine is a very apt comparison. Most patent medicines begin in fads and end in frauds.

Darwinism, Atomism, Eclecticism, Burbankism are all so many titles of likely subjects for fads. If a gardener can develop by careful selection and by the burning of heaps of waste products, say a pea-melon, with all the deliciousness of melons and all the nutritiousness of peas, why, ask the faddists, should we not have men and women with the brains of Aristotle and the muscles of Milo, the Crotonian, and the morals of St. Louis and the manners of Chesterfield? The only answer occurring to common sense is that men and women are not vegetables, and rebel in their stubborn free-wills against careful selection and have very decided objections to being treated as waste products. The faddist, however, cannot see free-will and immortal souls through his half-opened eyes. He sees only Burbankism.

To have and grow a really successful fad, you must be careful in the choice of your subject. Spencerianism and Eclecticism—and other such systems will do for the educated, but for a world-wide fad, you must take a subject, upon which all can judge; you must select one of the great needs of man; you must choose the health of the body, the improvement of the mind, the good of the soul. Food and drink, education, religion are the best subjects for a fad. The very mention of their names suggests a host of fads which have held the field successively, all promising to cure the ills that flesh and mind and soul are heir to.

FRANCIS DONNELLY, S.J.

The Late Judge Curran

Montreal lost one of her most popular and gifted citizens in the death of Mr. Justice Curran on the 1st inst. John Joseph Curran was born in Montreal on February 22, 1842. His father, Mr. Charles Curran, came from County Down and his mother, née Sarah Kennedy, from County Wexford. John Joseph began his classical course at St. Mary's College, Montreal, completed it at the University of Ottawa and took his law course at McGill University, where he received the degree of B.C.L. in 1862; but, being then only twenty, he had to wait nearly one year before his admission to the Bar in March, 1863. Rising rapidly to eminence in his profession, he was made a Queen's Counsel of Quebec in 1878 and of Canada in 1881. In the general election of 1882 he was returned for Montreal Centre and represented that constituency at Ottawa until his elevation to the bench as Puisne Judge of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec in 1895.

He was appointed Solicitor-General in the cabinet of Sir John Thompson, one of the finest Premiers Canada has ever had. The similarity of sympathies and aspirations of these two distinguished men, both fervent and enlightened Catholics, knit them close together, while they administered the legal department of the Dominion, until the tragic death of Sir John at Windsor Castle. On one occasion when rumors were rife that the Hon. J. J. Curran would soon be appointed to a judgeship, Sir John Thompson stated publicly that, greatly as Mr. Curran would deserve this preferment, he, as Prime Minister, was unwilling that the brilliant political career of his colleague should be thus cut short, and that consequently the Solicitor-General would remain in the cabinet, which he did even after Sir Mackenzie Bowell had succeeded to the premiership. In July, 1896, before the Catholic Summer School at Plattsburgh, N. Y., Judge Curran gave an address on the "Life and Labors of Sir John Thompson," which was considered worthy to be ranked as a lasting memorial to a great statesman.

Mr. Justice Curran combined to an extraordinary degree ability with geniality, earnestness of purpose and depth of convictions with a rare fascination of manner that won him the love of all classes. Of him the Montreal Star said editorially: "In the House of Commons he was a prime favorite. When the weary members waited for a division in the small hours of the morning, it was oftenest 'Curran' that they called upon for the merry song which was to help them forget their fatigues. Every man within the sound of his voice or the magic of his smile was his friend." And throughout all the allurements of political life he ever bore a character without reproach and was as respected as he was popular.

Judge Curran, besides being a born orator and entertainer, wielded a facile pen and contributed largely to magazines and journals on legal, historical and other subjects. Until his elevation to the bench he was one of the directors of the True Witness Publishing Company.

In 1890, while he was still a member of Parliament, in acknowledgment of his indefatigable efforts to promote the interests of his constituents, he was presented, chiefly by citizens of Montreal, with a purse of $7,000. On the organization of a Law faculty in the University of Ottawa, in 1892, he was appointed to one of the legal chairs and elected Vice-Dean. In August, 1896, he was elected a delegate to the Irish Race Convention, which met in Dublin during the ensuing month. He was also at one time President of the St. Patrick's Society of Montreal. By the Irish community of Montreal he is honored as one who stood the test of devotion to their common fatherland, but to Canada he gave his best service, and by his fellow-Canadians, irrespective of origin or creed, his memory is held in the highest esteem and the warmest affection. His funeral was one of the largest and most impressive ever seen in Montreal. What was especially remarkable was the number of legal lights of Bench and Bar who followed the cortège on foot. Rev. Father McShane, pastor of St. Patrick's, who had attended the late Judge in his last illness, celebrated the solemn Requiem Mass in the large church filled to the doors by sincere mourners who had come to pray that he who had so long been known as a just judge might find mercy at the Great Judgment-Seat.

Under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus a pilgrimage to Genoa in honor of Columbus is being organized for August, 1910. A visit to Rome, and to the Passion Play at Oberammergau are included in the program. It will be under the spiritual supervision of Bishop Keane of Cheyenne, Wyo.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Success of Superstition

LONDON, OCTOBER 2, 1909.

Mr. W. T. Stead is a veteran journalist who can claim that he has not only chronicled history but helped to make it by influencing great events. Keenest of politicians, he throws himself into the forefront of every political battle, using his monthly organ, the Review of Reviews as his pulpit, and supplementing his editorial activity by turning out pamphlets in editions of a hundred thousand. But there is another side to his life. Hardly a number of his Review appears that does not contain some articles on Spiritism and what is vaguely known as Occultism. Sprung from one of the narrowest sects of British Nonconformity he has made a religion for himself, in which the striving for irregular communication with the spirit world plays a large part.

Some years ago he boldly announced that in his editorial work he was often guided by a spirit, known to him by the name of "Julia." Hostile critics said that perhaps this accounted for some of his more erratic political utterances. When one of his sons died last year, he said to an intimate friend of his:—"Willie will be of greater help to me now than ever. I shall not trouble him for a few months with attempts to communicate, but after that I expect we shall get into touch."

He has more than once said that his ambition is to establish a kind of "telephone exchange" between the unseen and the living world of the present, so that men and women could be put in communication with departed friends with no more delay or difficulty than one meets with when one tries to ring up a fellow subscriber to a telephone system. Five months ago he organized at his editorial offices at Mowbray House on the Thames Embankment an attempt at something of this kind. It is an effort to put Spiritism on a business-like basis. There are no mysterious dark-room séances at Mowbray House, but the surroundings that might be found in a lawyer's office or a physician's consulting room. But "Julia" is declared to be the chief of the invisible staff, while the human element is provided by clerks to deal with correspondence and records, and a couple of accomplished mediums to interview clients and arrange for communications with friends who have passed to "the other side".

There is no direct charge for consultations, but a preliminary condition is that the enquirer must subscribe to "The Borderland Library," a series of publications on Spiritism issued by Mr. Stead. He says, however, that this in no way covers rent and other expenses, which he meets out of his own pocket, hoping that before long some one will endow the new Information Bureau, as "Julia" assures him will be the case. Next the enquirer signs a form stating that he or she wishes to communicate with a dead friend or relative, and honestly believes that this friend's spirit would be anxious to be put in communication if possible.

These preliminaries having been settled, the client is introduced into a room of which the door is lettered "sanctum, private". It was till lately Mr. Stead's private editorial office, a fine room, looking out on the river, and decorated with photographs of the many celebrities whom he has known. The only reminder of the occult is a series of so-called spirit photographs. Here the medium is waiting, and the communications are generally carried on by what is called "spirit writing," the medium, pencil or pen in hand, writing under the alleged influence of some unseen spirit.

Mr. Stead says that every day since the office opened there have been inquirers, and in seventy-five per cent. of these cases they have been quite satisfied, from the nature of the answers given, that they were receiving the messages of dead friends. It would be interesting to discuss some of these cases, but we must wait for a long series of records to be available, and the difficulty is that such enquiries must generally turn on matters too intimate for publication.

There is no need here to go into the large question of how much of self-delusion and how much of reality there is in such messages. I only note the fact that this Spiritist Bureau is in regular working order in the midst of London, to show how rife certain dangerous forms of superstition are outside the Church. This dabbling with necromancy, divination and petty forms of sorcery meets one on all sides. There are a score of Spiritist circles in session every Sunday. Boardmen parade the fashionable thoroughfares of the West End with placards inviting people to visit palmists, astrologers, crystal gazers, "sand-diviners" and the rest, some of these claiming to be Oriental soothsayers. Amulets are sold at the jewellers. Two years ago a miniature New Zealand idol carved in green jade-stone was the most popular. In a published portrait of an actress one saw it hanging on her necklace beside a little gold cross. Last Christmas the favorite was "Billiken, the luck bringer," a hideous squat figure like a misshapen Mexican god, "warranted to bring good fortune to any house where it was kept." Then there are three flourishing congregations of Faith Healers, according to the new gospel of Mrs. Eddy, and in the modified form of what is called "The Emmanuel Movement" the craze is spreading to the Anglican Church. It is all very lamentable, and the remarkable thing is that as often as not the pursuit of these practices is associated with a fixed belief that scientific progress has made the Christian Revelation obsolete.

The Sodality Congresses of Spain

The Sodality Congress movement in Spain dates back but a few years. It was in August, 1903, that the Directors of the principal Spanish Sodalities affiliated with the Prima Primaria of Rome met in Madrid and decided to give new life to their Sodality work by holding a great Sodality Congress which would draw together in closer union both directors and members; and, at the same time, would permit of an organized plan for good unattainable by disunited efforts. The Spanish-American Sodality Congress of Barcelona was the outcome. This successful congress, held in November, 1904, registered some 1,700 Protectors and Sodalists from seventy-six cities and pueblos of Spain and from important Sodality centres of Chile, Argentina, Ecuador, Cuba and Mexico. The late Cardinal Casañas presided at the Inaugural Session and the Hall of the Palacio de Bellas Artes was crowded with 5,800 people.

But it is not the history of the congresses, but rather their value for good which proves them worthy of our attention. The Congress of Valencia in 1906, and that of Majorca of the present year are the fruits of the great Congress of Barcelona. In all these congresses the spirit and plan are the same—only growing more practical, more detailed at each meeting.

To a man of a practical mind the question will suggest itself: "What has been the outcome of the congress movement?" A truly satisfactory one. To understand the nature of the congress movement it will be well to examine the plan of work. When the music and speeches of the inaugural ceremony are over we find the delegates settling down for serious-minded action. There are four sections; each with its own president, a layman, who presides at the reading of the papers assigned for discussion. The spiritual life of a sodalist gives matter for the first section; while the intellectual improvement of a sodalist forms the second section. Section No. 3 deals with improvements of social work; while No. 4 treats of the relations between affiliated sodalities.

Of the practical fruits of the first section little need be said. Anyone who has witnessed the edifying spectacle of nearly a thousand professional men and university students gathered on a Sunday morning in the Jesuit Church in the Calle Caspe of Barcelona can bear witness that the devotional section of the Spanish Sodality Congresses is infusing the spirit of the Prima Primaria into the sodalities of Spain. It is especially of the second and third sections of the congress work I would speak. These are proving the practical value of the movement.

What is being done for the intellectual improvement of sodalists? Again we may study the Barcelona Sodality, which is the model for all, to find what ideas are being put into practice by the Sodality Congresses. We find nine Groups or Academies connected with the Barcelona Sodality. These include academies of medicine, engineering, law, science and pharmacy, languages, music, philosophy and letters. Eighty-one doctors and medical students from the university compose the medical Group, which during year 1908 met on thirteen occasions for the discussion of some important medical topic. The Academy of engineering is composed of eighty-eight practising engineers and engineering students from the university who during the past year held fourteen engineering discussions. The same plan holds for all the groups. Each has its day for meeting, has its own president, and is composed of students and professional men of the particular subject of which the Academy treats. Thus is Catholic spirit being infused into the professors, and students amid the dangers and freedom of the Government University are being guarded and guided by men whose names are honored in their respective professions. Besides the academies there are lectures on Socialism, Social Action, etc., in order to prepare sodalists for the apostolic work of the third section of the Congress Movement.

That much good is being done by sodalists in Spain is evident to all. Centres have been established for workmen, where conferences are given on Catholic Social principles; schools have been opened in neglected districts to save children to the Church; Catechism is taught in poorer sections of the cities, in hospitals and prisons; workmen are encouraged to make the Spiritual Exercises by being compensated for financial loss during several days' absence from work, by having expenses of board paid by sodalities; these and a hundred and one other good works prove that the Third Section of the Congress Movement is bearing fruit. The proper apostolic spirit of the Prima Primaria is being infused into the lives of Spanish Sodalists. The best eulogy of the sodalists' work among the laboring classes of Barcelona was paid during the recent disorders in that city. The Radical Republicans had long since recognized the strong influence of the Workmen's Centre of San Pedro Claver in resisting their pernicious atheistical doctrines. Finding the building undefended it was with joy they destroyed it in the late fanatical war on religion and order.

To sodality directors and members in the United States the Sodality Congresses of Spain offer an inspiration. What a field of work lies open to the sodalities of the United States. A Sodality Congress! What an army of fervent, zealous men, lay workers, would be put into the field. The scope and idea of a sodality of the Prima Primaria consist not alone in meetings of devotion. That is only a part of the work. The instilling of one's own fervent spirit into the hearts of others; a lay apostolate, under the protection of the Mother of God, is the keynote of the sodality. From a Sodality Congress would issue a spirit which should put an army of zealous laymen back of the Retreat Movement; which should raise up a host of sodalists working for the spread and support of a strong Catholic press; for the establishing of Workmen's Social Centres; for the helping of Catholic schools in neglected districts; the teaching of Catechism to the poor, to the sick and the neglected in hospitals and prisons; these and a hundred and one other good works all lie within the scope of the sodality. The Sodality Congresses of Spain were started to bring home the idea to Directors and members that the spirit of the Prima Primaria is broader than private devotional meetings. That the idea has been driven home may be judged from the work being done. With Regional Congresses held in New York, Chicago, New Orleans, etc., we should have an army of zealous Directors and delegates returning as they return after each Congress in Spain, eager both in instill their spirit into the hearts of their associates and to unfold the plan of united action for the glory of God and the increase of devotion to the Immaculate Queen of Heaven.

CHARLES J. MULLALY, S.J.

The Mechlin Catholic Congress.—September 23-26

LOUVAIN, SEPTEMBER 27, 1909.

As our train steamed slowly out from amidst the thousands that thronged Mechlin station last night, the great tower of St. Rombant loomed up between us and the moon. It made us think of the old story that is told of the good people of the town. Many, many years ago the cry of "fire!" rang through the narrow old streets,—St. Rombant's was burning! Fire hose played on the great structure and still the glare shone out, until—someone walked around to the other side and discovered that it was the moon shining through the windows. You may believe the story or not, as you wish, but from that day to this the Malinois have a reputation for stupidity. Be that as it may, this fact is certain, they are many of them hostile to the Church. This time, however, they belied their reputation for both one and the other, for they might just as well have tried to extinguish the moon as do the things it was said they would do against all those loyal thousands. And so the great Catholic congress is over without mishap, and I am sitting down the day after to give you an account of this superb manifestation of Catholic faith and Belgian enterprise we have been witnessing these past four days. It is all over, and though it is too early yet to hazard an appreciation of its work, I can at least tell you what that work was and how they did it. It will be especially interesting to those who seek an insight into the Belgian's character, for here you had him off his guard, as it were, à l'improviste, in his native element—naïve and simple as a child, earnest as a boy, enthusiastic as a youth, prudent and far-seeing as a grown man, showing each quality in its turn,—somewhat boisterously at times, it must be owned, but no less surely.

The political element was wholly banished from the proceedings; the aim was simply to set before the country a statement of what the Catholics are doing, in the line of religious works especially, and to help to make known the Catholics to each other. This was the idea that dominated all meetings; there were held in the halls and classrooms of the Petit Seminaire which, in the words of Cardinal Mercier, resembled nothing so much as an immense human beehive, with the workers coming and going unceasingly, and buzzing, too, right merrily. And the honey they made was good and plentiful, as we shall see. The whole congress was divided up into six sections, those of Religious, Charitable and Moral, of Social and Economic works, of works of Education, of the Press and Propaganda, of Scientific, Artistic and Literary, and Colonial works—a complete tableau of Belgian Catholic activity. Many of these were divided up into sub-sections, making in all just fourteen meetings going on at the same time, morning and afternoon. During the congress 280 papers were read on the different subjects—this gives an idea of the vastness of the work. The method of proceeding in each case was the following: All the papers had been printed and were in the hands of those present. At the meeting, the author of each formally presented it, commented on it in a short speech, and presented certain resolutions for adoption by the congress. Then followed a discussion, and this was by far the most interesting part; for here the Belgian character invariably showed itself in all its earnestness and simplicity—not to speak of the immense information gleaned in the course of the debate, which was open to all. Then, each afternoon, there was a general assembly to close the work of the day. Here most of all were apparent the earnestness and enthusiasm of the congressists, for coming as they did at the end of each day, these assemblies were like a valve to let escape the pent-up emotions of the day. Here some of the best orators of France and Belgium, besides representatives from Austria, Germany and Holland, held forth to a throng of 2,000 people.

On the opening day, God came first, as is fitting. At 9.30, Thursday morning, the vast old Gothic temple of St. Rombaut was filled to brimming with these workmen calling down His blessing before beginning His work. The work was then ready to begin; it began with a blaze of glory in an enthusiastic meeting in the great hall. The two presidents of Senate and Chamber and M. Kurth, started the great machinery working. But these were only the preliminaries. The real work began in the afternoon; then the congressists showed that "they knew what they wanted and knew how to get it," according to the old Flemish proverb applied to them by M. Kurth. And for three days the work went on unceasingly—and at the end they were working as hard as at first. A glance at the most interesting discussions. The Belgian is practical and in earnest, and a glimpse at what meetings were most crowded will tell us what works he puts in his mind before all others. These were those of social activity, of the Press, of Education—the latter especially—for every day more than a thousand closely followed the meetings in the large hall. This section was presided over by M. Woeste and witnessed the adoption of the principle of absolute equality for the schools, on the first day; on the second, of resolutions indorsing the ancient classics, against some opposition, led by M. Kurth, in favor of the "Christian classics"; and on the third, a heated discussion of the Flemish question. In the section of the Press, many excellent suggestions were put forward for the betterment and propagation of the Catholic newspapers, while as for social works, Belgium's reputation for being the foremost in this line of activity, suffices to describe the interest taken in this section. One special feature must not be passed over, the women's section. Here a good day's work was done, and crowned with a general assembly presided over by Father Van Langermeersch, S.J., of Brussels, and addressed by the Cardinal. To speak of all that was done at the congress, however, is impossible, but in all be it remembered that the aim was throughout the same, to make known to the government and to each other, the people's attitude on the many difficult questions of the day. The chief speakers were Mgr. Touchet of Orleans; M. Jacquier, a lawyer of Lyons, both orators of the highest order; MM. Beernaert and Woeste, the two veteran statesmen, who both received thunderous ovations; Frs. Rutten, O.P., and Vermeersch, S.J., and H. E. Cardinal Mercier, whose sympathetic personality dominated the whole congress.

The most striking feature of the congress was, that the vast majority of the work was done by laymen; and in the midst of it all one felt this, that these men were here to work, and that that work was one, not personal advancement, financial or otherwise, but, as is clear, for the good of their neighbor and the Catholic religion. The note of personal interestedness was so far absent that a stranger would with difficulty have convinced himself of its reality; for here were hundreds of men of affairs, lawyers, doctors, statesmen, giving not only these three days to the work, but with the proofs in their hands that they give goodly portion of their lives to it. That fact alone furnishes the greatest possible tribute to the nobility of the Catholic religion, and its strength in Belgium. Another admirable fact was the marvellous unity shown in the action of all present. To any one who knows the national rivalry that exists in Belgium, this will seem all the more worthy of praise. Never once,—and I made it a point to mix with the crowds and listen,—never once did I see or hear anything like animosity or hatred. This is what will form the strength of the Catholic party—an axe one might compare it to, with its keen Walloons and its blunt, strong Flemings welded together into one harmonious whole, doing one single work.

At last came Sunday which as the first three days had been consecrated to the work of the head was in its turn given to the enthusiasm of the heart. It was a day of emotions, of joy, of triumph. First of all, a Pontifical Mass; then many different popular assemblies, the most important that of the Catholic youth. But the greatest was yet to come—the vast crowds that thronged the streets seemed there only for it—the grand cortège. Fifteen hundred societies had passed in, 60,000 strong, and a crowd of 20,000 besides. A most soul-stirring feature of it was the presence of the thirty-four reliquaries containing the bodies of Belgium's great, popular saints, the great Catholic men of the past, here present among the Catholics of to-day. I watched the cortège from a window. Three whole hours it took to pass and the sight was unforgettable. Not that it was gay, or brilliant, or attractive even, but they just marched by, plain, honest workmen in their Sunday clothes, and the sight of that steady, earnest stream of men exclusively and most of them young men, attesting thus their devotion not to a Catholic party, but to the Catholic Church, gave birth to emotions in those who saw it that the wildest manifestations could never have aroused. Then the great Te Deum at the end—70,000 people packed to suffocation in the Grand Place, all raising a thunder of praise to their God—it was the very climax of a day of thrilling emotions, for at the end there rose such a cheer as the old walls of Mechlin had never rung to, a cheer that lasted fully fifteen minutes, while the 1,500 banners waved in the air, bands played "La Brabançonne," and handkerchiefs fluttered from the surrounding houses. It was the spontaneous outburst of the pride of a great people, and the sight was indescribable; and when one reflected what it all meant, for Whom and for what it all was, it stirred the very depths of one's being.

It was thus that the congress ended, beyond all doubt a superb success, whose political effects will be enormous and which will bear certain fruit to Church and to country. To a foreigner it was a strangely moving thing, an unforgettable experience, a lesson, and an inspiration. God protect Belgium and her Catholic people!

The Croats and Religious Liberty

BELGRADE, SEPTEMBER 16, 1909.

Since some time it is being borne in on the Christian peoples of the Balkans that there is a future for Slav Catholicity independent of an Empire doomed to disintegration in the very interests of the Teuton supremacy for which it is working. Why indeed, should Austria, ally of rampant Protestantism, have the monopoly of protecting Catholicism and bending it to selfish political ends? At a period more or less remote the Hapsburg Monarchy, admirably as it may have served the Church, must necessarily yield to newer, stronger forces. Therefore its identification with the cause which stands above and beyond states and nationalities is misleading, unjust and detrimental.

Any attempt to confine the Church, which holds in its mighty arms all sorts and conditions of men, within the limits of a particular form of government has ever been doomed to failure. Races and dynasties pass away but the kingdom of Christ pursues its course unimpeded. It is not joined to the ancient chariot of obsolete tradition, any more than to the swift wheels of brand-new theorists in government, although both may move under its auspices, helping and being helped in the accomplishment of ephemeral tasks. Rome, serene amid the wars and rivalries of peoples, continues to leaven humanity. It is invidious to connect her spirituality with the political ambition of any of her children.

When we remember that English Catholics are the most irreconcilable opponents to any national aspiration of the Irish people, it will not astonish us to see two rival Catholic camps now in process of formation within the Serbo-Croat lands subject to Austria. The "Croat National Union," composed almost exclusively of fervent, practising Catholics, refuses to accept the jurisdiction in temporal matters of Bishop Stadler, an exemplary and universally respected prelate, but devoted, as in duty bound, to Austrian interests. The Bishop accordingly with his wonted energy and perspicacity is actually forming a "Croat-Catholic Association," to counteract the influence of the Croat-National Union, and to further Imperial interests irrespective of Mohammedan or Orthodox Serb reclamations. In reality the issue at stake is not one of creed, and Catholic is pitted against Catholic in the secular struggle of Slav versus German. It is usual to represent the Franciscan Order, domiciled for centuries in Croatia, as bitterly at feud with the more recently installed Jesuits. Personal observation has convinced me that both Orders—independent of a certain rivalry in the matter of languages and national sentiment—are admirably serving the Church by an exemplary sanctity of life and a zealous charity. So far from injuring the cause foremost in the heart of each this divergence of political views may be pointed to, as a splendid proof of the Church's vitality and universality. At the same time we have a Magyar Catholic clergy actively hostile to the independent development of Catholic Croatia (a mere gem, according to them, in the crown of St. Stephen) and jealously susceptible to Austrian encroachment.

As might be expected, there are some remarkable features in this triangular dispute over the annexed provinces. For example, the promised constitution for Bosnia is delayed, owing to the formula "Imperial and Royal" in the documents, drafted by Aehrenthal, as opposed to the single word "Royal" exacted by the Hungarians who claim sole sovereignty over these Serb lands.

Last Sunday the Orthodox Patriarch of the ancient See of Carlovats who ranks in the ecclesiastical hierarchy of the Serbs above the Metropolitans of Belgrade and Cetinje, came in state to bless the new schools built by the Serb population round Temlin. The Catholic Prebendary was among the dignitaries who welcomed him at the railway station, and who kissed the prelate's hand. As soon as the Patriarch had visited the Orthodox church he drove straight to the Roman where he likewise offered a prayer. The Serb flag was everywhere conspicuous and the houses of Orthodox and Catholic were decorated alike for the occasion. The citizens of Belgrade had crossed over in great numbers and for the moment everything Magyar was in abeyance. At the banquet given in his honor Patriarch Bogdanovitch toasted Kaiser Franz-Josef, the Municipality of Temlin, and the Orthodox clergy, but made no mention of the Hungarian governor More: he alluded in veiled terms to the Serbs on trial for high treason in Agram, and spoke feelingly of the perils with which the race was confronted to-day but which it would vanquish as it had vanquished many others in its chequered history. The Catholic and Orthodox clergy, facing him at the board, applauded in unison, and other speeches, redolent of political amity, were delivered. Already a rapprochement between adherents of both creeds had begun when the detested civil marriage law was enacted; and Orthodox Serbs, crossing to the neighboring kingdom of Servia by various subterfuges in order to avoid the contract before a mayor and secure a purely religious ceremony, had the entire sympathy and approval of their Catholic countrymen. Affinity of belief, as well as of blood, is naturally drawing the two sections closer to each other in a spirit of common opposition to the domineering pretensions of a nation riddled by Semitism. Austria has egregiously failed and Hungary will certainly not succeed in stifling Slav aspirations. The Budapest Press is still busy denouncing the Patriarch's speech as disloyal and wanting in tact since it made no mention of Magyar national ideals; but the time has come when the Serb element dares to take a bold stand in asserting its rights within the heterogeneous empire of Austria-Hungary. One of its most broad-minded yet fervent champions is certainly the Patriarch of Carlovats, recently chosen by the Kaiser among three candidates for the office, on account of his moderation and justice of view. Clad in the purple of his rank, the Cross upon his breast, with pale, refined features contrasting strongly with coal-black beard, and waving hair that reaches to his shoulders, the Serb Patriarch is a fine, imposing figure. His unswerving faith, exemplary life and Christian tolerance surely make him a more fitting ally for Slav Catholics in the Balkans than half-atheistic, lax-Catholic and wholly unscrupulous politicians working under the cloak of religion for the Teuton Drang nach Osten.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Promise and Fulfilment

With this issue we begin Volume Second of AMERICA. We do not need to repeat here the editorial announcement which was published in our first number. What was outlined there in design has been worked out carefully in reality. AMERICA has been a review of the life and literature of the time; it has discussed actual questions and vital problems from a truly Christian point of view; it is now an accredited record of religious activity, a defender of sound doctrine, and an exponent of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life. From week to week we have published the sentiments of its admirers, whose number equals all who have read it. They have chorused its praises in terms which editorial modesty would forbid us to use. Collected together in a pamphlet we have lately issued, they impress on the reader two facts which justify the existence of this Review, the one that it was sorely needed, the other that it has fully satisfied, if it has not surpassed, the high expectations its announcement had raised. Never has such a spontaneous outpouring of commendation greeted a similar enterprise, and so far as we can learn not one discordant note has been sounded. AMERICA has fulfilled its promise; it has merited the support and hearty approbation of thousands of subscribers; it has become a favorite medium of Catholic sentiment, and an active organ of Catholic influence.

What Catholic Readers Appreciate

Gratifying as it is to feel that we have in some measure, satisfied the expectations of our readers, it is still more gratifying to be confirmed in the conviction that led us to publish this Review, namely, that not only is there a large number of Catholics eager for a periodical of its character, but also that there are comparatively few who cannot and who will not in good time prove their appreciation of its merit. Too often we underrate the intelligence and good will of our Catholic people. Because they may not subscribe in large numbers to some of our religious periodicals, we too easily conclude that they prefer frivolous or sensational secular publications. We fail to credit them with sufficient judgment to determine when a periodical really merits their support. Perhaps some would have them regard it as an obligation to support newspapers, just because they are named or published under religious auspices irrespective of their journalistic merit. The owners or editors cry out: support us so that we may have the means of improvement; the readers rejoin: make your paper worth while and you will compel our support. We believe the readers are right. They know what they want, although they may not be able to formulate it except in the indefinite phrase, "something better." The more minds appreciate truth the more they recognize genuine literary merit. The extraordinary support given by Catholics to "The Catholic Encyclopedia" is something unmatched in our publishers' annals. The enthusiasm with which AMERICA has been received should change forever the views of those who contend that Catholics will not support a high-class religious Review. They surely will support no other.

A New World's Holiday

Thanks to the Knights of Columbus and the Italians in our large cities, we appear to be on the way to having a New World's holiday. Columbus Day is sure to capture the hearts as well as the imagination of our people. Even New York City, sated as it had been for weeks before with the Hudson-Fulton festivities, was compelled to stand and gaze with admiration on the remarkable procession, chiefly of Italians, who marched for hours along its principal thoroughfare. The man who led the way to his new hemisphere fully deserves the tributes of commemoration which we are only beginning to pay him. Canada, Mexico, and every country in South America should join with us in making this day a New World's holiday. Indeed, if we consider that the Western World is now the home of all the races of the earth, this holiday would speedily be observed as a world's holiday, so universal are the interests it would commemorate. There could be no better means of establishing bonds of union between the peoples of North and South America than this common day of celebration. Not only of the man who blazed the way, but of the history of the settlement, civilization, development, and progress of America. We need by all means a day each year to impress on our minds the importance of mutual understanding and appreciation before we even open up trade or political relations as a means of proper communication of the best we have to give.

The Lack of Ministers

The Portland Oregonian took Bishop Atkins of the Methodist Church South to task recently. The Bishop, it seems, attributes the lack of ministers to commercialism: the Oregonian holds the Church machine to blame. Its theory is that many religiously inclined young men are kept out of the pulpit because they cannot subscribe to creeds they know to be historically, critically and scientifically indefensible. They must live, and so they turn away sadly to groceries and drygoods.

The Oregonian knows its young men. Its editor has gone along Front Street and First Street and marked in countinghouse, bank and warehouse the Church machine's victims who after spending a bright youth in convincing themselves of the incredulity of the creeds, now bend over ledgers or make up invoices with their hearts, like the dying gladiator's, far away in a Dacian land where one may be a preacher of the gospel without a gospel to preach. Many years have passed since we closed behind us the doors of a Portland bank to enter the nobler service of the Church. We believe that things are greatly changed in Portland; that business has gone far west of First Street. Certainly the religious views of the Oregonian are greatly changed, and the young men of Portland must be changed in still greater measure. The Oregonian is wrong. If young men want to preach not the Gospel but their own ideas, there is nothing to prevent them. The Bishop is not right. Young men do not enter the ministry, because they are irreligious. Their souls which Protestantism at its best kept hungry, are starved by reason of the meagre Christianity it has been giving them for a long time past.

An Archdeacon and Our Missions

The Archdeacon of Madras (Church of England) writes in The Guardian, mourning over the fact that the Catholic Indians outnumber those of his denomination more than three to one. He attributes it to the immense resources in money that the Roman Catholic community in India commands. The streams, he says, which flow from the treasuries of the Propaganda, the missionary associations of Paris and Milan, the Society of Jesus and several other orders, seem inexhaustible. The Archdeacon has investigated the matter or he has not. If he has not, he has no right to make any statement. If he has, it is wonderful how he could make such a statement. Let the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the Church Missionary Society and the other Church of England missionary organizations finance our missions for only five years, and we should show them something worth looking at. The archdeacon adds, that we take full advantage of our festal processions, which to the casual eye are indistinguishable from those of the heathen. It needs, he states, more than a passing glance to discriminate between Shiva and St. Anthony, as each is borne in his floral bower through the streets. The archdeacon's eye is very casual and his glance very passing; which may explain how he came to see the inexhaustible streams of money pouring into India from Catholic treasuries. One of his last remarks is that Catholics do little in medical missions. This gives food for reflection. After all the old methods of preaching the gospel seem more fruitful than the new.

Depopulation in Civilized Countries

La Civiltà Cattolica concludes in its number of September 18, an exhaustive study of "Progressive Depopulation in Civilized Countries." Beginning in France, where its marked presence first attracted the attention of sociologists and caused genuine alarm, it has crossed the channel to England and has invaded the eastern portion of the United States.

After discussing the matter in all its various phases, the writer is forced to conclude with a celebrated Frenchman that France is suffering from progressive depopulation because so the people will. There is no better, in fact no other reason.

The traditional conservatism of England has prevented a more rapid decline in the birth-rate, but the decline is there and promises to become more pronounced.

In the United States the conditions are so unique that it cannot be fairly compared on an even footing with any other great country. Everything is so recent and so full of youthful energy that tradition has hardly a foothold and the days of yore are yesterday. Yet here the birth-rate is not kept up by the descendants of the early Puritan colonists of New England.

France was the first country to put into practice the principles of anti-Christian "laicism," as the theory of the exclusion of religion from everyday life is euphemistically called. Why should not France be the first to see and suffer from its deplorable effects?

J. Bertillon makes proposals so extraordinary that he plainly considers the ailment difficult to cure. Among his suggested measures are: Release from taxes in proportion to the number of children in the family; the exemption of married men from actual service in the barracks; absorption by the State of a part of the inheritance if the father does not leave at least three children; old age pensions for parents of numerous offspring; relaxation of the rigid laws governing testamentary provisions; preference for large families in conferring public offices and emoluments.

Prof. Richet, of the Academy of Medicine, advocates pecuniary awards, as $100 at the birth of the second child, and $200 at the birth of each succeeding child. The fund for these awards should be gathered from the inheritances of collateral heirs and only children of testators.

Other thinkers propose other expedients. But, as La Civiltà remarks, some of these suggestions are of secondary importance, while others, if seriously proposed for adoption, would be rejected because public opinion is against them. In a word, the French know that their country is being depopulated and they are satisfied, because they will it. The canker is deep and dangerous. Let other nations learn from the decadence of France.

The Lying About Barcelona

The Barcelona correspondent of the London Times, writing September 25, rebukes those journals that report a so-called reign of terror in that city, announcing that the jails are crowded with prisoners and that court-martials and wholesale executions are of almost daily occurrence. He reports everything quiet, business going on as usual, people flocking into the city to celebrate its patronal feast of Our Lady of Mercy, a large number of tourists, and an Esperanto Congress during the first week of September attended by 1,200 foreigners. He adds that the number of prisoners taken during the riots did not exceed 1,500. Of these many were liberated without indictment, and less than 1,200 are in prison serving sentences or awaiting trial. Only three have been executed. Martial law has been removed, and prisoners are brought before a regular military tribunal. The Government report on the riots agrees with the general opinion in Barcelona in stating that the originating strike was arranged by the Workingmen's Union in touch with the International Federation of Labor, assisted by a professional Anarchist and the hangers-on of a certain Catalan political party. When matters became serious hordes of bandits came into the city and took the management into their own hands. No genuine workman has been detected leading the attacks on churches or convents or erecting barricades. The correspondent at Madrid had an interview with the Minister of the Interior concerning the agitation in the foreign press on behalf of Señor Ferrer. The Minister said that the law provided the tribunals for crimes according to the nature of these, and that it was out of his power to transfer Ferrer's case from the military tribunal to a civil. The impartiality of the former, he continued, had never been questioned. The correspondent gives it as his own opinion that the agitation is the result of the rage and the fright of the Anarchistic organizations throughout Europe, caused by the light that recent events at Barcelona have thrown upon their doings.

The White Sister

We are astonished to see in a local Catholic weekly an advertisement of The White Sister, a dramatization of the late Marion F. Crawford's novel of that title. Our astonishment grows on reading the additional recommendation that "Every Catholic Should See" the play.

The story itself is one we would be slow to recommend to Catholic readers, nor does the literary merit lend a saving grace to the unfortunate choice and treatment of the subject. A nun's smouldering love for an Italian officer and the officer's uncontrolled passion for the nun which leads him to extravagances that ill become a Christian knight, a picture of convent life which tends to confirm the all-too-prevalent notion that a nunnery is an abode mainly for disappointed or heart-broken lovers, are themes which, however well dramatized or attractively presented, are neither elevating nor instructive, far less are they worthy of the patronage of Catholics. A chapter of the romance discloses the White Sister enticed from her convent on the plea of a sick call and led away at dusk to a room where she is entrapped by her quondam suitor and threatened with the loss of her reputation unless she renounces her high calling and becomes his wife. The picture is highly melodramatic and salacious, but should a play in which such scenes recur be deemed of especial interest or utility for Catholics? It would be an insult to ask the question seriously. We should be only too happy to acquit the editor referred to of any intention of recommending what he knew would lessen the lofty ideals which should be entertained of religious life or tend to diminish the feelings of respect which Catholics rightly cherish for the noble women who give their whole heart and the best that is in them to God's service. Protests, however, against the downward tendency of the stage will be ineffectual so long as Catholics and more particularly editors, whom Catholics look to for guidance, in such matters of public interest and importance, fail to exercise ordinary discretion and give indiscriminate endorsement to any play that has a Catholic name to it.

For Binding America

All concerned, not, however, the advertiser so much as the reader, and especially the reader who wishes to save his AMERICA by binding it, have requested us repeatedly to publish this Review as it appears in this issue with the text-pages folded within the advertiser, so that this latter may serve as a protective cover, and the text pages may not be so easily soiled or broken. It happened that on four pages, in as many numbers, in the first volume, advertisements appeared with the text. We have had these four pages reset, so that instead of containing display advertisements they now have only a neat list of those who had advertised in the numbers prior to the issue of each of these numbers. These pages we shall supply to all who wish to bind AMERICA. The names of the advertisers will also appear in the index. We shall thus have a valuable record of the business firms and academic institutions, whose managers recognized in this Review a most valuable medium for advertising, and they afford us an unusual opportunity of showing how we regard the information contained in the advertising pages as valuable in its way as the contents of the periodical proper. We hope to issue the index with our next number.

DRAMATIC IDEALS OF EDMOND ROSTAND.

In reviewing the work of Edmond Rostand, it will not be unfair to use a standard which he himself laid down on the occasion of his reception into the French Academy. His predecessor had been Henri de Bornier, the author of that noble play, "La Fille de Roland," in which throbbed the soul of French chivalry, and written in an hour of national disaster for the strengthening of hearts. It was natural that the new Academician should discuss the theatre. In doing so, he said: "We need a theatre where, lifting the spectator on the wings of lyric song, refining him with beauty's noblest forms, consoling him with delicacy and grace, our poets, without directly aiming at it, teach a lesson to heart and soul." Has the author of l'Aiglon reached his ideal?

In many respects Edmond Rostand is well equipped for his task. He comes from the South, and the South ever puts the wine-cup of impassioned song to the lips of her favorite sons. His family boasts of a French Marshal, Count Gérard, one of the protagonists of the Napoleonic epic. We need not wonder, then, that a material spirit flashes out in the lines of Sergeant Flambeau which sets the pulses fluttering as at the echo of the battle-drums of Jena or the trumpets of Austerlitz. He has the lyric swing and surge. He has feeling, so vehement and imperious that it is not always under the bit and bridle of restraint. He has movement, power; but spendthrift of his resources, he squanders them as recklessly as Mélinde in "La Princesse Lointaine," scatters the rubies and beryls of her jewelled robes to the seamen who have piloted Joffroy Rudel to Tripoli. Like some of the Elizabethan dramatists, whom he resembles in bubbling life, in splendor of diction, like Massinger, Webster, Ford, he lacks dramatic self-control. He has not that wise-browed economy of forces, high privilege of the demi-gods of song. His many-stringed lyre stirs too often, not the depth but only the tumult of the soul. So crowded is his stage in "Cyrano," for instance, with cooks and crooks, with marquises and burglars and troopers, with fiddlers and flower-girls, with pikemen and pages, with musketeers and monks, there is such a riot of tragedy and comedy, the grand so democratically elbows the grotesque that we miss in the personages and the plot that perspective and relief which dramatic values require.

In writing "La Samaritaine" the poet blundered. We do not question his motives. In telling the story of the Woman of Samaria, he meant well. He meant, we believe, to do homage to the Saviour of the World. Had he exercised better judgment, penetrated himself more deeply with the simplicity and sublimity of the Gospel narrative, he might not have altogether failed. But his conception of Christ is commonplace. A Jewish fop struts upon the stage. It is not a Prophet, not the Messiah, it is not the Son of God. Many of the verses on the lips of the Virgin's Son are ridiculous, grotesque, some positively shocking. The Apostles are coarse fanatics, with scarcely a touch of dignity to redeem them. The Samaritan Woman of the Gospel is an inspired picture; Photine is a caricature.

"Les Romanesques," with its Watteau-like bloom, its Sylvestre and Percinet, its park and moss-grown wall, suited our poet better. But it was a prelude only. With "La Princesse Lointaine" Mr. Rostand outlines his ideals more clearly. The play, says M. de Vogüé, contains the germ of his whole work. "Joffroy Rudel, Bertrand d'Allamanon will later on be called Cyrano, Séraphin Flambeau. They will always be the same man, the hero in love with a superhuman ideal . . . supreme beauty wedded to supreme merit in the virtue of sacrifice."

Les Romanesques, Comédie En Trois Actes, En Vers.—La Samaritaine, Evangile En Trois Tableaux, En Vers.—La Princesse Lointaine, Pièce en Quatre Actes En Vers.—Cyrano de Bergerac, Comédie Héroïque En Cinq Actes, En Vers.—L'Aiglon, Drame en Six Actes, En Vers. Paris: Eugène Fasquelle, Editeur, 11 Rue de Grenelle.

In "l'Aiglon" and "Cyrano" Mr. Rostand tried to remain faithful to his canons of dramatic art. At first sight, "l'Aiglon" appears to be an undramatic theme. The life of Napoleon II spells almost total failure, and such failure the drama will not tolerate. Again and again the Eagle's brood attempts to fly, only to sink fluttering to the ground. At last when at Wagram the Eaglet tries to escape where once the Eagle screamed, when he realized that hopeless failure now faces him, then, in defeat, he triumphs. Then "l'Aiglon" accepts a slow, unhonored, almost ignominious death in expiation for the blood his father shed. The Eagle was chained to the rock of St. Helena; the Eaglet will fret its young life away behind the gilded bars of its cage at Schönbrunn. Edmond Rostand has written nothing finer than the monologue in which the sacrifice is made.

Flambeau's light-hearted heroism also, his reckless loyalty to a Lost Cause, his luxury of daring, as in the enemy's halls, and clad in the grenadier's uniform, once bronzed by the suns of Spain or frosted by Russia's snows, he stealthily mounts guard over the slumbers of Napoleon's son as formerly over the sleep of the sire; his answer to Marmont, his wooden soldiers in which the Emperor's legions live again—all that wins our admiration. Not so his suicide; it is an anti-climax; not so one or two passages, where the psychological and moral purpose may be good, but the crudities too glaring.

The triumph of failure is the theme of "l'Aiglon;" it recurs in "Cyrano." Of Mr. Rostand's dramas "Cyrano de Bergerac" is perhaps the best known. Its kaleidoscopic changes, its rollicking fun, its pathos; the character of the peppery and pugnacious Cyrano, hero, swashbuckler, buffoon, Hudibras, Falstaff, Zagloba, rolled into one, his monumental nose, his hot head but warm heart, form an original and startling combination. We love the hero when, as magnanimous as Massinger's Adorni, with lips drawn tight, chivalrously loyal to his rival and friend, he renounces the dream of his life, gives up Roxane and carries his secret to the grave. Cyrano conquers himself: that is better than his tilting with a hundred desperadoes. We do not admire in this madcap his pride, his self-will, but his sense of honor, justice, fair play. We wear him in our heart's core because, though poor, he will not

" . . . crook the pregnant hinges of the knee
Where thrift may follow fawning."

Failure overtakes him, but under "the bludgeonings of chance," "the whips and scorns of time," he has not cringed or whined; and he dies standing, sword in hand, raining a Titan's blows on his old enemies, Hypocrisy, Deceit, Treachery still trooping around him in his death-dreams.

Edmond Rostand has sincerely tried "to teach a lesson to heart and soul." We could wish that he had surveyed life from a still higher plane. He has, however, appealed to the ideal in a materialistic, unbelieving age. His success with the public proves that the nobler feelings of the heart have not been entirely stifled in the race for pleasure and wealth. The human soul, like some silent, mouldering harp, ever thrills to the beautiful and the true, under the hand of the minstrel who can wake it from its slumbers.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S. J.

LITERATURE

The Necromancers. By ROBERT HUGH BENSON. St. Louis, Mo.: B. Herder. Price, $1.50.

Lovers of the weird will here have their fill. With quickening pulse and nerves atingle the reader speeds from scene to scene until the climax comes with an almost thunderous crash. Many of us have met Laurence Baxter. Emotional, swayed by the senses, a stranger to calm and deliberate judgment, he has felt a sentimental interest in religion, and in a burst of impetuosity has plunged into the Church. He knows too much to be no Catholic, and he knows too little to be a good Catholic. His religious raiment does not fit. Such Catholics may move quite steadily along a smoothly paved way, but if they meet an obstacle they will stumble, and on a downward slope they will slip. A poorly balanced head holds out scant hope for deep-seated piety or solid religious progress. Externals are not religion: they are the frame of the picture. Frothy gush is not piety: it lacks body and staying qualities.

On losing his betrothed by death, Laurence is brought face to face with his first great sorrow. Spiritism occurs to him as the one way to assuage his grief. He does some clever hair-splitting, acts as counsel, judge and jury in the case, and decides in favor of the course upon which he was already implicitly determined. Saul had stood head and shoulders above the fighting men of Israel; he grovelled before a hag. Mrs. Stapleton, too, is a familiar acquaintance. Shallow-pated and enthusiastic, she has been transported from the flesh to the volume without rumpling a ruffle or disarranging her Marcel wave. Fluttering from fad to fad, she is the embodiment of the worldly woman to whom deep feeling is an unknown quantity and serious thought a practical impossibility. She does her full share of mischief, as any Mrs. Stapleton is bound to do. Mrs. Baxter, Laurence's mother, is an amiable nonentity, photographed from life. The courage, loyalty and self-immolation of Maggie, whose Catholic sense guides and impels her in rescuing Laurence, are brought out with delicate sympathy. Mr. Cathcart, the converted spiritist, is less self-consistent and therefore less satisfactory. A masterly touch insinuates the instinctive apprehension and dread of diabolical power which may manifest itself among the members of the brute creation.

The book brings out, and none too strongly, the treason to God that objectively exists in frequenting spiritualistic circles, with their "spirit messages" and "silver offerings" and all the rest. Father Benson is not didactic, that is, he does not lay down a formal proposition and then proceed to its orderly demonstration, yet every page drives home a lesson.

Mentally purblind is the reader who cannot see that the first commandment must be legislated out of existence before a Catholic may with a safe conscience take part in a spiritualistic séance. That séance is as truly a non-Catholic religious exercise as if it were the Friday service in a Mohammedan mosque. The lesson is for those who would patronize a spirit medium as they "patronize" God: they pull Him down below the least of His servants.

D. P. S.

Stradella. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $1.50.

This is the second posthumous novel of the late Mr. Crawford, and, presumably, the last. And because it is the last of a long series of works of fiction, written by a busy hand that is now at rest, it is hard to write about it dispassionately. It has all the story-teller's magic which its author was hardly ever at a loss to exercise. Its melodrama is saved from cheapness by a rich garnishment of learning and gentle speech. Its pictures of Rome during the early eighteenth century have value as the work of one who knew his Rome well. But when we have said this, we have come to our limits of praise.

Mr. Crawford was a Catholic and he was never at pains to conceal the fact in his writings. But it is a problem which kept teasing us during the perusal of "Stradella," whether his stories of Roman life have been of the least service to the Church which received his homage. Mr. Crawford had certain melodramatic instincts as a novelist, which appeared to be at ease only in the conflict of hot passions, of love, hatred, vengeance and all the other primitive and exaggerated emotions that mark life at fever heat and under extraordinary stress. The consequence is that, after a course of Crawford fiction, the reader is inclined to believe that Italian life is a fearful mixture of treachery, vindictiveness, superstition, hypocrisy and devious indirection. Since the Italians so described are all Catholics—at least in name—the picture does not make the Church attractive.

Surely there are very many Italian prelates who are not first and last and always cunning politicians; Italian men and women, whose faith is reasonable and clear of superstitions, and whose simple honesty need not take refuge in deceptions; Italian youths and maidens, who are quite as sensible as others and who can just as effectively subordinate the emotions to the ordinary checks of law and common sense. But you would never think so from "Stradella" and other novels by the same hand. Is this exaggeration of the unusual one of the exigencies of a thrilling novel? It certainly is not the characteristic of a great novelist.

Studies in Irving. Part First; Rip Van Winkle and The Voyage. By ROBERT A. RYAN, S.J., St. Louis University. New York: Schwartz, Kerwin & Fauss.

This little text-book for young students in English will be welcomed by all teachers who find their ingenuity taxed to combine definiteness of instruction with stimulation of the growing imagination. The "studies," very interesting in themselves, are interspersed with delightful and simple gems of classic English poetry, not unlike a mountain road that struggles now and then into a commanding and exhilarating view of broad landscapes.

The Sense of the Infinite. By OSCAR KUHN. New York: Henry Holt & Company.

We call attention to this work, not because of its intrinsic value, or its interest to Catholics, but rather to point a moral; for it is a type of many of the books that are appearing to-day, and combines much of the current literature's best and worst features. It is written in good style and, in spite of its not being a real contribution to the literature of the subject it treats, has a certain originality of its own. The book's best feature, however, is its plea for the reality of a higher world than that of matter, and for the possibility of rising more and more above the sordid cares of earth to a life of spiritual perceptions and aspirations. Yearnings for what is noblest and best are shown to have filled the hearts of the great men of all ages, men who have caught at least passing glimpses of infinite beauty and truth, and whose mission it has been to turn men's thoughts to things celestial. The author has long and reverently studied 'the noble living and the noble dead,' and has found in their moods of "spiritual exaltation," at least in the field of art, literature and religion, a something that he calls "a sense of the infinite," of whose existence he is profoundly convinced, as to whose continuance he is both hopeful and solicitous.

The author has given us some beautiful quotations from the poets of many lands, to prove how real is the sense of the infinite: we wish he had not ventured out of his own province, for he is a man of letters. Unfortunately, however, he has got into the fields of abstract thought. It is true that, in his introduction, he professes his intention of keeping clear of philosophical and theological discussions, and that, in the main he holds to his purpose; but he has given an altogether inadequate treatment of the views of the men whose doctrine he sets forth. This is especially true of Dante, to whom he is so ardently devoted. One carries away from the book the impression that Dante was a Monist. This is utterly untrue. He seems to see no difficulty in combining the contradictory religious tents of Paganism, Rationalistic Atheism and Christianity. He does not hesitate to identify three things of very different character: poetic emotion, religious enthusiasm, and the real mystical states which unite the souls of the saints with God. He draws no line of distinction between the orthodox Catholic doctrines of St. Thomas, St. Bonaventure and St. Bernard on the one hand, and the early pantheistic theories of Plotinus and the Neo-Platonists and the later mystical theosophy of Weigel and Boehme on the other. Monism and Dualism are treated as two manifestations or phases of a "sense of the infinite" that is one and the same in essence. The result is that, on putting down the book, one is apt to retain as his final impression—indeed the author puts the thought before us in his closing chapter—that Plato, St. Augustine, St. Bernard, Shelley and Wordsworth are torchbearers who have handed on from age to age the same lamp of truth. There is throughout the volume a minimizing of the differences between Pagan and Christian beliefs, and the author professes to have found "at the root of art, literature and religion" "an essential unity of experience." Pantheism's attitude toward the Absolute is represented as being the same as Theism's attitude towards the personal God; and the rhapsody of a Walt Whitman over the charms of beautiful earth is the product of the same sense as gives rise to the saints' ecstasies of divine love. And all this—herein lies its greatest danger—is hinted at rather than stated. There is no vulgar discussion, the impression is allowed to grow and develop of itself—we do not say by wilful misrepresentation, for the author is not sure of his ground, since he tells us in his preface: "I have sought to convince myself; to convince others is of secondary importance to me."

Christians cannot on the whole but be offended at finding the inspired words of the Psalmist put on the same level as those of Emerson, and Catholics cannot but be indignant at finding the worship of the Blessed Virgin compared with the cult of Venus and Athena. Nor will they admit Harnack as a final authority on the character of St. Augustine and on the tendencies of medieval Catholic mysticism; still less will they admit St. John's Gospel to be the vague, indefinite contemplation of a mystic, or that the "heart religion," "the Christo-centric religion," is the product of these later centuries.

JOHN H. FISHER, S.J.

Where the Fishers Go. The Story of Labrador. By Rev. P. W. BROWNE. New York: Cochrane Publishing Co.

Father Browne describes his book as "merely a little literary fabric woven from facts and experiences, during the leisure moments of a busy ministerial life." Literary it is, indeed, with its spicy flavor of Latin, French and English classics, but it is much more: it is an interesting guide to the history and present condition of a country that is comparatively little known. Check by jowl with racy anecdotes we have the latest government statistics of the trade in that vast region, and we are surprised to find that the annual value of the Labrador fisheries is nearly three million dollars.

The history goes back to the discovery of Helluland by Leif the Lucky, son of Eric the Red, in the year 1000.

Father Browne makes bold to point out the very spot, a place now called Domino, where Leif must have made his first land-fall, and he thinks, with the Catholic Encyclopedia (Vol. I, p. 419), to which he refers, that Vinland is Nova Scotia and not Rhode Island. In his retrospective view he devotes an informing chapter to the Hudson's Bay Company, and speaks of the great company's chief post at Rigolette, in Hamilton Inlet, "famous among other things as being the place where Lord Strathcona, the world-known philanthropist and man of affairs, began his commercial career." When describing missionary efforts, the author gives us the history and present status of the important Moravian settlement in Labrador. He bestows well-deserved praise on the heroic Oblate missionaries, especially on Father Lacasse, still very much alive in Manitoba, who "is, with the exception of the Hudson's Bay Company's agents, the only white man who has ever crossed the Labrador peninsula. He made two journeys between 1875 and 1880, and the diary of these missionary expeditions is the only accurate account we possess of the great hinterland."

Perhaps what will interest the casual reader most keenly is the narrative of Father Browne's own missionary journeys by sea and land, his sympathetic chapter on the now celebrated Dr. Grenfell, superintendent of the Royal Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen, his descriptions of the hunter's paradise, the elusive but multitudinous caribou, the reindeer imported from Lapland and now multiplying in Labrador, the once plentiful but long since extinct Great Auk, the marvelous mail officer of the Labrador service, and the ignorant schoolmaster's astonishing French letter of application. Appropos of French, in a future edition, which the work is sure to have, it would be well to lop off the redundant termination in oisiveté (p. 116). The book is well printed and profusely illustrated, the alphabetical index is good, and the cover is a thoroughly suggestive one. "Where the Fishers Go" should have an especially good sale in the Christmas season.

The Score. By LUCAS MALET (Mrs. Mary St. Leger Harrison). New York: E. P. Dutton & Company.

Under this general title we have two stories, "Out in the Open" and "Miserere Nobis." The significance of the general title is too elusive for us to grasp; and therefore we are tempted to admire it. Neither of the stories is pleasant. The novelist's skill is there, the knowledge of the world, the sense of beauty and of literary style, and an easy command of language. But why must these be instruments to picture things which we regret and shrink from in the reality? Is life devoid of all interest and excitement except where it runs turbid with foul passions?

Reviews and Magazines

The Irish Monthly for October, as usual, is filled with dainty little things almost too simple and exquisite for description. "Daddy" is a happy sketch of the late Father Richard, the well-beloved Glasgow priest. "A Widow's Mite," by M. J. Kehoe, is a short story that merits a long life. It has that quality peculiar to the Irish writer whose pen is trained to do justice to his heart. "The Glorious Girl," by Katherine Tynan, pays sweet tribute to the late Evelyn Nichols. What is the charm of the Irish Monthly owing to? Is it the unflinching literary form of its articles, or the gentle tolerance of the spirit brooding over its pages—or both? It seems to us the Irish Monthly is the only magazine in the English language which has consistently for many years encouraged the writing of poetry. This has required courage and confidence and unselfishness on the part of its editor, and it is a pleasure to note that he has not been disappointed. Some of the sweetest singers among the latest generation of poets first felt their own power in the pages of the Irish Monthly.

The Ave Maria for October 9 opens with an article by the Countess De Courson, vividly descriptive of the famous "Train Blanc" to Lourdes.—Rev. R. O'Kennedy concludes his appreciative sketch of Sir Stephen de Vere, the translator of Horace and brother of Aubrey de Vere. Sir Stephen directed in his will that his remains be buried in the Catholic churchyard at Foynes, and that the funeral shall be as inexpensive as possible. "Let me be buried in a plain deal coffin, without any inscriptions except my name and age and birth and death, and no monument except a plain horizontal slab."—Several noteworthy publications of recent date are reviewed in this number.

An interesting series of articles on Father Gerard Hopkins, S.J., came to a conclusion in the September number of the Month. Father Hopkins was an English Jesuit, who died in 1889. He numbered among his friends and the admirers of his literary talents, especially in poetry, such men as Walter Pater, Robert Bridges, Edmund Gosse and Coventry Patmore. The strange feature in his career as a poet is the fact that very little of his verse has ever been published. Much of it never passed beyond the manuscript stage, in which form it was passed about among his acquaintances, and what did see the light is scattered through various anthologies. We agree with the writer of the articles, Father Joseph Keating, that "in view of the impression which they made on men themselves of such ability, it would be sad if his poems were finally left in obscurity."

In the October Catholic World Father Cuthbert, O.S.F.C., proves that St. Francis of Assisi, far from being socialistic, in the modern sense, appealed to the rich and powerful to give the poor their due—not to the poor to claim it; and also that love was his only remedy for injustice.—C. B. Walker shows that the Missal and the Breviary, though "forgotten," are the best books of devotion.—Wilfrid Wilberforce gives more space to the mutual relations of Carlyle and Froude than they merit from Catholics, but atones for it by refuting the aspersions on Blessed Campion, by Froude's biographer, Herbert Paul.—Dr. O'Donovan closes the door against the ordination of married ministers by demonstrating that such a condition was abhorrent to the church generally from the earliest times; and Father Mercier, O.P., explains very clearly that professors or magazine writers who consider "Catholicism in the crucible," do not understand Catholic principles, and that the Church has long anticipated whatever there is of good in their pronouncements.—Two short stories "For Sport" and "The White Gift," a tale of exceptional power, are contributed by Jeanie Drake and Catalina Faes.—Katharine Tynan begins a serial, "Her Mother's Daughter," both of whom impress one at first sight, and will, no doubt, become still more interesting. The critical and editorial departments are up to the usual high standard.

The American Catholic Quarterly Review for July has a number of solid and interesting articles. The historical ones, "Fifty Years of Italian Unity," "The Last Empress of the French," "Pius VII and the French Revolution," are well worth reading. Those treating "Anarchism in India" and "The Situation in Spain," give useful information to those who do not wish to be led blindfold by the daily papers. "The Eschatology of the Poets" and "The Blind Virgin in the York Cycle of Mystery Plays," are decidedly readable, while "The Sources and Destiny of the Oxford Movement" and "The Christ of History and the Christ of Faith" round out a well-proportioned program.

The October New Ireland Review opens with a plea for Sir Horace Plunket's industrial plans, and for "Self-help" alone, as against Parliamentarianism and the agricultural schemes of the new Land Bill. The author protests his disinterestedness, but signs himself "X." His argument is met by an editorial remark on "The Tricks of the Treasury," by William Field, M.P.: "The prosperity of Ireland depends, first, on the industrial character of the people; second, on the facilities afforded by the government. * * * The most highly endowed people industrially can never attain prosperity under a government that appropriates an undue share of the fruits of their industry."—Connor Maguire performs the feat of rendering Shelley's "Cloud," which had not been hitherto translated metrically in any language, into Gaelic verse of the same metre, but richer in rhyme and melody.—Father Fullerton adds another helpful chapter to his "Social Problem" series, and W. J. Purcell contributes a clever and amusing sketch of the Sunday "Stump Orator" in London Hyde Park, where even Catholics take the stump when their religion is attacked by anti-Roman Kensittites. Other "Orators" are the manly "suffragette," the original Free Trader, and the Protectionist, who would trade "Henglish manufactures for Haus-tralian 'am hand heggs."—The editor has discovered "a genuine Irish poet" in Mrs. Helen Langdon, and his judgment seems justified by the specimens he cites from her "Hill of Dreams." A favorable review of Sir William Butler's "The Light of the West," completes a strong number.

The current Ecclesiastical Review is an excellent number. Father Martin, S.J., continues his exposition of the "Scope and Character of the New Apostolic Constitution of the Roman Curia; an English Benedictine explains the metrical forms and rhythmical cadences in the "Collects of the Roman Office," and Father Brucker, S.J., takes advantage of the recent decree of Pius X. indulging the new Litany of St. Joseph, to describe its nature and urge its claims on our devotions. There are two articles on Theosophy, an informing criticism of "Theosophy and Christianity" by Rev. E. R. Hull, S.J., and an interesting sketch of modern theosophic fads by Dr. Dever of Overbrook, following the lines of Father Busnelli's Manual of Theosophy. Avowedly masonic in its origin and affiliations, theosophy has scraped together philosophic odds and ends from sects and systems the world over but preferably from the Himalayan heights, and, like Christian Science, female prophets are its oracles; but "a Church that could produce a St. Francis and St. Theresa, does not need the inspiration of a Blavatsky or a Besant." We would call special attention to T. A. Walsh's remarkable article on "Race Suicide in France."

The latest issue of the Princeton Theological Review is taken up almost entirely with a statement of "Calvin's Doctrine of the Trinity." Although Calvin was most probably heretical on this, as on other points, it would not be amiss if his followers would hold more closely than they do to their master's teaching. They would thus save themselves from still further lapses from the doctrines of Christianity,

SOCIOLOGY

The Board of Inspectors of the Philadelphia County Prison are ignoring the law which permits official visitors of Catholic and Protestant organizations to visit prisoners in their cells. The law granting this concession was passed by the last Legislature and approved by Governor Stuart, on May 14, 1909; it specifically gives permission to official visitors to call at prisons every day, including Sunday, between the hours of 9 a. m. and 5 p. m., and enter the cell or apartment of the prisoner. The privilege is granted at the Eastern Penitentiary, but steadfastly refused at Moyamensing and Holmesburg. At the Moyamensing penitentiary prisoners may be brought out of their cells or taken to a room in the warden's house, but the members of the American Society for Visiting Catholic Prisoners demand the full enjoyment of the concessions granted them under the law. No explanation of this action is given by the prison officials.

Mr. James A. Flaherty, vice-president of the American Society for Visiting Catholic Prisoners, is in favor of appealing to the courts. "The law is being disregarded," said Mr. Flaherty, "and in order to make our protest stronger I would like to see all organizations which hold charters to work in the prisons cooperate in an effort to force the Board of Inspectors to obey the law.

"Visiting prisoners in their cells does an incalculable amount of good. All who have had experience in prison work understand this. Our organization is doing a splendid work at the Eastern Penitentiary, and under the new law there is no reason why we should be denied the same privilege at Moyamensing."

The Rev. J. F. Ohl, superintendent of the Lutheran City Mission, and the Rev. Dr. Herman L. Duhring, superintendent of the Episcopal City Mission, are equally emphatic in their condemnation of the prison officials.

Señora Angela Oliveira César de Costa, who, it will be remembered, secured the erection of a monument to Christ the Redeemer as a pledge of peace between Argentina and Chile, recently visited the Palace of Peace at The Hague. It there occurred to her that an edifice dedicated to the preservation of amicable relations among the governments of the world, might very appropriately have such a symbol in its halls, and upon her return to Buenos Aires, she laid the matter before the minister of foreign affairs, Dr. Plaza. So pleased was he with her suggestion that the Argentine government, it is said, will provide a replica of the "Christ of the Andes" for The Hague tribunal.

EDUCATION

The new Socialism of the German Empire, if so we may designate the old gospel of Marx, Engels and Lasalle, in the use made of it by Kautsky and other present-day leaders of the party, gives a first place in its program and propaganda to the winning of the country's youth to the ideals and education of the party. At the recent Leipsic "party" day this question received careful attention. Hold the youth, have the future, is becoming the watchword of German Socialism. A single year back at the Nurnberg party day, provision was made which obliges the organization to give the children education in the life-outlook of the proletariat in October of the same year, a commission appointed by the party met with the "Gewerbschaften" committee, and the result was a circular letter indicating the ways and means in regard to the Nurnberg resolutions.

What fruits this movement produced may be briefly stated. We note a Central Bureau charged with the care of the party's working youth throughout the country. According to Secretary Ebert of Leipzig 300 branch bureaus have been established. In one-half year's time thirty-six homes for young people have been equipped. In all but two of these, a special library has been provided. Further evidences of activity are instanced in 327 addresses held specially for the youth, thirty serial lecture courses, sixty-seven art and industry exhibitions, and 500 outings. The Arbeitsjugend claims 3200 regular readers, if we may rely upon the printed figures.

German Catholic organization is indeed efficient and to be commended, yet it has before it no easy field of progress. The case would seem to be organization against organization. In the battle for faith with fatherland we note one point of weakness: the fact that German higher educational institutions are under rigorous supervision by the State, which jealously oversees even the merest minutiae of the curriculum. Sound scholastic philosophy must battle even for the right to exist. On the other hand an easy transition from Feuerbach or even Kant to philosophic materialism and subjective morality, leaves the way bridged to a political economy poisoned by a false conception of the relations of capital and labor, and a social polity whose soil is fertile for ideas of a "future better social order," of which the distinctive mark is to be exaltation of the proletariat to the heart's content of dreamers of social dreams. Abrogation of all private corporate productive enterprise is, of course, a corollary. Austria holds ground largely because of the hands that direct and order her higher education; in that direction German Catholics can learn a lesson.

On October 8, Jacob G. Schurman, president of Cornell University, addressed the National Association of State Universities at Boston. He advocated the independence of State universities, and resented the idea of any interference from outside—from either Church or State. "The professor," he said, "must be left to follow the dictates of reason, * * * even though his conclusions are at variance with the beliefs (or prejudices) which the mass of mankind regards as fundamental truth." This sentence is ridiculous, of course, unless by "the dictates of reason," President Schurman means "the dictates of the professor's reason." The president did not put it so explicitly, because it would not sound well. Exactitude of phrasing is an excellent mind-clearer.

President Schurman, in the course of the same address, finds fault with all American schools, colleges and universities "for the atrocious intellectual slovenliness, inaccuracy and vagueness which to-day characterize the pupils of those institutions.

The New Orleans Institute of Catholic Teachers opened its third session in the Jesuits' Alumni Hall, October 2. Archbishop Blenk, who presided, imparted the Benediction of his Holiness Pius X. to the representatives of the teaching congregation and other Catholic educators who filled the hall, and to all the members of the Institute. Father Kavanaugh, the Superintendent, reported that 15,000 children were now attending the parochial schools of the city—an increase of 2,000 over the preceding year. This means a saving to the city of $400,000—a fact which made the imposition of a per capita tax on water and other taxation a crying injustice. The Institute had effected an improvement in school equipment and adopted provisionally a uniform system of text-books. After a year's trial the system, with whatever practical modifications may be agreed upon, will be made permanent. The whole curriculum, together with the lecture course that has been established in connection therewith, has been devised on Catholic educational lines, and there has been no attempt to follow a public school system. The School Board Committee consists of: Archbishop Blenk, president; Prof. Hynes, secretary; Rev. G. Hild, C.S.S.R.; Rev. T. J. Welton, C.M.; Rev. J. O'Shanahan, S.J.

President Lowell of Harvard declared, in the course of his inaugural address last week that "the most painful defect in the American college at present is the lack of esteem for excellence in scholarship."

PERSONAL

The will of Bridget Fay, wife of John Fay, of Chelsea, Mass., gives $41,000 in bequests to various Catholic institutions. Mrs. Fay was 86 years of age, and as she was unable to write, made her mark, which was duly witnessed. To her husband she leaves $7,000 and her homestead in Chelsea. The residuary legatee is the Monastery of the Precious Blood, St. Hyacinth, Canada. To a large number of institutions she leaves $1,000 each.

Commenting editorially on the success of the Hudson-Fulton celebration, the New York Times says: "A great deal of credit for this success belongs to Mr. Herman Ridder. If the idea of the joint celebration of the anniversary of the discovery of the Hudson and the application of steam to river navigation did not wholly originate with him, his has been the guiding spirit in the matter from first to last. His energy and boundless enthusiasm have been felt throughout the preparations, and the triumph of the festival is in a measure a personal triumph for Mr. Ridder."

"Veritas," in the Standard and Times, of Philadelphia, vouches for the accuracy of the following statement regarding F. Marion Crawford's conversion to Catholicity: "While in India the distinguished novelist began to study Buddhism, and one day, in the middle of his study, he grew convinced that he had at length found the true church—and that was the Catholic Church. That same evening found him with the Jesuit fathers commencing a ten days' retreat, according to the method prescribed by St. Ignatius."

The fortieth anniversary of the ordination of the Rt. Rev. Eugene A. Garvey, D. D., Bishop of Altoona, was observed with imposing services in the pro-Cathedral of the episcopal city on September 29. Solemn Pontifical Mass was celebrated by Bishop Garvey, in the presence of His Grace, Archbishop Ryan, of Philadelphia, and more than fifty priests.

Upon the death of Don Carlos, claimant to the throne of Spain, some uneasiness was felt over the stand that his son and heir, Don Jaime, might take, especially in view of the rumors of disturbed political conditions in the peninsula. Those who feared that he might assert his claims by an appeal to the "last argument of kings," and thus complicate the situation, have read with much satisfaction a letter from him which has appeared in the Neue Freie Presse, of Vienna: "Precisely because I know the horrors of war," he writes, "I will never take upon myself the responsibility of exposing my people to such horrors. If I were to return to Spain at the head of an army, it would be to restore tranquillity, not to destroy it." While charging the Spanish government with weakness, "such as was that of the government of Louis XVI," he asks why history should prove so indifferent a teacher, and concludes with the declaration that his highest aspiration is for the happiness of Spain.

The late Dr. R. D. Spalding of Atlanta, Ga., willed $10,000 to establish a school in the Sacred Heart parish of that city. He was a cousin of Archbishop J. L. Spalding of Peoria, Ill.

The King of Portugal has sent the decoration of the Grand Cross of the Royal Military Order of Our Lady of the Conception of Villa Vicosa to Bishop Feehan of Fall River, in recognition of his care and consideration of the Portuguese clergy and laity in his diocese.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The Oblate Fathers of St. Francis de Sales have opened a Novitiate at Childs, Md., where worthy candidates for their order are received.

On the occasion of the recent death of Mgr. Barlin, the Right Rev. Bishop of Neuva Cáceres, P. I., the statement was made in the press that Bishop Barlin was the first Filipino to wear the mitre. The statement is inaccurate. The following is a list of Bishops known to be natives, some being Filipino-Chino mestizos and others Spanish-Filipino mestizos, while some are known to be full-blooded Filipinos.

Likewise the Most Rev. Ysidoro Arévalo, Auxiliary Bishop, afterward acting Archbishop of Manila, and the Right Rev. José Andaya, of Oviedo, Mexico, afterward in the eighteenth century Archbishop of Mexico.

All these bishops were secular clergy, distinguished for their piety, learning and zeal, and all served with great wisdom the interests committed to their care.

The night school for the laboring classes which has been opened in connection with the Ateneo de Manila in the walled city is being patronized by the working people of the city. The classes are under the supervision of Padre Villalonga.

The case of the People of Porto Rico against the Roman Catholic Church of that island has just been dismissed by the Supreme Court of the United States. It arose out of a suit brought in the Supreme Court of Porto Rico to establish the right of the Church to the lands held in the island by the Franciscans and Dominicans prior to their sequestration in 1838. The Porto Rican Court decided in favor of the Church. Congress having appropriated the money to pay the value of the lands, the agreement of both parties to the suit enabled the Court in Washington to dismiss the case.

CORRESPONDENTS' QUERIES

E. G., Quebec.—You are right in thinking that the Jesuit College of Quebec was founded one year before Harvard. In point of fact the Jesuit College of Quebec was opened in 1635, while Harvard was founded on paper and promises in 1636, and had not a single student until 1638. But neither of these colleges can lay claim to being the oldest in North America. That honor belongs to the Franciscan College of the Holy Cross, which began in Mexico in 1549, eighty-six years before the Quebec college. In 1553, on January 25, the University of Mexico was inaugurated, not merely on paper and promises, but with seven endowed chairs, eighty-two years before the Quebec college began in a very small way.

Writing from San Francisco a correspondent corrects a statement in our columns of August 7, relative to Empress Eugenie's being of Irish blood.

"The Kirkpatricks of Closeburn have been Scottish Knights since the days of Robert the Bruce. The earliest Scottish records go back to the ninth century. The Empress Eugenie's great-great-grandfather was Robert Kirkpatrick of Closeburn, Dumfries, a good Scot who was beheaded in 1746 for his devotion to Prince Charles Stuart. His grandson, William, son of Alexander of the Barony of Kirkmichael, was a Scot by birth who visited the U. S. A. and took out papers of citizenship, but finally settled in Malaga and married the daughter of a Belgian merchant by a Spanish wife. Mr. Kirkpatrick's daughter married the Count of Palafox and Montijo, a Spanish grandee, and the last Empress of the French is their daughter."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you kindly allow me to notice a very remarkable fact? It is this: the deep interest of Catholic editors throughout the world in the development of the Catholic University of Ireland. Here in the United States, for instance, we have almost countless agitations in the planning of new or enlarged Catholic colleges; yet no single college, with its most magnificent expectations, and so near home, too, seems to be of such national interest, at least to our editors, as the upbuilding of Ireland's University.

Racial spirit may account for a good portion of that kindly concern in Irish educational matters; but there are other causes. The world cannot forget what a haven for good through indigent centuries were the early Irish schools, where, as in some magical atmosphere, learning had its flourishing life. And in the distressful centuries close upon our times, the vigorous spirit of happier days lived on; laws and muskets and firebrands might destroy the external abodes of learning; they could not annihilate the undaunted spirit that loved the pursuit of letters as the bright sunshine and glad air of the hills. Ireland had many a ruined acropolis, but it did not lose heart as Greece did after the Macedonian. When driven to the worst, letters could be taught from the inscriptions on the tombstones in the graveyards, as Douglas Hyde says so forcibly. And again,

"Stretched upon the mountain side or crouched 'neath sheltering fern,
The teacher and his pupil met feloniously to learn."

It is this history, then, that inspires, in great part, the world-wide interest in the Irish University. The hedge-school has passed; the world wants Ireland to revive the glories of Clonard and Clonmacnoise.

And as a bright beacon to those who are looking steadfastly towards the advancement of the University, they may often recall a remarkable prophecy of Cardinal Newman. We may leave to others the consideration of Newman's ability as a Latinist and as a theologian, and the extent of his regard for Irish nationality; this, at least, will all his critics concede—he was thoroughly read in the history of university education, and his pen was always sincere. And this is his prophecy—the sincere utterance of a man who knew universities from Athens to his own Oxford:

"I look towards a land both old and young; old in its Christianity, young in the promise of its future; a nation, which received grace before the Saxon came to Britain, and which has never quenched it; a Church, which comprehends in its history the rise and fall of Canterbury and York which Augustine and Paulinus found, and Pole and Fisher left behind them. I contemplate a people which has had a long night, and will have an inevitable day. I am turning my eyes toward a hundred years to come, and I dimly see the island I am gazing on become the road of passage and union between two hemispheres, and the centre of the world. I see its inhabitants rival Belgium in populousness, France in vigor, and Spain in enthusiasm; and I see England taught by advancing years to exercise in its behalf that good sense which is her characteristic towards every one else. The capital of that prosperous and hopeful land is situate in a beautiful bay and near a romantic region; and in it I see a flourishing University, which for a while had to struggle with fortune, but which, when its first founders and servants were dead and gone, had successes far exceeding their anxieties. Thither, as to a sacred soil, the home of their fathers, and the fountain-head of their Christianity, students are flocking from East, West and South, from America and Australia and India, from Egypt and Asia Minor, with the ease and rapidity of a locomotion not yet discovered, and last, though not least, from England—all speaking one tongue, all owning one faith, all eager for one large true wisdom; and thence, when their stay is over, going back to carry over all the earth 'peace to men of good will'."

Of the hundred years over which Newman looked to the realization of his prophecy, fifty-five have passed. The prospect grows with the years:

"'Tis morn on the hills of Innisfail."

Even the locomotion which was not yet discovered when Newman wrote in 1854, has marvelously developed in ease and rapidity. May the dawn of Ireland's "inevitable day" continue to grow brighter; and may a "school in every valley and a church on every hill" be hers again, as in the memorable days of Finnian of Clonard, and Brendan of Clonfert, and Finnian of Moville, and Ciaran of Clonmacnoise, and Columba of Kells and of Iona.

MICHAEL EARLS, S.J.

Woodstock College, Md..

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The October number of the American Magazine contains an article in which its author, Mr. Kenneth Turner, attempts to prove with apparently strong arguments that the Republic of Mexico is in a state of barbarism. This article is full of assertions without proof, and of contradictions which evidently prove that its falsity has no other purpose than to prejudice the American mind against the people of a friendly nation. Hence, moved by a spirit of justice more than by patriotism, I shall show the falsity of Mr. Turner's statements, and thus contribute to dispel the wrong impression which such a libellous article may leave on the great masses of the American people.

Mr. Turner tells us that he was in Yucatan, and there saw chattel slavery in its most hideous forms; that in Yucatan the slaves are lashed; that they do not receive pay; that when sick they are denied the care of a physician; that the slaves are sold for from $400 to $1,000 apiece, and that the henequen kings can even kill their slaves with impunity. But for these and many other charges, all tending to prove the existence of slavery, he gives no proof.

Mr. Turner says that each slave represents an intrinsic value of from $400 to $1,000, and at the same time he insists that these slaves are denied the assistance of a physician when sick. Why, it is the height of nonsense. If an owner invests from $400 to $1,000 in a man, it logically follows that he will try to preserve the life of that man for his own private interest. Mr. Turner also tells us that the hemp farms are peopled by from 500 to 2,500 persons, all of whom are slaves; and he quotes Mr. Joaquin Peon as saying that the Maya slaves die off faster than they are born. The Yucatan hemp farms are very numerous. How, then, could each one of them possess from 500 to 2,500 slaves if these slaves die off faster than they are born? Is not the statement absurd? Indeed, the average farm of Yucatan does not have more than seventy able working men. Laborers are always in great demand; hence the untruthfulness of Mr. Turner's assertion that he was offered lots of slaves for sale.

Mr. Turner assures us that he spent two days and two nights on one of the hemp farms, which time he spent in becoming thoroughly acquainted with the farm system. After such assertion, the candid reader is left under the impression that the charges of Mr. Turner regarding the non-payment of the slaves, and their barbarous treatment is correct. But Mr. Turner is one of those who have eyes and see not; otherwise, in studying the farm system of Yucatan he would have seen that every Saturday every man is paid an amount of money corresponding to the work of the week. True it is, that during work hours the laborers are not allowed to leave the farm, but this fact does not prove that they are slaves, because this discipline is observed in every nation between employer and employé.

The Yucatan slaves, according to Mr. Turner, are Mayas, Yaquis and Chinese. The Chinese immigrants rent pieces of ground which they cultivate, enjoying the produce thereof independent of the landlord. For, if the Chinese immigrants were made slaves, is it not logical that the rep-representative of the Chinese government in Mexico would protest against it?

There are a few hundred Yaquis working on the various farms and receiving remuneration for their work. The federal government of Mexico has, with perfect right, distributed these Indians through the republic as prisoners of war; because nobody is ignorant of the fact that the Yaquis are a warlike tribe, inhabiting the northern part of the state of Sonora (Mex.), and are a menace to public peace. Hence the government in order to preserve peace, has the power to subdue them by war. A like policy was observed by the United States government with the Apaches.

Mr. Turner, who knows that most of the hemp-farm owners will exchange laborers for a time on a co-operative principle, falsely concludes that this is a proof of the ownership of laborers as chattel property. This fact not only evinces the lack of good faith of Mr. Turner, but at the same time throws to the ground his statement as to the impossibility of the laborers of one farm coming in contact with the laborers of another.

The assertion that the majority of slaves are not allowed to go to their homes at night, and that they sleep in the dormitory of the farm, so close together that they touch each other, is as false as the former ones. For many years we have lived in the state of Yucatan, and visited many of the hemp farms. Yet, we have never seen on any of them those dormitories of which Mr. Turner speaks. All the Indians have their homes on the grounds of the farms, well built homes, with their corresponding yard, which they may cultivate for their own benefit. The state of Yucatan is open to all foreigners, so that should any one doubt the verity of our statement, he is able to see for himself. About three years ago President Diaz, accompanied by foreign representatives, visited the state of Yucatan. They visited the farms, the very houses, of the so-called slaves; and everywhere they found a well-contented people, and not a crowd of half-starved workers, as Mr. Turner would make us believe he saw.

In regard to the whipping of the so-called slaves, we do not deny that occasionally a laborer may have been whipped for the violation of some law, which Kenneth Turner fails to mention, leaving the reader under the impression that it was the result of the cruel caprice of the slave-holder. Now, if Mr. Turner concludes that the laborers of Yucatan are slaves on this account, could not a Mexican make the same charge about the people of the United States if he were in Wilmington, Del., and should see a white man tied to a whipping-post and receiving from 25 to 40 lashes—which is the punishment assigned by law to wife-beaters? Turner illustrates his article with photographs representing the slaves of Yucatan. But these photographs are lies; because the costumes of the Indians represented in those pictures are not the costumes peculiar to the Indians of Yucatan; but on the contrary, are the costumes of the Indians inhabiting the central portions of Mexico.

Mr. Turner's charges against Mexico, as a whole, are, that it is a country without freedom of speech and of the press; without political parties, and without any guarantee of life; a country where the public school system has been abolished in vast districts because the governor needs the money; a country where the constitution, as well as the laws, are disregarded.

The administration of General Diaz is noted for the great efforts made to develop a system of public schools wherein to educate the masses of the people. Dr. Rowe, of the University of Pennsylvania, testified to this when, in a recent interview after his trip to Mexico last summer, he said to a reporter of the North American (Philadelphia): "A serious and concerted attempt is being made to develop a system of public education, and with each year an increased percentage of the revenues is being devoted to this purpose."

Dr. Rowe, speaking of the political situation of the country, said: "It is unfortunate that so much has been made of the very insignificant disturbances that have occurred. Such disturbances as have taken place occur far more frequently in the United States and pass unnoticed. From the words of Dr. Rowe, we infer that there have been political disturbances in Mexico; that is, political clubs have been established, meetings of opposition have been held, the public press has been working with interest in the elections about to take place. All this goes to show the falsity of Mr. Turner's dictum about the non-existence of the public press and freedom of speech.

To say that the Mexican laws and constitution are disregarded, is as unfair as if we say that the laws of the United States are disregarded. For could we not say that the American government has disregarded the constitution when Mr. Roosevelt, ignoring a constitutional precept, attempted to force the state of California to set aside its reserved rights to suit his own notions of the privileges of Orientals to equality with native Americans? The claim that Mr. Turner is the only American who has set foot in the "Valle Nacional" is so ridiculous that it needs no comment. The Valle Nacional is as accessible as Central Park, N. Y. City. It is not surrounded by walls or caves. It is owned by a few farmers, who cultivate tobacco there. It is true that sometimes the convicts are made to work there, but the sanitary conditions of the valley are better than those of the phosphate fields of Florida and the forests of Alabama, in which, let it not be forgotten, the convicts of Alabama are made to work.

Mr. Turner has observed the flaws of the social and political system of Mexico, and by exaggerating those flaws, which are to be found in every country under the sun, he has attempted to prove that the republic is in a barbarous state. If such were the case the foreign representatives would be obliged to protest in the name of humanity, as was the case in Morocco. During the last thirty years many distinguished publicists have visited Mexico, and their opinion regarding the financial and social conditions and the stability of the government has been most favorable. All these men have unanimously given testimony to the great efforts of the Mexican authorities to promote education among the masses of the people. Such was the impression which Mr. Root received during his late visit; such is the impression of all the foreign representatives. Can it be possible then that all these men, some of whom like the Hon. David E. Thompson, the American ambassador, have resided in that country for more than four years, are mistaken, and that Mr. Turner has been the only one able to discover the truth?

No one is ignorant of the fact that millions of American capital are invested in Mexico, and that thousands of American citizens have made their homes there. Mr. Turner, then, while attacking the Mexican government, also attacks that of the United States through its representative. Because, if the conditions of that country are such as Mr. Turner depicts, the American ambassador has failed to do his duty, for he has neglected to protest against a state of affairs that naturally endangers the lives and property of American citizens.

Were we to judge the United States, or in fact any nation, by the same criterion that Mr. Turner has employed in judging Mexico, we would find that the United States is also in the state of barbarism. For it would be very easy to point to the inhuman lynching—nay, the burning alive—of negroes, the abuses committed in the great factories and the repeated strikes, which go to show that men are made to work through necessity for a wage to which not their will, but their need, consents.

Nobody is better able to judge of Mexico's social condition than the members of the American colony, and their protest as published in the Mexican Herald is a convincing demonstration of the falsity of Mr. Turner's article. BENJAMIN MOLINA.

CHRONICLE

The Ferrer Disturbances.—Despatches from our European correspondents make it evident that the demonstrations against the Spanish Government for the execution of this well-known social revolutionist are impotent, and in many instances farcical. They have occurred chiefly in centres which are known as the homes of socialists and anarchists, particularly in France and Italy. They are promoted by radicals and revolutionists who seek to make capital out of his death for their propaganda against authority. Little interest is taken in his death in Austria and Germany, and in England, only the unemployed of London have manifested any violent signs of resentment. When frightened off from the Spanish embassy and the main streets, a mob of about three hundred, without leader or red flag, drifted to the front of the Westminster Cathedral, but, not venturing to attack the dozen Catholic men who stood guard at the main entrance, they howled at a safe distance until they were dispersed by the police. The Paris mob that threatened to destroy the great basilica on Montmartre were dispersed by half a dozen police dogs. One mob is reported as attacking the leaning tower of Pisa! No authentic news of similar demonstrations has come from Spain, though it is said that numerous bomb explosions and some deaths have occurred in and about Barcelona. The attempt to agitate the matter in the Belgian Parliament failed utterly. In the British Parliament less than twenty of the Labor and Radical members supported a motion to discuss the matter. In Paris the Senate adjourned rather than consider an interpellation on the relations of France and Spain. The Cuban authorities repudiate any sympathy with the mob demonstrations in Havana. The meeting in Carnegie Hall, New York, was a fizzle.

The Press Hysteria Over Ferrer.—Notable among the events of the past week is the hysterical attitude of the press abroad and at home to the Spanish Government for the anarchist's death. In general, it is admitted that he was a revolutionary propagandist, that he was intimately connected with the enemies of his Government, and that he has been frequently under suspicion of having instigated or taken part in the use of bombs, particularly on the occasion of the attempted assassination of the King and Queen. Incriminating documents were found in his possession, among them a program for the overthrow of the Government and the seizure of bank deposits and funds for the benefit of the revolutionary forces, with hand-bills calling on the people to rise and arm for war. The immediate accusation for which he was tried before the Council of War was that he had actively instigated and taken part in the Barcelona riots. There is no reason to believe that he did not receive a fair trial. It was not held in secret, nor was it conducted with undue haste. Still with few exceptions French, English and American newspapers denounce the Spanish authorities as unjust, cruel, mediæval, priest-ridden. Editors who never heard of Ferrer before the Barcelona riots, and who cannot to-day give the details of his career, have memorialized him and denounced the Spanish Government in press despatches manufactured in Paris and in editorials as rabid as anarchists could wish. A significant communication from the Paris correspondent, dated as early as October 1, exposes the scheme of utilizing Ferrer's death as another Dreyfus affair; but this is considered futile by the very men who suggest it. Ferrer was not a Jew, and Spaniards have a keen sense of proportion, which works for proper submission to authority. There has been no commotion in Spain, and the press is daily growing less hysterical.

Various.—Despatches from San Francisco state that owing to pressure brought to bear upon the Federal authorities at Washington to suppress it, a book entitled "Chinese Immigration," has been withdrawn from circulation. The writer of the book made serious charges against persons high in politics and the Government service. The book espouses the cause of the Chinese.—The board of railroad commissioners in Kansas has served notice on the Pullman Company for a reduction of its charges, demanding the same rates in Kansas as have been given in Oklahoma. According to these rates, $1.50 is the maximum charge for a berth, and one-half cent a mile for a seat.—Dr. Frederick A. Cook received the freedom of the city as conferred by the New York board of aldermen on October 15. He branded as a lie the affidavit of Edward N. Barrill, the guide, who says he did not attain the summit of Mount McKinley. Dr. Cook announced that he had organized an expedition to ascend Mount McKinley and procure the records which he says were left there on his former ascent.—Judge William I. Buchanan, formerly American Minister to Panama, and later special commissioner to Venezuela, died suddenly in London on October 16. The daily press has announced also the death of Maj. Gen. Alfred E. Bates, U. S. A., retired, and that of Brig. Gen. Richard C. Drum, U. S. A.—The Illinois Bankers' Association, which met at Decatur on the 12th inst., expressed itself as opposed to the plan of a central bank.—In a recent hearing before the probate court in Chicago, it transpired that James H. Eckels, a reputed millionaire, who died suddenly over two years ago, left his estate almost in bankruptcy. Mr. Eckels was president of the Commercial National Bank and comptroller of the currency. He had a national reputation as a financier.—Forty-nine persons are reported to have been killed in the storm that recently swept over a wide area in the South.—Third Assistant Postmaster General Lawshe has sent his resignation to the President. Ill health is the reason given for his action.—Governor Deneen, of Illinois, has appointed a medical commission to investigate the nature of pellagra.—The Polish National Alliance, in convention in Milwaukee last week, went on record against taking any part in National or State politics.—A movement has been started in Washington, D. C., by an organization calling itself the Mount Vernon Anti-Fee Association, for the purpose of opening Washington's home to the public without the present charge of admission.—It was announced last week that Edwin Hawley had acquired control of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company.—Alvin W. Krech, Edward T. Jeffrey, and Kingdon Gould were elected directors of the Western Union Telegraph Company at the annual meeting of the stockholders of the company on October 13.—Ralph Wilner, of New York, an engineer, was expelled from his hotel in St. Petersburg by the police upon the expiration of his permit of adjourn in Russia.—On Sunday Count de Lambert made a record trip of thirty-one miles in a Wright biplane, passing over Paris in his course and circling the Eiffel Tower.—Sir Thomas Lipton is reported to have embarked from England for New York for the purpose of arranging another yacht race for the America's cup.

The President's Tour.—In his tour through Arizona and New Mexico, after leaving Los Angeles, President Taft proclaimed wherever he went that he was heartily in favor of statehood for each of the territories. He urged deliberation in framing a State constitution, recommending that it be confined to fundamental laws with simple rules of limitations. He cited the mistakes of Oklahoma in making its constitution, which he characterized as "a zoölogical garden of cranks." On October 16, President Diaz of Mexico entered El Paso at 11 A. M. to exchange greetings with President Taft. Afterwards on the same day Mr. Taft returned the call of President Diaz. The meeting was in the Custom House of Juarez, where in the evening a banquet was given by the Mexican President in honor of his guest. President Taft spent Monday in San Antonio, and from there went to the ranch of Charles P. Taft, near Corpus Christi, for a visit of four days.

Federal Court Decisions.—Judge Anderson's decision in the Panama libel case, refusing to allow the defendants to be removed from Indianapolis to the District of Columbia for trial, has met with general approval from the newspaper press of the United States.—Federal Judge Marshall has overruled the motion to quash the indictments charging Gov. Haskell and other Oklahomans with fraudulently scheduling town lots in Muskogee, Okla.

The Deposit Guaranty Law.—The district federal court of Lincoln, Nebraska, has declared unconstitutional and void the Nebraska State bank deposit guaranty law. The law provides for enforced contribution by each bank to a common fund to pay losses of failed banks. The court held that this was depriving a person of his money to pay the debts of another and was taking from him without due process of law, thereby violating the constitutional guaranty of rights. The State will immediately appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Civic Improvement.—The governors of the American Civil Alliance have invited all civic and other educational organizations in the United States to send representatives to a national civic congress to be held in New York City, December 6 to 11. The gathering will be non-partisan and will have for its object the study and solution of political problems.

The Celebration in San Francisco.—On Tuesday San Francisco inaugurated with a great military parade the Portolá Festival, to celebrate the rebuilding of the city and to commemorate the discovery in 1769 of the Bay of San Francisco by Don Gaspar de Portolá, first Spanish Governor of California. Naval and civic parades and historical pageants are among other features in the program of the celebration.

Hawaii.—The cruiser Pennsylvania visited the leper settlement at Molokai lately. Ten army surgeons and a navy surgeon, accompanied by Mgr. Chase, chaplain of the 14th Cavalry, took the opportunity to inspect the work done there.

Canadian Business Reviving.—On the principle that an increase in bank clearings is a sure sign of improvement in business, the figures for last week are interesting. They show that Canadian cities are far ahead of those in the United States. The highest American figure is an increase of 37.6 per cent. for New York City; then come Kansas City with 32.2, Philadelphia with 31.8, Boston with 23.5, Pittsburg with 14.5, Chicago with 9.1, and St. Louis with 5.9. In Canada the ascending scale of increasing percentages is: Quebec City, 5.5; Halifax, 6.8; Hamilton, 17.5; Toronto, 26.8; Winnipeg, 38; Montreal, 48.9; Calgary, 51.7; and Vancouver, 88.1. This last phenomenal figure for the largest city in British Columbia is only a slight advance on that same city's increase for the preceding week, viz., 85 per cent.

Two Canadian Steamships Injured.—Curiously enough, on the same day, October 14, but at two distant points, two C. P. R. steamers were seriously injured. The Empress of Ireland, while steaming up the St. Lawrence, when opposite Matane, where the river is nearly fifty miles wide, in clear weather just before noon, struck some invisible object, whether uncharted rock or sunken derelict is not yet known, and quivered from stem to stern. On examination it was found that the damage was confined to the fore stokehole, the bulkheads remaining intact. Though the boats were in readiness it was unnecessary to lower them as there was no danger. So the steamer proceeded safely to Quebec, about two hundred and fifty miles away, where the passengers were landed. The Empress of Ireland will be temporarily repaired on this side and carefully overhauled on the other side of the Atlantic. On the same day in a blinding snowstorm the steamer Athabasca, one of the regular passenger boats plying between Fort William at the Northwestern extremity of Lake Superior and Owen Sound on Georgian Bay, the northeastern extension of Lake Huron, ran aground on Flowerpot Island, at the north end of the Prince Peninsula. The ship's bow is high up on a flat rock, and the main part of the vessel is afloat in about fifteen fathoms with four feet of water in the hold. The tug Harrison, one of the largest on the lakes, has been sent to take off the passengers of the Athabasca and see what can be done to float the disabled steamship.

The Winnipeg Centennial.—Winnipeg is preparing to celebrate in 1912 the centennial, not of its own existence—for it is barely forty years of age—but of the first arrival of Lord Selkirk and his Scotch settlers for the Red River in 1812. True to her faith in the national importance of Canada's exposition to be held in Winnipeg three years hence, that city has guaranteed to raise a million dollars for the great event.

Hazing in Toronto.—Colonel Denison, the well-known Toronto police magistrate, after fining five students of the veterinary college for hazing, announced that he would do his best to put a stop to conduct which was quite illegal. He added that if any freshman came to him with a complaint of this nature, he would send the delinquents to prison without the option of a fine.

Death of Quebec's Chief Justice.—Sir Henri Thomas Taschereau, Chief Justice of the Province of Quebec, died on October 11 at Montmorency, near Paris, where he was on a visit in search of health. He was born in the City of Quebec in 1841, was the son of the late Hon. Jean Thomas Taschereau, a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, and was the grandson of another Hon. Jean Thomas Taschereau, who, having fought for constitutional liberty in the Parliament of Lower Canada, was imprisoned in 1810 and subsequently raised to the bench. Henri Thomas, who was also a nephew of the late Cardinal Taschereau, after graduating at Laval University with the degree of B. C. L. in 1862, was called to the bar the same year. He represented the Liberal party in the House of Commons as member for Montmagny from 1872 to 1878, when he was appointed a puisne judge of the Superior Court. In 1903 the Montreal Bar presented him with an address and testimonial on the occasion of his twenty-fifth anniversary on the bench. Two years ago he was created a Knight Bachelor and succeeded Sir Alexander Lacoste as Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals. Mr. R. C. Smith, bâtonnier (president) of the Montreal Bar, well expressed the sentiments of that body when, on October 14, he said: "Sir Henri, by his splendid judicial career, had added to the already great reputation of his family. In the course of his thirty-one years on the bench Sir Henri had made a deep impression upon the great body of our law, and his family might well be proud of his achievements. His death away from home had some pathetic aspects, but while in his last hours he may have looked longingly over the water to his western home, it was perhaps not inappropriate that he should pass away in the heart of that highly civilized country from which we had drawn the inspiration of our Civil Law, of which the late Chief Justice had been, at the Bar and on the Bench, so brilliant an exponent."

Nicaragua.—President José Santos Zelaya, who has crushed two attempts at revolution, is face to face with a third and more formidable uprising, which is being aided by citizens of other Central American republics. His government openly charges President Cabrera of Guatemala with furnishing men and military supplies to the insurgents. The coast towns are so completely in the power of the revolutionists that Zelaya's escape by water, should occasion arise, will be most difficult. He is accused of a design to establish anew the Central American republic with himself in the chair. Three of the five independent republics are said to be in favor of re-union, but local fears and jealousies keep them apart. Nicaragua is second in importance only to Guatemala. American residents hope for the success of the present insurrection against Zelaya, as it would bring about a more general distribution of land and trade concessions and other governmental favors.

Great Britain.—The Prime Minister has been to the King in Scotland. The visit has caused much speculation, especially as it was followed by visits from persons intimately connected with the Opposition.—Candidates for the general election supposed to be imminent are being chosen in many constituencies by the managers of both parties.—The Anglican Church Congress has been in session at Swansea with much talk about the proposed disestablishment of the Welsh Church. Lord Halifax wrote urging the preservation of the Athanasian Creed, the maintenance of the marriage law of the church regarding prohibited degrees of kindred and divorce against the law of the land, and resistance to Welsh disestablishment.—The women who were committed to prison for rioting at a political meeting in Birmingham, and who, having attempted to bring about their release by starving themselves were fed by force, have been discharged after completing their term.—Judging from the number of applications for relief, the authorities are of the opinion that the distress this winter will be even greater than it was last year.—The papers continue to speak in the highest terms of the courtesy shown the Squadron that attended the Hudson-Fulton celebration.—Some disappointment is expressed because the Inflexible did not attempt a record passage on her return. It was suggested that she was short-handed in the fire-room on account of the desertion of many stokers during her stay in New York.

Ireland.—The visit of Capt. O'Meagher Condon, who has sailed for America, has produced a good impression both in Ireland and England and strengthened the position of the Irish party. Bishop O'Dea of Galway wrote thanking him for "the splendid services he had rendered to the cause of Ireland. . . . The spirit of the nation is still unbroken; everywhere there is progress and hope, and this we owe largely to Irish America."—Mr. Birrell has declared that whereas the House might confer with the Lords on minor changes in the Irish Land Bill, they would admit no substantial change either by destruction, addition or substitution. The difficulty they had had in getting this imperative and exclusively Irish question settled showed the necessity of Home Rule.—At the opening of the Irish Quarter Sessions courts, several judges were presented with "white gloves." In Donegal there was no case to go before the juries. The committee on the Finance Bill has adopted a new minimum scale on Irish licenses which is a concession to the Irish liquor trade. Messrs. Healy and Dillon, who are total abstainers, urged this concession on industrial and financial grounds.—Several clauses have been added to the Bill for the Development of natural resources, which give Ireland a proportionate share in the funds and promise to assist the growth of the Industrial movement.—A new Irish Theological Seminary, for students who volunteer for the African missions, has been opened at Cork by Father Zimmerman, under the auspices of Cardinal Logue and Bishop O'Callaghan, and with the special sanction of the Pope. There are already several institutions in Ireland that prepare students for foreign missions—Mungret College, Limerick; All Hallows, Dublin, and Mount Mellera, Co. Waterford. Besides there are missionary students at nearly all the diocesan seminaries.

Roman Affairs.—In accordance with instructions from the Consistorial Congregation, the Patriarch of Venice has laid an interdict of two weeks upon the town of Adria, to punish an outrage committed by its inhabitants upon the person of their bishop. The Bishop of Adria, seeing that this town was sinking into decay, obtained permission from the Holy See to remove his archives to the neighboring town of Rovigo, the Capital of the province. As he was driving to the station the people judging this to be a step to the removal of the see, fell upon him wounding him severely.

Belgium and the Congo.—The Colonial Minister, M. Renkin, has returned from a six months' tour of inspection in the Congo Colony, during which he spoke with 700 chiefs. In lecturing before the Cercle Africain he contradicted solemnly the reports set afloat by the Congo Reform Association of atrocities in the colony and of cruelty to the natives in the matter of land. With regard to the former charge, while admitting that mistakes had been made in the Congo as in the colonies of other nations, he maintained that in its treatment of the natives the Congo could stand comparison with any Central African colony. As to the latter charge, he defied anyone to mention a native, a village or a tribe that had been refused land for cultivation. He set before his hearers briefly his plans for the betterment of the colony, which include the development of missions and industrial schools, the guarding of the natives against abuse, their own barbarous customs, and disease, as well as the development of commerce and reduction of taxes and tariff.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Plenary Council of Canada

Quebec, probably the most historic city in North America, a veritable treasure house of religious no less than of civil history, which contained the oldest college upon the North American continent outside of Mexico, which gave to the Church martyrs unsurpassed in the hagiology of Christendom, and where as from a beacon set upon a hill the light of the true faith illumined the error-darkened Continent—Quebec has added a new and conspicuous page to her annals in the meeting there of the First Plenary Council of Canada. Upon a day in late September the ancient Basilica, scene of many an impressive demonstration, was covered with flags and many colored streamers, and blazed with light, for the opening session of that august assemblage. Convoked and presided over by His Excellency, Mgr. Donatus Sbarretti, Delegate Apostolic of His Holiness, it has called together the members of the Canadian hierarchy: six Archbishops—since the archbishopric of Ottawa was rendered vacant by death—twenty-one bishops—since the See of London, Ont., is also vacant, and the Bishop of Hamilton incapacitated from attendance by illness—three auxiliary bishops and four vicars apostolic. These prelates are attended by theologians and consultors and the heads of religious Orders.

The initial session of the Council was splendid in its ceremonial, with the Pontifical Mass celebrated by Archbishop Bégin of Quebec, and the two notable discourses, respectively in French and English, by foremost episcopal pulpit orators, Archbishop Gauthier of Kingston and Archbishop Bruchési of Montreal, and the whole marked by the pomp and circumstance characteristic of the Church in her hour of rejoicing. The presence of so many dignitaries is a subject of congratulation to the entire population of the city, which was expressed in an address of welcome presented by the Mayor, Sir George Garneau.

"The citizens of Quebec," declared the spokesman, "solicit the honor of tendering their homage to you in this solemn day upon which the First Plenary Council of Canada begins its sessions. With deep emotion they welcome the illustrious heads of the powerful and respected church that has been truly a mother to our people in this oldest city of Canada, on this rock of Quebec, so justly famed in history, on which our pious ancestors raised with the standard of France the venerated symbol of our redemption.

"Last year we celebrated the 300th anniversary of the birth of the Canadian nation, and every page of our history tells us that harmony, respect and confidence have never ceased to reign between the pastors and their faithful flocks.

"To-day, as well as at the dawn of our national existence, Religion and Country unite in striving to consolidate the grand work of the development of our beloved Canada. In the marvelous movement that impels us towards our national advancement we applaud the action of the Church, which, amid the allurements of prosperity, reminds us how superior are the interests of the soul, which should never be lost sight of by nations desiring to be truly great.

"When you report to the Sovereign Pontiff the work of the First Plenary Council, we beg of you to express the profound respect in which he and the great mission he fulfils are held throughout Canada by all who bear the name of Christians."

His Excellency stated in reply that the Church always taught submission to the temporal authority, adding that Quebec gave to the world an illustration of the excellent results accruing from a cordial understanding between Church and State.

At a banquet given at Spencerwood, the official residence of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, that functionary, Sir Alphonse Pelletier, declared that he would depart from the prescribed custom there of giving the toast of the King alone and without a speech.

"Owing," he said, "to the solemnity, not to say the sublimity of the occasion, he would propose the health of the Sovereign Pontiff and the King together," adding: "His Excellency, in replying to the delegation of the citizens of Quebec, declared that the union of the religious and civil authority contributed not only to the salvation of souls, but also to the prosperity of the country. I am happy to repeat what I have said here on many occasions, that I desire the best understanding, the most intimate union, between the religious and civil authorities. Hence I propose to raise our glasses to the health of the King and the health of the Sovereign Pontiff."

A cablegram was sent, preliminary to the opening of the Council, by Mgr. Sbarretti, to the Holy Father, which was worded as follows: "The Canadian Bishops, assembled in First Plenary Council, feel it their duty to express to the Sovereign Pontiff their sentiments of filial piety and perfect submission. With their whole hearts they thank him for his parental solicitude towards the Canadian Church, and ask the apostolic blessing, pledge of celestial gifts, for all those who are to take part in the Council, in order that they may contribute to restore all things in Christ."

A reply was received from the Papal Secretary of State, Cardinal Merry del Val:

"The Holy Father accepts with happiness the sentiments of filial piety of the Canadian Bishops, who are holding their first Council, and expresses the hope that from the same Plenary Council the Canadian Church may reap abundant and excellent fruit. To this end and as a pledge of celestial aid, he affectionately and very specially accords the apostolic benediction."

As already described in these columns, a cablegram was also despatched to King Edward, containing expressions of loyalty from the Council and thanking the Sovereign for the full liberty enjoyed in the Dominion by his Catholic subjects, to which an answer was received, making full acknowledgment that loyalty was according to the best traditions of the Catholic Church.

Amongst many telegrams and messages of congratulations was notably that from Dr. Shahan and the Catholic University of Washington, to which Mgr. Sbarretti replied that he hoped that Catholic science might ever be advanced by that institution.

From all these auspicious happenings and notable pronouncements it is a far cry indeed to those remote times when the Founders of Montréal and the Association with which they were connected, made the appointment of a Bishop for Canada the subject of earnest prayer and endeavor. The prayer of Dauversière, Olier, Maisonneuve and the rest, was answered by the appointment of François Montmorency de Laval as Bishop of Petræa and Vicar Apostolic of Quebec. That was in 1657, and Canada not only received an administrator, but its ecclesiastical jurisdiction was made, for the first time, directly dependent upon Rome instead of as heretofore upon the archbishopric of Rouen. Roman it became and Roman it remained in its sympathies and aspirations during the Gallican troubles of the seventeenth century.

Seventeen years later, Laval was made Bishop of Quebec by a Bull of Clement X, and thus was sown the seed of that splendid hierarchy now assembled in the capital of French Canada. Its first Bishop was consecrated when the walls of the fortress city were still a bulwark against savage foes and when wars and rumors of war were forever threatening the metropolitan peace. His career was many sided and replete with incident, and his achievements for the infant Church many and glorious. One of the chief of these was the foundation of a seminary to supply priests to the colonies, and another was his hearty encouragement of the Jesuit College of Quebec, founded one year before Harvard, and continued, after the suppression of the Society of Jesus, in the Petit Séminaire de Québec. The episcopate of each Bishop after that had sufficient material for an epic poem, down to those days when the stout-hearted Plessis demanded from the British conquerors legal status and full ecclesiastical privileges for the Catholic Church. Already there had been various and vexatious encroachments upon the rights and liberties guaranteed by the recent Act, and vigorously and boldly Bishop Plessis and his no less zealous clergy supported the claims of his people. What he persistently demanded he finally obtained, with such measure of recognition as had been denied to his predecessors, who had been tolerated but not acknowledged by the state. When a protest was made on behalf of the Anglican Bishop, saying that it was absurd to acknowledge two Bishops for one See, Lord Bathurst, on the part of the Home Government, replied that it was not the time to agitate such a question when the Canadians were in arms for Great Britain. For the war of 1812 was just then in progress, and the supremacy of the British crown upon the soil of America once more trembled in the balance.

Of course this battle, which Plessis so bravely fought and won, was renewed again and again, especially under Lord Dalhousie, who resented the fact that ecclesiastical patronage and the emoluments connected therewith, should be diverted from the crown. It was then and afterwards that such attempts were made upon Catholic liberties as to call forth from the great O'Connell the warning that if such infringements of the treaty were tolerated "the misfortunes of Ireland would be repeated in Canada". For instance, in districts where Catholics were few, it was enacted that Protestants should have the first right to use the church and that Protestant ministers should expound the Gospel to all; also that Catholic missionaries to the aborigines should be replaced gradually by ministers. Against these and other encroachments the Catholic Bishops and clergy, following in the footsteps of Plessis, stood as a rock and thus secured the peace, prosperity and freedom which Catholics of to-day enjoy, while scarcely recognizing their debt to those churchmen of the past.

On the other hand, the Bishops, then, as always, taught the lesson of submission to authority, and on the occasion of the rebellion of 1837 warned their flocks against participating in a hopeless struggle which must be the cause of misery and bloodshed. Nevertheless Bishop Lartigue of Montreal, in his famous pastoral, while enlightening his flock upon their duty in that important national crisis, refrained from any condemnation of the principles then contested of religious and constitutional liberty.

All that is in the far past now, and the Church, which was the mainstay and bulwark of the nation during its early struggles, has come forth in its immortal youth with the fullness of maturity. In the city which had already witnessed seven provincial Councils, the first assembling June 7, 1852, a national Council has taken the place of those merely local assemblies. It has already held two solemn sessions, the latter on the 25th of September, with sermons in French and English, by Bishops Casey of St. John, Emard of Valleyfield, and Archambault of Joliette.

The sessions of the Council, it is expected, will last into December, since there is much work to be done, and many busy brains and pens are kept incessantly occupied. To the country at large, whether all understand it so or not, the First Plenary Council of Canada should be matter of profound congratulation, for new dignity and solidity is thus being given to the ecclesiastical structure, the citadel is being put in order and its defenses strengthened for the inevitable and all too certain conflicts of the future. Provision will be made in every way to meet the changed and changing conditions of modern life.

ANNA T. SADLER.

Rubber and the Congo

About the middle of the eighteenth century the English people began to use a substance which the learned had long known as caoutchouc. The name looked hard, and a certain moral courage was needed to pronounce it by giving a sort of dry sneeze. Of course, really scientific persons, philosophers, they were called in those days, had no difficulty in the matter, but sneezed to one another with a fine abandon which implied: "You know what I mean." The unlearned, however, were tormented with self-consciousness. Though they might use the word occasionally, the doubt would always recur: "Does it really spell that?" And as at first they employed the thing for rubbing out pencil-marks, they soon gave up the philosophic sneeze for an easier name, india-rubber, lawlessly compounded of the place of origin, the Indies (for in the good old days this expressed all tropical America as well as Southern Asia) and the domestic use. Practical men found out that the properties of the substance could be modified with very simple treatment, and began to make of it elastic bands, tubes and cloth, but it still kept its popular name.

An attempt was made in this country to call it gum; perhaps because it comes from a milky juice that exudes from a tree much in the same way as what the speech of cities calls turpentine, but that of the forest terms more properly gum, flows from the pine and the fir. Overshoes for wet weather were coated with it. These were called in England, galoshes, from the French, galoche; our grandmothers called them gums, and used to admonish our mothers not to go out in the wet without their gums. The men of the fifties in California wore gum-boots, which sometimes caused in the feet a disease known as gum-boot gout. But in this discrepancy of names the old country gained one of its few victories over the New World, a sort of Chesapeake and Shannon affair, to set against the long catalogue of defects. The American gum disappeared, vanquished by the English india-rubber.

The American has the great quality of not knowing when he is beaten. Others claim it also. Whether they have an equal right to it, or a greater or a less, or any right at all, may be discussed in connection with other things. What is to the point now is, that the American people was blind to its defeat in the gum-india-rubber question. Indeed we took so kindly to the victorious name, we got to be on such friendly terms with it, that we soon dropped the ceremonious india, and spoke familiarly of rubber. Gum may have survived in some out-of-the-way corner, but rubber stalked through the land as if native and to the manor born. The Englishman might still speak of galoshes; for us they became rubbers. He might wear a mackintosh; we knew only the rubber coat. We used rubber hose to water our gardens, we put rubber tires on our carriages and automobiles. We ignored india so persistently that at length defeat was changed into victory, and to-day rubber, plain and untitled, is the word of commerce wherever the English tongue is spoken.

For the substance has become an important article of trade, and the Indies, so vaguely splendid when the world was younger, are no longer heard of. Our exact school geographies tell us that it comes from South America, Asia and Africa; and when Africa is mentioned the article of trade becomes a sign of controversy. Large quantities of rubber are exported from what was the Congo Free State and is now the Belgian Congo Colony. It is produced largely in the Bakuba country, which, according to the English Congo Reform Association and its American friends, while untrodden by a white foot, was a terrestrial paradise. Its people were free and happy under the mild rule of their king. Their great houses lined the well-swept streets of the towns, and their broad fields brought forth maize, beans, potatoes and tobacco abundantly. When the fancy took them they hunted the elephant for his tusks and the leopard for his skin; and thus they dwelt at ease until the agents of the Belgian Kasaï Company arrived amongst them with one thought, one insatiable longing—rubber. Then everything was changed. The great houses fell to ruins, the broad streets were unswept, the untilled fields were soon swallowed up in the jungle from which they had been reclaimed, the king, enslaved by the stranger, became a tyrant to his own, a mere instrument for the collecting of rubber. Men were armed by the Company to compel the natives to gather it. Some of them, attempting to escape, were shot down, and on all sides were heard the shrieks of wretched men and women paying under the Company's scourges the penalty of not bringing in their quota. And this is the state of things to-day. It was hoped that when the Free State was put an end to, and the authority of the Belgian Government established, these evils would cease. The world has been disappointed of its hope.

This is the story told by the Congo Reform Association, published by it in influential newspapers and sent by its officers to the British Foreign Secretary to be used as the grounds of official intervention. Is it true? It rests on the authority of the Protestant missionaries at Luebo in the Bakuba country; the Company of Kasaï maintains that it is utterly false. It seems that the missionaries have not always been of the same mind in the matter; for the Company claims to possess letters in which they speak of the Bakuba as barbarous savages, of their king, Lukengo, as a tyrant who arms his men to attack the missions and the Company's factories, of the Company's agents as amiable, just and compassionate, and of their hopes that the authorities will repress the barbarities of the Bakuba king. So conscious is the Company of its innocence that it has prosecuted the missionaries for libel. The news has just arrived that these gained a verdict on the ground that it could not be shown that the Company had suffered any damage, which would imply that the missionaries had not proved their charges. However, one cannot allow a telegram of a few lines to settle so grave a controversy. We may suggest, however, that the truth will very probably turn out to be that the happy state of the Bakubas before the advent of the Company has been greatly misrepresented; that Lukengo, who has learned the value of rubber, is the real author of what atrocities have taken place; that the Company, not being directly responsible, has not exerted itself as diligently as it might have done to protect the natives; that by receiving Lukengo's rubber it has profited by his misdeeds; and that some of its agents, on their own responsibility, without the knowledge of the Company, have encouraged him in his wickedness. If this be the true state of the case, the Kasaï Company is no worse than the best of such trading companies past and present. As for the Belgian Government it may be trusted to protect those whom so many of its noblest sons are engaged in evangelizing.

How Fads Grow and Go

There was once a good tailor in a religious community who had an invariable statement for all who came to supply themselves with head-gear or other apparel. Trying on hat or coat upon himself, he would say: "It fits me; it fits you." In most of our food-fads there lurks the same fallacy. They all have some good, but they have not all good. The tailor's hats and coats served as coverings, but were not always snug ones. How many educational misfits are being thrown hastily on the intellectual nakedness of our youth! It was Grant Allen who wanted to put our universities on wheels and educate their inhabitants by travel, because he had, so he said, got more good out of seeing Rome than by reading Cicero. It was easy to discover the fallacy in his fad and nip it in the bud. Another enthusiast has related that Asa Gray, while riding in a car, had his attention attracted by a tree, and so began his famous botanical career. If memory does not play false, this fact was to serve as the opening chapter in an educational fad. Examples, incidents, anecdotes, related without reference to the times and circumstances in which they took place, have given rise to systems and fads with the fatal disease of half-truth.

The most successful fad of modern times and perhaps of all times is Christian Science. Mrs. Eddy related herself not long ago the facts upon which it was based. Her story was that she cured some people by bread pills. In their case, thinking did the curing, but as thinking cannot really do any curing, there must be nothing to cure. She had a promising subject. Everybody is, was, or will be sick; everybody wants health. It was consoling to know that disease succumbed to bread pills, for which it was more scientific and hygienic to substitute settled convictions. Mrs. Eddy then improved her fad by making it a religion, and as she made so strong an appeal to the power of mind, she flattered the intellectual attainments of her disciples. She thus contrived to build her fad on the three strongest foundations that could be found,—health of body, education of mind, and religious relief of soul. Yet she had something better still, and that was the name of her fad. Take a new system of philosophy now clamoring for recognition. It has a fairly good principle to begin with; its grain of truth is capable of rolling up around it a great deal of falsehood. It is the snowball inside the snow-man. But what of the name? America worships success. Success has been the standard of business, politics, war and even of morality. Pragmatism makes success the standard of truth. That is true which succeeds. A very promising principle! But look at the name. Anyone would be glad to answer to the name, Christian Scientist. Call a man Pragmatist or Ed-dyist, and he would think he had a new disease.

The antithesis and the antidote of faddism is common sense. A faddist is such because his little system has worn out a groove for him; it has eliminated the grade-crossings and never gives its passenger a glimpse of other truths. "If the truth could become a fad, it would be accepted by the Smart Set, but truth is something too large for that," says William Dean Howells. To cure a fad, you must have the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. A man with a liberal education, in the old sense of the term, could not be a faddist. It is significant that electivism and faddism are contemporaries. For a full-fledged electivist, anything can give an education. The high-priest of electivism some years ago argued that sawing and planing and hammering would give a liberal education. Now, not only the man who makes the book shelf has culture, but five feet of reading will do the work if a man has no time to do his own hammering. Electivism has stretched its little inheritance of truth to the point of breaking when it elected its short-shelf university course. The electivist was bound, unless he had inherited common sense, to become a faddist. At any rate, there was nothing in his education to cure him of it. Take, however, the man with a liberal education, an education that appeals to faculties rather than facts. He is persistently discouraged from tying himself down to any particular science or art. His mind is trained to see truth at any angle, and welcome it at every angle. He may not be very deep in any branch. He does not claim to be. His claim is rather that he can be deep wherever truth is, and he touches truth at so many points of the compass that he will not become profoundly immersed in it at N. N. W., and forget, as a faddist does, that the horizon is a circle with an indefinite number of points.

Fads go with time, but time is not a very speedy cure. It has taken nearly a century for Homer to get over Wolfism, and the news of the recovery has not yet reached everybody. Time had to choose a new president to one of our great universities before electivism began to shrink back to its proper dimensions. The new president has argued that electivism could not carry a foot-ball team through half a season. The coach prescribes the courses, and sees to it that they are faithfully followed by his students. A metaphor from athletics has dealt electivism the severest blow it has perhaps ever received.

The study of philosophy, which, before the age of electivism, always completed the course of a liberal education, is the most fundamental and thorough cure of fads and a tendency to fads. Moderns have accused the Scholastic philosophers of pushing their principles to conclusions with a blissful ignoring of facts. The Scholastic philosophers might retort that moderns have pushed facts into theories and systems with a blissful ignoring of principles. Common sense is the antithesis of faddism and Scholastic philosophy is admitted to be, even by its critics, the philosophy of common sense. Modernism, the latest theological fad, has a grievance against Scholastic philosophy. They say it is over-given to intellectualism; they are afraid to call it common sense. Tertullian said once that pagans were born Christians. Modernists began with that truth, closing their eyes to its limitations. Upon looking into the born soul and not finding it equipped with the "Summa" of St. Thomas, they concluded, not that their fad was deficient, but that these conclusions were the outcome of intellectual formalism, which seemed to them something uninviting and unbearable. Their souls were equipped with emotional informalism. To feel and not to reason was the way to truth. This is giving only one phase of Modernism, but it was a fad (we can now speak in the past tense) and resolutely propagated one phase of truth.

True philosophy seeks all truth, and seeks it at its fountain-head, where the stream runs clearest. It knows that God and religion and life and the human soul and the human body, too, are things which wholly refuse to be solved by one theory, or to be set forth in a mathematical formula. Scholastic philosophy may be made narrow or suffer misinterpretation, or sadden and confuse by insisting too much on the differences among its adherents, or it may run shallow by spreading too wide—but all that is against its professions and its prime purposes. In reading the language of facts in order to arrive at the understanding of principles, it will not pass over pages or skip lines or ignore words or even punctuation. The complete sense is arrived at by keeping in view all the elements of language. The knowledge of first causes is the profession of Scholastic philosophy; that is the sense it reads in the language of facts. Hence it is broad in its professions, whatever may be said of some of its professors. Give a student once in his life an outlook from the high level of philosophy; let him behold the boundaries of thoughts; let him learn the position of himself and his conclusions with reference to other people and other things. In mapping out thus the universe, he will recognize that his ideas are not coterminous with creation, and will see that it is metaphysical quackery to profess to solve all secrets by one formula. It savors of the fairy story to open all doors by one magic word. The man educated in the philosophy of the scholastics, who has been put through a course of systematized common sense, will never dwell in the land of fairies or of fads where it is pretended that all truth can be put in a nutshell. An age of facts without philosophy will inevitably be fertile in fads.

A Few Reasons Why

As I was riding north on a Hudson River train lately, admiring the beauty of the autumn foliage, an old gentleman of seventy-seven took the vacant seat next to me in the car. He became very soon communicative and quite chatty without having noticed that I was a Catholic clergyman. When he discovered what I was, I told him pleasantly I supposed he would now go away and seek another seat. "No, not now," said he; "I will not do that now, but there was a time when I would; but as I know you priests now I have gotten over many of my prejudices against you and your religion. When I was young I thought that the Catholic Church could not last fifty years in the free air of this country, but I was mistaken." "You forgot," I said, "that among the greatest lovers of liberty in the world have been and are Catholics." "Are your young people sticking to the Church and supporting it?" he queried. "Decidedly!" I replied. "Among the best of our Church people are young Americans. They fill our churches and receive the Sacraments." "Well," said he sadly, "I am sorry to say that is not my experience with my people. I have been over forty years pastor of a Congregational Church about a hundred miles from here, and my congregation has been rapidly dwindling away. The old folks went to church and paid their pew rent; the young ones stay at home and give nothing." His hair was white, his face thin and worn and he looked disappointed and worried. "Now," said he, "how do you manage to hold your people?" "Well," said I, "I shall tell you if you will not be offended." "I shall not be offended to hear the truth," he replied. "Then," said I, "you have lost your people by giving up three important things; and we hold our people by clinging to those very three things or divine institutions. Firstly, you have given up the Pope, so that you have no one to decide with certainty your disputes. Hence you disunite and scatter when you please. We keep together because the Pope, whom we consider the Vicar of Christ, quells rebellion and heals dissensions in our Church. Secondly, you have given up the "Mass," and consequently your religion is only a dry prayer, a hymn that is often neither good poetry nor good music, and a sermon, sometimes bad, sometimes middling, and seldom good. We cling to the "Mass" as the very soul of religion. It is our great sacrifice. Jesus Christ is really offered in It, and sacramentally offers Himself to us as our spiritual food. The Real Presence makes our churches temples of the living God; and if you visit them even when Mass is not being said, in the evening, for instance, you will find our people absorbed in adoration of the Living God, hidden behind the tabernacle on our altars. Our churches are always alive, for Jesus Christ is alive in them. Thus believe all our people." "Yes," said he, "I know what that means, but I find it too hard to believe." "Yet," said I, "men of the greatest intellects and of wonderful learning have believed and still believe it." "Well, what is the third reason?" he asked. "Confession," I replied. "When we are burdened with sin, crushed and sad under its load, we go to the priest, in whom we recognize the power divinely given to absolve, and to him as to a father, a judge and a physician, we contritely confess and go away consoled, relieved of our load and light of heart. You have thrown out Confession and you have no substitute for it. Hence sadness, moroseness, and no proper instrument of reform in the lives of your people." "Well," said he, "I believe in Confession, and I often wish we had something like it in my church. I often long for some friend in whom I could have absolute confidence, to whom I could confess my failings and from whom I could get advice. I have longed for that for many a day, but particularly since I have grown old." Thus the voice of nature in him was accordant with the voice of faith; but he had not the faith.

We paused for a while in our conversation and he seemed to be ruminating on something, when he suddenly said: "There's one thing you have not mentioned. I followed my cook one afternoon into the Catholic Church in my village to see what she was going to do there; and I found her going around from picture to picture of a series on the church walls. She got on her knees before each picture, prayed a while, and then went to the next one, repeated her devotions, and so on to the end of the circuit. I examined the pictures afterwards and found they were what you call 'Stations of the Cross.' I think they are a great help to devotion for every great event in Christ's life is vividly portrayed in them. Oh, your Church is a wise old institution." "Thank you," said I, "for the compliment; but I am sorry I cannot return you the compliment. But at any rate you see that pictures and statues are of some use in religion, and that your church made a mistake by expelling them." The locomotive whistle warned me that I had come to the end of my journey, so I left my venerable friend with a warm shake of the hand and a promise to say a prayer for him.

The Lesson of the French Census

A recent edition of the New York Sun took to itself the credit of having triumphantly refuted all assertions of French numerical decadence when it presented the fact that in 1908 France's birth-rate exceeded her death-rate, and her population had actually increased. A striking article in the October Ecclesiastical Review on "The Lesson of Race Suicide in France" presents this fact in quite another light. It is true that the birth-rate of 1908 exceeded that of 1907, but it is also true that, except for 1907, it was the lowest on record in the history of the French census, and that in 1907 the deaths exceeded the births by 20,000. All one can gather is that the decline in the French birth-rate, which has been going down steadily for years and has not been arrested, was in 1907 somewhat faster than usual. While Hungary has a birth-rate of 40 per 1,000, Austria 37, Germany 36, Italy 35, and England 29, France has only 20. Of the 11,315,000 families in France, 23 per cent. have but two children, 26.21 per cent. only one child, and 16 per cent. none. An average of four births to a family is considered essential to the healthy growth of a nation, but nearly 2,000,000 French families have no children, while the average is but slightly over two. Were Italian, Belgian, Swiss and German immigrants eliminated, even this average would be reduced and the increase for 1908 blotted out. Analysis of Government statistics will show that this decadence of population can only be accounted for by decadence in morality.

There is a great divergence in the birth-rate of different localities, but in every case one law prevails: Where religion flourishes the population increases, where religion is neglected the birth-rate declines, and, other conditions being the same, the number of children in a family is in inverse proportion to its wealth. There is continued increase in Brittany, Alsace-Lorraine and French Flanders, where religion is still flourishing; but such departments as Lot-et-Garonne and Gers, which are most impregnated with radicalism and irreligion, are precisely those where the birth-rate is lowest. To this class also belong the wealthy provinces of Burgundy and Normandy, while the poorer but religious departments of Finistère and la Vendée show the highest natality.

There are 12,500 prosperous communes in France, which have each less than 20 school-going children. This is one of the many alarming signs of France's decadence in numbers and consequently in national power; an examination into the immediate causes will show that it is rooted in moral decay. Isère is a type of the dechristianized department, and "the Dauphinois of Isère," says M. Helly, "has no children; he does not wish to have any because they constitute a heavy charge and for long years an unrenumerative capital. . . . It is esteemed a dishonor to have a numerous family; parents who do not restrict the number of births are considered no better than imbeciles."

Evil practices and the methods of procuring race suicide safely are taught by circulars and brochures to young and old and are even expounded in the Government schools. Attempts at prosecution by private persons proved fruitless, and the Government took no action whatsoever. When a committee, appointed by the State to inquire into the decrease of population, seemed likely to report that irreligion, immorality and the violation of the laws of nature were the main causes, the inquiry was promptly suspended. It had found that "an intimate connection existed between the steadily declining birth-rate and the campaign of dechristianization"; that births were highest where religious traditions were preserved and lowest where indifference prevailed; that the license allowed to art, theatre and press, and the facilities for divorce had, by corrupting morals, diminished the natural growth; and that consequently pornographic literature and the unnatural Malthusian propaganda should be sternly suppressed. But in its intense hatred of religion the Government that has been expending all its energy in its war against Catholicism, preferred to suppress the committee of scientific and patriotic Frenchmen rather than suppress the practices which are sapping the blood and strength of the nation.

There seems no doubt that should its present rate of decline continue the nation is doomed. In 1871 the populations of France and Germany were about equal; now, in the same territories, France has 39 millions and Germany 63 millions, in spite of the fact that Germany has lost heavily by emigration and France gained by immigration; and while France remains stationary, Germany is increasing by 900,000 a year. The lower the birth-rate, the lower the conscription list. M. Gervais, a radical deputy, reported on the Budget for 1909 that the army's effective strength, which is now 457,000 would, according to the present rate of decline in population, be reduced in 1925 to 380,000. France's "revenge" seems far distant; nature's revenge is making it impossible.

France is far away, but the same problem is in our midst. Writing in AMERICA a few weeks ago, Dr. Brann reported that the New England farmer had lost all religion, and we have been made painfully aware that the families of rural New England are as sterile as in the paganized districts of France. The same deadly unnatural evil, due to the same deliberate violation of the laws of nature and the decalogue, is spreading in town and country, and it is only a vast immigration that has so far prevented it from making itself felt in the census. We have not here the open propagation of immoral and unnatural practices that is reported from France, but it lurks under various guises in the advertisements of a thousand newspapers. M. de Foville, the eminent French statistician, cites for his countrymen the comment of a German professor: "More coffins than cradles; it is the beginning of the end. Thus are bound to disappear, through their own fault, those peoples who have broken with the fundamental laws of life."

There is still hope for France. In many populous districts faith and morals are still flourishing, and, in spite of the evil influence of a corrupt and corrupting government, there are signs of a moral awakening in departments where all seemed lost; but whether in France or the United States, there is only one law for the restoration of individual or nation to healthy and fruitful life: Back to the laws of nature and the Decalogue.

Religious and Parochial Census

II.

It would be too large a question to discuss the various ways in which a detailed knowledge of our numbers would be highly serviceable to the Roman authorities and, in consequence, to the Catholics of the United States; to the benefits already pointed out I shall merely add one other which I believe to be worthy of serious consideration. The Missionary Congress recently assembled in Chicago is fresh in the minds of all. It directed the attention of the whole world to the missionary activities of America in various directions. The number of converts (28,709 for 1908) yearly added to the one fold through the labors of the Church Extension and other missionary societies is most gratifying, and each parish receives a certain proportion of them, for no parish is without some converts. But while this addition is being made, is there not also a subtraction of no small proportion? If it be undoubtedly a laudable and meritorious work to go in search of the lost and strayed sheep, it cannot be less meritorious work to keep the sheep already in the fold from straying or being lost. There are many defections that ought to be prevented at all hazards because of their serious and far-reaching nature.

A crowd of emigrants from every clime under the sun annually land on our shores and then scatter throughout our vast territory. We know that a large proportion of these come from Catholic countries and are members of the Catholic Church. They are not sufficiently numerous and are too widely scattered to have a church of their own nationality. As they are unknown to the nearest pastor and kept strangers by reason of nationality, customs and language, a total alienation of the entire family from the Church is the result. Perhaps little more, for various reasons, can be done for the adults than the administration of the necessary sacraments and a nod or smile of recognition, highly valued by a stranger in a strange land; but how many thousand children could be saved that now fall an easy prey to the ubiquitous proselytizer, children usually of large families that could have been used as efficient missionaries in their own homes! All these should be definitely assigned to some pastor who in his pastoral zeal could, and would, extend a helping hand to them in their spiritual need. It is among this class, because of this neglect, that the greatest numbers of recruits for Socialism and Atheism are obtained.

In connection with this looms up the question of the descendants of these foreigners. A very clear decision was rendered by the Apostolic Delegate, Cardinal Martinelli, in a communication to the Archbishops and Bishops dated May 12, 1897:

"Children born in America of non-American parents who do not speak English, are not bound when they come of age to belong to their parents' parish, but are free to join a parish in which English or the language of the locality is used.

"Catholics who were not born in America, but who know English, have the right to become members of the church in which English is used and are not bound to submit themselves to the jurisdiction of a rector whose church was erected for a people speaking their own national tongue."

Granting to this large and ever-increasing class the liberty herein provided, a positive declaration on their part as to their choice in this matter would do away with much confusion and uncertainty in many localities and definitely fix their parochial obligations.

I believe I have answered satisfactorily, though not exhaustively, the question, "Will it pay?" Now a few words as to the mode of procedure. The zeal, energy and self-sacrifice of the American clergy is in evidence all around us and needs no panegyrist. We all want sincerely the honor of God and the salvation of souls, the twofold end of the priesthood. Assuming, then, that a correct enumeration of our Catholic people would greatly further this object, it is plain that previous methods adopted have not proved successful. We must greatly improve upon them or change them entirely.

No sporadic attempt will avail much. It is an herculean labor and requires the united action of the hierarchy supported enthusiastically by clergy and people. While we may safely leave the details in their hands, I may perhaps venture a few observations which, if not practical, may at all events open up some avenues of thought which will lead to practical results.

1. The first and paramount requisite for a successful and satisfactory enumeration is, I believe, expeditiousness, because of our nomadic and shifting population. No more than two months should be allowed; and from May to July, or from October to December would suggest themselves as appropriate seasons. Our people then are settled and conditions are favorable for rapid work.

2. A simultaneous earnest and repeated appeal should be made from every pulpit. Our religious press should be largely pressed into service at the same time. All this would prepare our people and facilitate the work of the enumerator. The secular press would not be able to ignore such a movement and would thus be forced to give valuable aid.

3. As by far the greater portion of printed matter would be common to all, a diocesan center or supply depot would greatly curtail the expenses connected with this work. All returns should be made to it and all bills paid by it and all appointments emanate from it.

4. The schedule should call for little more than location, name, condition (married or single), nationality and parish affiliations.

5. A schedule of this kind, as it does not trespass upon private grounds or matters of conscience, need not take up the valuable time of our busy priests, but could be successfully entrusted to laymen who would devote all their time and attention to the work and thus hasten the completion.

6. To stimulate the zeal and activity of the enumerators a per capita remuneration would be advisable, the expense to be defrayed by the respective congregations of which the persons enumerated have declared themselves members (in the case of foreigners or their descendants) or to which they have been officially assigned.

7. The adoption of a system similar to that of the letter carrier would ensure a house to house visitation when the enumerators would be required to call at every house in their respective districts. Catholics are often found in homes in one capacity or another where their presence is little suspected, and all these would swell the grand total.

A census of this kind would perhaps not be considered complete in all its details, but with this information as a guide, each pastor could, and should, go over the ground, fill out matters of a private nature, and such a house-to-house visitation would serve the purpose of verification. If we compare the first United States census with the last, we cannot fail to notice the great improvement. A similar result might be looked for in the Catholic census when the provisions of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore are enforced, which requires a real and conscientious revision of the "Liber Status Animarum" every two years.

The days when the sheep gathered around the shepherd, when they went in search of him and loved to be in his presence, alas, are days of the past. Our lot is cast upon an epoch where the shepherd must go in quest of the sheep, and with kindly but constant eye, protect them from hirelings and ravenous wolves. The one thousand and one societies and clubs, not positively interdicted by the Church, have a magnetic attraction, and their tendencies are gradually to alienate the sheep from the one fold into the open, unrestrained field of liberalism, atheism and socialism. Now more than ever the shepherd must be able to say: "I know mine, and mine know me." With the minimum of parochial obligations clearly defined, we must remember that we are dealing with a people daily growing in education and independence.

This condition of things renders all the more necessary an intimate acquaintance and personal understanding between pastor and flock. While enforcing by all gentle means clearly defined parochial obligations, these should be confined to essentials. Freedom should be granted in non-essentials, but Christian charity and disinterested zeal for souls should permeate both. The faithful shepherd should exercise such pastoral vigilance with regard to each individual soul committed to his care that, when called to render an account of his stewardship, he may be able to say with his prototype: "Of those whom Thou hast given me, I have lost not one," and find each name transferred from the "Liber Status Animarum" of his parish to golden letters in the Book of Life.

CORRESPONDENCE

Before the Ferrer Trial

ROQUETAS, SPAIN, OCTOBER 4, 1909.

The storming of the heights of Gurugú is the talk of Spain. While patriotic Spaniards are celebrating the brilliant victory of General Marina's forces the Liberals and Republicans, realizing that the campaign in Africa has falsified their prophecies of a national disaster, are now trying to recover their lost position by circulating exaggerated reports of the number of Spanish dead. Both of these political parties clearly perceive that the success of the Spanish arms, even despite Republican treason and Liberal hostility, is strengthening the position of Señor Maura. The Radical-Republican element, which experienced such sharp reprisals for their cowardly attacks on churches and convents, sees in the victory the return, in the near future, of a powerful and experienced force of troops to strengthen the city garrisons against further Republican uprisings. The victory of the Spanish troops sounds a death-knell, for the present at least, to Republican hopes. The closing of the lay schools, nurseries of sedition and irreligion, is probably the hardest blow the Republicans have received.

The outcome of the trial of Ferrer, the reputed leader of the late disorders, is awaited with interest. Threats of retaliation have been made by friends of Ferrer not only in Spain but also in France, Italy and Portugal. Each day brings new proof of French Freemasonry's aid to the Republicans during the late disorders. Some of Ferrer's captured papers have been published by the Government. They show a deep plot against religion and order. Besides attacks on churches and convents all banks and property of public men were to have been seized by the Republican "patriots." The general opinion, at present writing, is that there is more than sufficient evidence for the death penalty, though it is not known whether those who could present the evidence have done so. The Government has proceeded slowly and prudently and has not left its action open to any charge of injustice.

El Regional of Calatayud in Aragon states that its attention has been called to the new method adopted by the Protestant propaganda to dispose of the thousands of dollars it is wasting yearly in Spain. Not content, as El Regional states, with scattering Protestant bibles in the streets, the Protestant propaganda has started a mail service. Protestant bibles are now being sent by post to Catholic families. As the good Aragon Catholics drove the irreligious fugitives of Barcelona from their towns, one does not have to ask twice what is being done with the Protestant bibles. With a Catholic bible already in the house they find the Protestant text useful to start the morning fire. Wasting thousands of dollars yearly, with three or four thousand English and American adherents, the Protestant propaganda goes on. As long as New York and London furnish the money the Protestant bibles will be scattered broadcast through the most Catholic districts of Spain and glowing reports will be printed and sent to credulous English and American Protestants.

La Cámara de Comercio Francesa, of Barcelona, composed of French commercial residents of that city, has issued a formal statement that is important in view of the untruthful reports being circulated in the foreign press in regard to Spanish affairs. It gives a clear refutation of recent French newspaper articles. These French commercial men state that the vigorous action taken by Spanish authorities to suppress disorders was absolutely necessary; that the exaggerated reports of the Spanish Government's action and of the condition of affairs in Barcelona have injured international commerce; that the lives and property of strangers in the great city of the Mediterranean are as safe as in other parts of the world. The statement concludes with the request that one of their own leading French newspapers should send a representative to Cataluña to investigate the actual state of affairs. The request is an honest one, but as long as French Freemasonry continues to aid the Radical Republican in his war on religion and order we shall continue to read the "special telegrams" written in Paris rather than in Barcelona.

The Budget; The New Lord Mayor

LONDON, OCTOBER 2, 1909.

All the party organizations are busily preparing for a general election, though the Liberal papers and some of the prominent politicians on that side keep repeating that the House of Lords will not dare to block the way of the Finance Bill, as any interference with it would be an act of suicide. But there are some discords in the chorus of defiance. Sir Robert Perks, M. P., perhaps the most prominent of the Liberal Nonconformists, has been saying in a public speech that the Liberal party is marching to disaster. He reminded his hearers that an election is decided by the quiet silent voters who take no part in political meetings, and he did not hesitate to add that these voters largely belonged to the class that were afraid of Socialism and did not like the noisy patronage of the Budget by the Socialist party. Meanwhile the signs point to the dissolution being deferred till the new year. The Government is going slow with the Finance Bill. It has given up forcing the pace by means of night sittings and frequent use of the closure. It looks now as if the Bill would not go up to the Lords before the end of October.

A Catholic has been elected Lord Mayor of London for the coming year by a unanimous vote of the Corporation. Sir John Knill, the Lord Mayor elect, was born in 1856, and educated at the Jesuit Colleges of Beaumont (England), and Feldkirch (Austria), and studied for awhile at the Benedictine Abbey of Solesmes in France. His father, the first Baronet, who was Lord Mayor in 1892-93, may be said to have been the first Catholic Lord Mayor since the Reformation. For one can hardly count a naturalized Belgian elected a few years earlier, whose Catholicity was so dubious that he was a prominent Freemason and went in state with the Corporation to Protestant religious services. There was much opposition to the election of the first Sir John Knill and a great outcry when he entertained the late Cardinal Vaughan at the Mansion House and proposed the health of the Pope before that of the Queen. But Queen Victoria did not take offence at "Church" being given precedence of "State," for a few days later she promoted the Catholic Lord Mayor to a baronetcy. The Sir John Knill of to-day is a popular man even outside the circle of his co-religionists. I hear that he proposes to strip the Lord Mayor's Show of November 9th—his inauguration parade—of its unmeaning and inartistic pageantry, and make it a parade of the Territorial corps of the City and the Naval Volunteers. He is greatly interested in the revival of the apprenticeship system, and will give useful support to the movement during his term of office. He considers that much harm is done by boys being put to unskilled occupations as soon as they leave school in order to earn a few shillings a week, and holds that instead of their thus sacrificing their future they should, wherever possible, begin to learn a skilled trade in a workshop. A. H. A.

Two Anniversaries in France

Many American readers may be acquainted with certain old world cities of Northern France, that, during many years belonged to Spain. These Flemish towns: Lille, St. Omer, Arras, Valenciennes, although they have been French since the reign of Louis XIV, still retain many traces of their Spanish masters. Their gabled houses, and fine churches were built by the latter, who also bequeathed to their inhabitants a strong spirit of faith. In these days of scepticism, this is a marked characteristic of the citizens of these thriving cities; it comes to them as a precious heirloom from Spanish conquerors, who, whatever may have been their faults, were distinctly and, above all, fervent Catholics.

In one of these Flemish towns, Valenciennes, the month of October brings back two memorable anniversaries. One hundred and fifteen years ago, the big place was the scene of a tragedy that recent circumstances have brought more prominently before the worthy townfolk. The eleven Ursuline nuns, who on the 18th and 23d of October, 1794, were executed for the faith will probably be, in a near future, raised to the altars of the Church, and to their fellow citizens this is a matter of patriotic pride.

Like their fellow sufferers, the beatified Carmelites of Compiègne, these Flemish nuns were put to death solely for their faithfulness to their religious vocation. In the eyes of the harassed and impoverished French nuns of our day, their example has a peculiar significance; for the politicians of the twentieth century, who rule France, have inherited the spirit, if not the methods, of the men who, in 1794, sent our eleven Ursulines to a hideous death.

When, in 1792, the religious communities of the kingdom were dissolved and their members sent adrift, the Ursulines decided to seek an asylum in Belgium, where the Archduchess Marie-Christine, "governess" of the Low Countries, was a friend to religious orders. They were anxious, above all things, to remain faithful to their rules, and their Superioress, Mother Clotilde Paillet, of a good Flemish family, encouraged them in their resolve to remain together. The journey from Valenciennes to Mons seemed to these recluses a tremendous undertaking; the country was in a restless condition and the anxious travelers breathed a sigh of relief when they touched the hospitable Belgian soil. They were received with affectionate generosity by the Ursulines of Mons, of whose long established community their own was an off-shoot and, unconscious of the danger that loomed in the distance, the two communities settled down to their accustomed routine. Only a few weeks later, they were disturbed by the sound of cannon in the distance; the Austrian troops and the French Republicans were at war and, to their horror, the nuns soon learnt that the latter were victorious. The convent annalist, from whose quaint records we draw these details, owns that their terror was great for they knew "how the French were accustomed to act towards religious communities." On November 7, 1792, Dumouriez, the Republican general, entered Mons; scenes of pillage and violence followed and during four months the city was tyrannized over by the hated "Jacobins." In March, 1793, however, the French were obliged to retire: "We were out of our senses with joy," says our convent annalist, "and our Mother, seeing that we could not keep silence on such a day, allowed us to talk as much as we liked." Soon afterwards, news came that Valenciennes also had fallen into the hands of the Austrians and in November, 1793, after more than a year's exile the French Ursulines took leave of their kind hostesses and returned to their old home.

They found it in a miserable condition, the town of Valenciennes had been besieged and bombarded during their absence, but it was now in possession of the kindly Austrians and the Ursulines set to work to repair their convent and to reorganize their poor schools, little thinking that worse was to come. On June 26, 1794, they heard that their protectors, the Austrians, had been defeated at Fleurus and, on August 27, the French Republicans made their solemn entrance into Valenciennes. This time, Mother Clotilde Paillet had no thought of leaving her convent, she prepared her daughters for death: "We are the spouses of Jesus Christ," she said, "we must serve him in adversity as well as in prosperity," and when the Republican officials visited the convent, she received them with quiet dignity. A few days later, she was arrested and thrown into prison, together with her community and, from that day, she knew that her fate was sealed. The guillotine was now erected on the great place, the prisons of the town were filled to overflowing and executions, chiefly of priests, took place daily.

On October 17, five Ursuline nuns, Mothers Vanot, Prin, Bourla, Ducret and Déjardin, were summoned to appear before the Revolutionary tribunal. They were accused of having resumed their religious habit and of remaining faithful to their rules; to the questions put to them they answered with straightforward simplicity: "Why did you return to France?" "To teach the Catholic, Roman and apostolic religion," replied Mother Laurentine Prin. They were condemned to death, together with three priests, who were tried at the same time. On returning to the prison they informed their anxious companions of the fate that awaited them and proceeded to prepare for death. Some of their fellow prisoners, who eventually were saved, have minutely recorded the scene. Mother Natalie Vanot, one of the five, took the lead; she placed a crucifix on a table and, on her knees, she began to recite the prayers for the dying, to which her companions responded. The other nuns, weeping and agitated, crowded round the little group: "My dear mothers, leave us," said one of the victims, "we must now think only of appearing before God." When the prayers were ended, Mother Natalie turned to the nuns who had not been condemned and, in the name of her fellow sufferers, begged their pardon if, at any time, they had caused their sisters any pain or annoyance; then she addressed her superioress, thanked her for her kindness and affection and begged her blessing. Mother Clotilde was a "valiant woman," who faced danger and death for herself with an unmoved countenance, but she was also a tender hearted mother and her tears fell fast as she blessed the five who were about to die. The youngest of the little band, Madeleine Déjardin, laughingly remonstrated with the weeping superioress: "Mother, you, who so often encouraged us to be brave, are now distressed to see us crowned. What a contradiction!" The cheerfulness of this young sister almost shocked her jailers; in the morning, when summoned to the tribunal, she came forward smiling: "Here I am, do not take the trouble to look for me!" "Thou art very gay, citoyenne," observed the man. "Why not," was the reply, "when I fear nothing?"

was now at the prison gate, and the executioner proceeded to cut the victims' hair and to tie their hands behind their backs. They submitted to these formalities with a smile; in fact, says the account of an eye witness, the five nuns who were going to die were the only cheerful members of the frightened, weeping, agitated crowd of prisoners. When all was ready, the procession set out, drums were beating and, surrounded by their military guards, the five Ursulines walked quietly through the crowded streets. The good people of Valenciennes stood awe struck to see them pass; they marked their radiant look of joy and the fervor with which they recited the Miserere, the Litany of Our Lady and the Magnificat. At last the "place du Grand Marche" was reached and the hideous outline of the guillotine stood out against the autumn sky. "Courage, my sisters," said one, "we are on the way to heaven." In her impatience to die, Mother Déjardin pressed forward, but Mother Natalie Vanot's name had been called first: "One minute, dear sister," she said sweetly, "it is my right to begin."

Twenty-four years later, an Ursuline nun, named Angélique Lepoint, who had been trained by Mother Clotilde, came back to Valenciennes and founded an Ursuline convent, but not, alas, in the former building, where her martyred sisters had prepared for death; these had been confiscated and dismantled. In a new house, called St. Sauloe, the twentieth century religious are waiting, in patience and in prayer, for whatever the future may hold in store. So far, although their schools have been closed, their community has not been broken up and the cheerful endurance of their martyred sisters is a lesson that is ever before their eyes. To the worthy citizens of Valenciennes, the anniversary of the Ursulines' execution is a sacred memory, which may, one day, when the Church has given her verdict, become a day of public rejoicing.

AN ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

Hungary.

The anti-clerical program in Hungary has, much against the will of its framers, become public, a fact making it apparent how little humanitarian principles have in common with the real objects of the Lodges.

The program states that first and foremost Christianity, particularly Catholicity, must be combated and by the following means:—the secularization of church property, anti-clerical agitation in the press, the foundation of a special anti-clerical organ, and the State management of schools and teachers' training colleges.

The new Hungarian Province of the Society of Jesus was established by order of the General on the 7th of September last, feast of the Hungarian martyr, von Kassa, and of two Jesuits martyred by the Calvinists.

The Society is regarded with increasing favor in Hungary and the establishment of the new Province has occasioned much satisfaction amongst the Catholics of the land. Under Maria Teresa (1740-80) the Hungarian "Landtag" frequently expressed a desire to see the Jesuits established in Hungary, and in recent times the order has been offered the direction, under the most favorable conditions, of colleges and universities, but lack of members has prevented the acceptance of these offers.

The new Province, which at present comprises two hundred members, two colleges and three other houses will, no doubt, soon be in a position to supply the deficiency.

The Ruthenians of northeastern Hungary are at present much disturbed in consequence of the revival of an old law forbidding the use of their language in the State schools, though permitting its use for religious instruction in some of the higher classes. In case of refusal to comply with the law, teachers are threatened with fines and retention of salary. Though it is reasonable that the German language should be the medium of instruction in schools with a small number of Ruthenian or Magyar children, one would like to remind Graf Apponyi, Minister of Religion, who, though a Catholic, is somewhat too liberal in his views, that the State possesses no authority to dictate what language or method shall be used in imparting religious instruction. The retention of salaries, in themselves a poor compensation for other confiscated church property, is nevertheless a crying injustice. The Ruthenian bishops of Hungary have strongly protested against the revived law.

The Hungarian Catholic Congress, held this year from the 29th to the 31st of August at Szeged, one of the largest cities of Hungary, was attended by about 20,000 Catholics. Satisfactory reports were read concerning the Catholic Federation, which has an actual membership of 220,000. Dr. O. Prohászka, Bishop of Székesfehérvár, in a weighty and thrilling speech voiced the Catholic National Program in a manner that not only called forth the approval and enthusiasm of his auditors, but created a stir throughout the land.

Another important speech was that of Dr. Karl Bonta, a lawyer, who emphasized the advantage of Sodalties as a means of renewing and preserving the true religious spirit amongst Catholic men. He also pointed out how ineffectual the support of the press, clubs and similar organizations must be without the underlying principles of active faith, and mentioned the Viennese Sodalties as examples of the good obtainable by such societies.

THE CATHOLIC FEDERATION IN HUNGARY.

On the 1st of June, 1909, the Hungarian Catholic Federation possessed 200,659 members; 123,551 Hungarians, 42,820 Germans, 31,116 Slawaks, and 3,172 Croats. On the 1st of December, 1908, the number of members was 140,469, the increase within five months being 60,210 or 43 per cent. There are 2,555 districts in the country possessing members, and 1,960 places possessing 20 members each. During the last five months 1,350 meetings have been held not including the ordinary weekly, fortnightly and monthly ones. Four diocesan meetings, four Central-Committee meetings, and one General Assembly for the whole land have taken place. The Central Committee transacted during this period 9,823 affairs of importance, and distributed 1,015,000 brochures, 225,000 leaflets, and 16,800 Agitations-schriften, in all 1,256,800 copies. The courts employed four lawyers and jurists, and fourteen other legal officials; in 120 cases free legal advice and assistance were given.

The receipts of the Federation amounted to 203,500 crowns and the expenses to 61,700 crowns. The Archbishop of Kalocsa, Dr. J. Vároay, and Dr. J. Firezek are lending their support to the Federation.

At present Hungary possesses only a temporary government, the dissensions of the various parties preventing any lasting settlement of the difficulties. Whichever party gains the ascendancy will have to make electoral reform the first act of its administration, and under the new system the Catholic Federation will not fail to prove its strength.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Editors and Anarchists

When a few years ago President McKinley was murdered by an anarchist, our leading dailies hysterically demanded the immediate execution of the criminal and the most drastic suppression of Anarchistic propaganda. There was practical unanimity that not only the actual murderers of public officials should be promptly executed, but also the advocates of murder, as being far more guilty than their dupes; and legislators were busy drafting laws to that effect. This was all very well for the United States, and similar action might have been tolerated in England or Germany, but when Spain puts the principles they had advocated into practice, our editors experience a change of heart. The speedy execution of the Chicago anarchists met with general approval, and bomb-throwing and its advocates have never been popular among us; but when Spain, overlooking the dupes, puts its finger on the cause and executes the prime organizer of murder, our editors for the most part raise indignant protest. Under such circumstances it is pleasant to find one leading daily speaking manfully for right principles and asserting for Spain what is incumbent on orderly government everywhere. The New York Evening Sun, October 14, pronounces Alfonso's decision to disregard personal consequences and let justice take its course, "the most courageous act of his reign," and continues:

"Ferrer must have realized that he was but paying a penalty for which he had bargained. He had openly incited the disturbances at Barcelona. Such disturbances are not put down with rose-water. . . . The appeal to the King's generosity was absurd. The injury had been done to the State, not to him, as its head; but, as its head, it was his duty to keep his hands off."

Was this Anarchistic professor less guilty than the ignorant men who killed and burned at his command in Barcelona? What would our editors say had New York been the scene of Ferrer's operations? We believe our leading organs have not diagnosed public opinion correctly. The day has passed when the American people will condone criminality merely because a Catholic State or ruler is the object of attack.

Spain and the Press

From Central Europe to our Pacific Coast a certain class of newspapers have taken up their parable against Spain. Its king is an idiot; its government a tyranny; its courts the instruments of judicial murder. The reason of this outcry is obvious. The king is a Catholic, the Government is Catholic. They have shown surprising energy in suppressing a formidable insurrection. The tribunals, undeterred by the clamor of Anarchists, are blending justice with mercy in meting out to the leaders of the rebellion the punishment of their crime. Three months ago the revolutionists of Europe were confident of success in replacing the Spanish monarchy with an anti-Christian republic modelled on that which now misgoverns France. They failed and affect astonishment that their agents have to pay the price of failure. Suppose the case reversed, that French Catholics, goaded to desperation, had risen, not against the republic but against those who now use it to persecute religion. One does not need a very strong imagination to picture to himself the virtuous indignation with which the present apologists of anarchy would have denounced the crime of rebellion, and their eagerness in demanding bloody vengeance on the rebels. The Spanish Government is legitimate, it has the same right that all lawful governments have to defend itself against rebels from within or aggressors from without. We have yet to learn that it has not the support of the Catholic people of Spain in its religious policy. The clamor of the irreligious press persuades us that this is the case, the more so when we see how, to influence Catholic opinion, they represent the Spanish Government as going contrary to the wishes of the Pope in the matter of the execution of Ferrer. Our readers may rest assured that the revolutionary press knows nothing of what the Pope thinks or says, and that the edifying stories which have been circulated during the past few days have been manufactured in the councils of the Revolution.

The Visits of Porfirio Diaz

Thirty-five years have passed by since Porfirio Diaz first visited the United States. He did not come then on a pleasure trip nor to greet the President. He established himself at Brownsville, Texas, where he devoted his energies and undoubted military skill towards helping on the revolution against Sebastian Lerdo de Tejada y Corrial, at that time President of Mexico.

The two objects aimed at by the leaders of the revolutionary forces were to secure the country against the re-election of a president and to prevent election frauds. In March, 1876, Diaz crossed the Rio Grande with forty followers. After some successes, he made his second visit to the United States, stealing back across the river and journeying quietly to New Orleans, whence he succeeded in reaching Vera Cruz. Five months later, he was provisional President of Mexico. Since that time he has ruled Mexico, and excepting the term of 1880-1884 he has had the title of President.

During the term of President Gonzales, which was an accidental and purely nominal interruption of his own administration, General Diaz entered the United States for the third time. He visited Washington, where he was entertained by President Arthur, and proceeded as far north as New York and Niagara Falls, everywhere the recipient of tokens of welcome and respect.

By Section 2, Article 84, of the Mexican Constitution, President Diaz needed the permission of the House of Deputies to leave Mexican soil on his visit to President Taft. This fourth visit, though devoid of political significance, marks an epoch, nevertheless, for, if we mistake not, it is the first time that a President of Mexico has been outside his jurisdiction in time of peace.

The guard of honor of 3,000 troops which attended Diaz at Ciudad Juarez was a larger force than he had commanded in most of the engagements from the time of his armed resistance to President Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana in the early fifties to his overthrow of Lerdo and Iglesias in 1876.

Whatever may be said against President Diaz and his government, never could one of his fifty predecessors make so respectable a showing on an occasion of ceremony. When Diaz galloped up to the presidential chair, Mexico was discredited abroad, impoverished and rent by civil war at home. Thirty-five years have transformed the country. People say that Diaz is Mexico. So be it. The hale old soldier has kept peace and promoted prosperity. Mexico will never requite him as he deserves. His is a firm hand, but a firm hand was needed in a country which had seen over fifty rulers within sixty years.

Morals, Religion, and President Hall

Is the moral education of the American child possible without religion? Of course it is, one may answer, and may prove his assertion by pointing to the children of our public schools, who certainly are not without morality. But the question is not to be settled so easily. Religion is not taught formally in the public schools, but these will have a certain religious atmosphere as long as teachers and pupils find, for example, the last reason against lying in the eighth commandment and in favor of obedience in the fourth. On the other hand, every observer sees that with a growing vagueness in religion, morality is growing more unsettled, and many conclude that when the former vanishes the latter will vanish with it. The President of Clark University undertakes to reassure these. He asserts that moral education is possible without religion. This is not quite to the point. The question is not about an abstract possibility, but about the concrete possibility in the case of the American child. A biologist may demonstrate that oxygen is not necessary for organic life. Organic beings that could flourish in an atmosphere of dilute chlorine are quite conceivable, but it is absolutely certain that in this world we cannot get on without oxygen. We must therefore presume that Dr. Hall has the American child in view. He goes abroad for his proof as far as Japan. Moral education without religion succeeds in Japan; therefore it can succeed in America. The argument is not convincing. Children thrive on seal-oil and blubber in Greenland; would ours thrive on this diet? Supposing for a moment that Japanese education is unreligious and that it results in morality, one may not ignore the fact that our children are Christian, living in a civilization established on Christianity, and permeated with moral principles drawn from the Christian religion, while the Japanese are nothing of the sort. But is education in Japan unreligious? The Japanese are adepts in concealing their sentiments, and who of us has penetrated their inmost thoughts on religion? Has Dr. Hall? He tells us that the virtues inculcated in the schools of Japan are made binding on the conscience by the edict of the emperor, which was received with almost as much veneration as if it had come from heaven. There is more in this than Dr. Hall thinks, though he acknowledges that the adoration of the emperor gives to the system something of divine adoration. Whence does the emperor derive his divinity? Is Dr. Hall sure that above him there is not in the Japanese mind some notion of the God of whom St. Paul speaks, the rewarder of men according to their works?

Dr. Hall admits that one country has tried the experiment he would wish to see tried in America. France has determined that its children shall be educated without religion. For this it is necessary to eradicate every religious idea from their teachers' minds and from theirs. The present Government set about the business in earnest. Dr. Hall acknowledges rather unwillingly that the result has been disastrous. His apology for the failure is lame, because he will not forsake his position. Some day the American people, perhaps, will be wiser.

The Propagation of the Faith

Last week, His Grace, Archbishop Farley, issued a circular to the pastors of the archdiocese of New York calling attention to the work of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. Doubtless similar appeals are being made by the other archbishops and bishops of the United States to their respective charges. The time has come when more strenuous efforts must be made by Catholics if they have at heart the permanence of the glory and prestige hitherto acquired in many lands by the zeal and success of Catholic missionaries. The disintegration of Protestantism so noticeable in the United States seems to result strangely enough in rallying the various sects to the exploitation of foreign missionary fields. Several causes conspire towards this. The hostile attitude of the State in Catholic countries has diverted the attention of Catholics from the wants of the missions and missionaries to the more imperative duty of providing Christian instruction for their children. Moreover, the opening up of the Dark Continent, the proclamation of freedom of worship in the dominions of the Sultan, and above all the severance of the ties which bound to Spain the last of her dependencies, are presenting opportunities to recoup their losses at home which Protestant missionaries welcome with enthusiasm. The result is that whereas Protestantism is virtually dead or moribund at home, it apparently is endowed with fresh vigor and aggressiveness abroad.

Archbishop Farley pertinently inquires of the Catholics under his jurisdiction: "Are we doing all we can? Can we not do something more? Each pastor can best answer after a glance at the yearly amount his parish contributes to this laudable work." Aware of the many difficulties that priests and people have to face in supporting local activities, His Grace has no desire to add a new burden. Experience, however, has shown that many poor parishes are generous contributors to the truly Catholic work of the Propagation of the Faith without any apparent diminution of their slender resources. It would be a most commendable work and productive of gratifying results if, as His Grace suggests, local branches of the Society were established where this has not already been done. And he adds: "What an impetus would be given to the missions if this most deserving work of charity, so heartily recommended by the present Sovereign Pontiff, were organized in every parish, great and small, throughout the country."

• A Typical French Bishop

Mgr. Gibier, Bishop of Versailles, is a typical militant prelate of the new school. When he was parish priest at Orleans he revolutionized his parish in the sense of transforming it from a dead to a live one. Chosen by the Holy Father himself as one of the now famous fourteen bishops consecrated in Rome almost immediately after the Separation Act had become law, he brought to the administration of the Diocese of Versailles the same spirit of initiative and reform which had characterized his parish work. So remarkable is Mgr. Gibier's activity that Le Temps deemed it worth its while to have the Bishop of Versailles interviewed by one of its ablest editors. The interview, which appeared in a recent number of this influential Paris journal, is a long and interesting one, from which the following extracts are made. "The organization about which you ask me is not perhaps so complete as kindly-disposed people imagine. There is still much to be done, but we will do it. The Separation surprised us, we must admit, almost in a deep sleep. We did not expect this awakening, we were not equipped for the apostolic life which must now be ours. Everything had to be improvised. A change had to be wrought in the habits of a clergy accustomed to act merely on the defensive, and little prepared for the methods of conquest which generally belong to missionary countries. However, the storm did not carry us away, and here we are, forging ahead to reconquer lost positions and rebuild the ruined house. As for the Diocese of Versailles, our organization, of which many do me the too great honor of saying that it is a model, is very simple: at the bottom, the parish committee, presided over by the pastor or by a layman approved by the bishop, and attending to all the religious, moral, and material interests of the parish; above that, the cantonal committee, federating all the parish committees of the canton, centralizing the Catholic forces scattered throughout the canton, promoting the Catholic press and other forms of propaganda, stimulating education, young people's societies, charitable and social undertakings, associations to keep an eye on the secular schools, etc." This entire organization is directed by the diocesan committee and quickened into ever growing life by the cantonal congresses, of which twenty-seven have been held this year. On being questioned by the editor as to politics, Mgr. Gibier said he forbade his clergy to meddle with purely political matters. "We stand," said the Bishop, "on the sacred platform of religion and on that alone. The struggle may be a long one, but it will be less long than if we had accepted the chain of the cultural associations." The editor of the Temps concludes with this remark: "Mgr. Gibier seems to be everywhere at once. He goes from committee to committee, from congress to congress, from a sermon to a meeting. He is joyful, trustful, bold. He excites the enthusiasm of many, the anger of others. He is the typical bishop of the Separation."

Some writers are questioning the accuracy of calling Verrazano "the discoverer" of the Hudson, because France failed to colonize its banks. This argument would make Cartier also an impostor, with many others. In 1524 pearls and gold were the lures to adventure, and Verrazano brought back neither. While treasures lasted mere land was not appreciated. Now comes one Forrest Morgan in the Hartford Courant, October 7, who brushes aside John Fiske as a credulous historian, declaring maps, charts and documents spurious and the whole story a hoax. This new authority will have also to supersede Harris, Weise, Justin Winsor, Desmarquets. Verrazano's story is false, he says, since he makes no mention of wampum and tobacco. He does describe wampum picking, but if tobacco is a necessary guarantee to a discoverer's good faith, Sir Walter Raleigh is the real Columbus.

HALS & REMBRANDT.

For those who do not know the European galleries, and even for those who do, here is an exceptional opportunity to study the masters of Dutch painting in the seventeenth century. The Rembrandts alone would be an education in matters artistic, they are so numerous and so good, but Hals holds his half of the field, visor up. Next to these two, who are undoubtedly paramount, comes the group of Hobbema, Ruysdael, Vermeer, Pieter de Hoogh with his scènes intimes, Cuyp with his golden skies, Steen of the merry-makers and Jan Van de Capelle of the pearl-grey winter views.

One is embarrassed by all these riches. What to select, what to point out, where nothing should be overlooked. But in the end, Rembrandt seems to cry out for supremacy. Hals is willing to waive his privilege of a couple of decades of seniority; at the last he will speak for himself.

Rembrandt's general characteristics should be called to mind. The rich, deep, sober tone of his canvases, his profound and observant sense of the harmonies, and that fine intexture of gold in the color-weave that makes the complete effect so warm and satisfying. Then there is his peculiar, partial lighting, a somewhat arbitrary arrangement, though in his chiaroscuro he is true to the shadow-play of whatever light he has chosen to have. And again we should take note of what Light in itself was to the masters of Holland, and, in a special way, to Rembrandt. It is not color, it is an agent apart acting upon and modifying the appearances of color; it is not modelling, though modelling in painting cannot exist without light; it is the supreme alchemy that transfigures; one of the greatest difficulties, and the supreme reward. In the somewhat darkened condition of Rembrandt's canvases the light-painting is perhaps not so apparent as it is in, say, the rutilant pictures of Sorolla, or the flame-white bravery of Torn, but Sorolla at least works in the open air; Torn seeks interiors where the sunshine streams, and neither one of these attains to the peculiar subdued strain of gold in the tone which seems to be one of Rembrandt's special characteristics. His use of yellow, which is luminous in itself, should be noticed, and the fine harmonies he obtains with it in the "Sybil," the "Lucretia," the "Noble Star," and his own portrait in brown and gold, No. 94. A reddish line (this is a trait of his latter years) predominates in the "Standard Bearer," at least in the flesh tints, for the background is exceedingly dark. The same might be said of the Magdalena Van Loo (wife of the painter's son Titus) were it not that, in this canvas, there is a good deal of soft, suffused light. The young woman's tired and worn face is painted most pensively and psychologically and with the great care of affection so that one realizes the master must have been at his task slowly and with profound observation. The portrait is generally called the "Lady of the Pink"; she holds the flower in her hands, light kindles the hands and the flower, and this roseate key of the carnation spreads outward in warmth. It is a pity that this interesting picture should have an abominable modern surface of shiny varnish. In the same room No. 92, the portrait of a young man, shows the lower part of the face in light and strong in modelling and the upper part in the deep shadow cast by his high-crowned, broad-brimmed hat. A shadow of this kind common to many of Rembrandt's works could only be due to the lights coming from above, and gives one something to think about regarding Rembrandt's studio. At the same time there is a patch of light on the wall behind the figure. The Titus, which is the companion piece for the Magdalena, has the same sort of sad, over-burdened air and the same workmanship. They were done probably quite at the end of Rembrandt's life and it is almost painful to recollect that the young husband and wife died very soon after the painting, one year apart, and the aged father followed in the twelve month. In the face of Titus seems to be some premonition of the end already. And in the father's eyes and hand, as he looked on these two faces, one can read some underlying sorrow of the heart. On the opposite wall you can see his own countenance in age: it is rather heavy and the eyes brood. He had thought a great deal when he painted that, though the date is only 1658 and he has eleven more years to live. But in Holland three hundred, or less, years ago, there were other things besides feastings and banquetings. And the master of Dutch painting knew. Three pictures in which the personality is particularly attractive, the subjects all happen to be youthful, are the "Young Painter," the soldier "Marquis of Andelot," and the "Girl at the Window" (from the Chicago Institute.) The artist is leaning forward, eager, his drawing-board on his knee, his eyes almost furtive in the shadow, his whole countenance watchful. He is so intent on his model he knows nothing about you and me. One is reminded of the hunter stalking game. The eyes think, the mouth is close and earnest. Speech and laughter are not things for him. There is this to be done and it is his task. The black velvet cap shading his forehead and reddish-brown cloak add to his picturesqueness. Charming and admirable is the likeness of Marquis d'Andelot. It is quite one of Rembrandt's most pictorial and romantic depictions, unique in pose, and the lines compose agreeably. The boy, he may be eighteen, is buckling on his belt. The face, warm in color, is truly the face of a youth of high degree, bred to strength and yet modest. The lad wears a breast plate and greaves. The hands are the hands of a man, and the strong light strikes them, knuckle and ruddy fingers, as they come forward in the active drawing of the strap. The background is warm and fused. On a table beside him lies his helmet with something that looks like a green sprig or a bit of foliage to adorn it. It is one of the works of Rembrandt's early manhood, dating 1634. The "Portrait of a Girl" is an old acquaintance, but fortune gave us to find it with the sunshine waving over it and we were back in Amsterdam two hundred years ago. There are miracles in it that the dust and dirt will not let us see. The girl is leaning her two hands upon the window-sill, and one of them is in light and the other in shadow. Her attitude is rather square, not specially graceful, but she must have been comely among the plain Dutch housewives of her day for she is attractive still. Her chief beauty is her freshness, and her youth—they are untouched still. She stands there with absolute naturalness of pose and expression, a quiet figure, set against a cool grey-brown background, and her face is smooth, happy no doubt, fluid of line and pure of color. The brows and eyes are well drawn and the same may be said of the mouth, which has subtle curves and is full of expression. The lips' rose matches exactly, as one sees it in life sometimes, the string of coral beads around her neck. The dress is brownish, the apron of an unrecognizable tint called green; but wait for the sun to light up the velvet lower-sleeve between wrist and elbow: it is a wonderful color betwixt russet, or port, or golden brown. "The sun will do something for the crisp hair, too, drawn off the brow; there are gleams of gold in it you would never have suspected, and you grow to wonder more and more at this Rembrandt and his work. There are many more canvases we would like to mention but must be satisfied to pass on, calling attention merely to "The Gilder," not for loveliness or interest, because the painting in it is so remarkable. The little man, his name was Herman Doomer, but that is of small consequence, sits looking cheerfully outward with his rather sunny face, big hat, flat ruff and brown citizen's coat. He is satisfied with himself and the world. It is a plebeian type with a redeeming touch of wit, but the perfection of the execution and the finish make it a marvel to the observer. We would like to say a word about Rembrandt's own self-portraits.

He painted a number of them, and they are so sincere that we can follow him almost year by year, but it is our humble opinion that some of the so-called portraits are not likenesses of the master. Take the tiny (nine by seven) panel, (No. 74) done when he was about nineteen, and master it thoroughly. It is wonderfully painted but above all it is so faithful that it will stamp itself upon your mind forever. The complexion is fair and florid, the hair curly and rendered by browns and yellows, the eyes—not set far apart—are red-lidded (he does not spare us the detail and it speaks volumes for his candor), the sharp, strong outline of the nose combines with the jaw to make the visage forceful; the mouth has a certain air of sweetness in spite of all the shortcomings of the other features. He is an ugly fellow, perhaps, but not so very ugly. Between the brows is a vertical mark that speaks of concentration. It is there from his youth. The sketch is marvelous for its maturity of workmanship and the genuineness of its expression. Now this face goes through a score of portraits and it is impossible to mistake it. On the same wall, age 38, he is not much changed, only dresses more handsomely, black velvet and fur; in No. 94 himself again in a brick red cap, pearl earrings, and looking rather worn, date 1650. In the three-quarter length likeness, same features, somewhat flabby and the air of desolation growing. But it is the identical Rembrandt. We take the liberty of questioning Nos. 75 and 76. In the former the youth looks more as if he might be a kinsman of Saskias; reddish hair, mild blue eyes, a rather melancholy nose swollen at the bridge and nothing of young Rembrandt's blunt and vigorous air of determination. Of No. 76 we should say that the man was a Spaniard. Rembrandt knew his colors and his complexion is distinctly olive. The eyes are a positive brown, not hazel; the whole bone structure is different, narrow and elongated; the lower lip is full and rather protruding, quite unlike the boyish sweetness of Rembrandt's mouth; and this brow is smooth as a woman's, the cleft between the eyebrows wanting. Besides, as both these portraits are dated 1631, and the type in each is totally different, do they not contradict one another and spoil each one the other's claim.

To turn to Hals, we think the two portraits in the first room, Nos. 35, 41, are among the finest and quite characteristic of his style. In both, the figures stand upright, uncompromising and detached from their backgrounds. Hals is no psychologist, but a tremendous craftsman. You may have heard he does not draw, but he draws so admirably he does not need a pencil; no painter understands ground-work more thoroughly, not even Rembrandt. And he may not have Rembrandt's color-sense, but look what he does with clear black and white, distinct, trenchant, forceful and so satisfying you do not miss the fuller palette.

In No. 41 the expression holds you: critical eyes, a potently limned shut mouth, and a general air of close scrutiny and observance. The head is bare and one sees clearly Hals' peculiar treatment of hair, fine black lines showing the wave or movement of it. The complexion is florid and vividly painted, the background grey and rather cold, but the black and white of the garments strike the dominant notes and are held paramount. A faint passage of mauve and green, in the end of a sash passing under the doublet, is quite subordinate. The "Portrait of a Lady" (No. 40), illustrates Hals' power of depicting, not character, but a special facial expression. Seated in her easy chair, with her hands clasped before her, she turns with a half-smile of curiosity and bonhomie. She will probably be glad to gossip, a touch of scandal will not come amiss, yet at heart she likes you. It is a robust piece of observation and of consummate execution. Black and white again, a pale panel of red-rose in the dress and a glimpse of church spires in the distance. Note the rendering of the plump small hands and intertwined fingers. Hals, when you come to think of it, in technique, was exactly where they are to-day in Paris.

LITERATURE

Characters and Events of Roman History, by GUGLIELMO FERRERO, Litt. D. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Price, $2.50 net.

"The fundamental force in history is psychologic and not economic." Having laid down this eminently sane principle in his preface, Prof. Ferrero introduces us to a series of eight highly entertaining popular lectures on Roman history and its influence. "Corruption" as bewailed and inveighed against by the stern old Roman censors of public life and private morals, he views as a natural departure, at the outset, from older and simpler ideals, a departure due to a multiplication of wants through a multiplication of means for their gratification. This departure may, and did, become so pronounced in the Roman world that moral, political and religious principles gave way to utility and expediency, public spirit began to wane, and the family suffered. Thus it fell out in Rome, thus he finds it to-day in Europe, and can see it looming up in the dim distance of America's future. One of the most striking effects of the individualism, which results from advanced civilization and increased wealth is seen in the low birth-rate so portentously noticeable in France and more so in New England, which, as far as its native population goes, is more sterile than France.

The development of Gaul, Nero and Julia and Tiberius are the lectures that seem to give us the clearest insight into the Roman spirit and prepotency. Caesar went to Gaul by accident and made it a Roman province as a bold political expedient. An empty treasury turned the thoughts of Augustus towards the distant province, poor, unknown, unpromising, whose rapid increase in taxable wealth kept Rome from starvation and debt and warded off the soft sybaritism of the eastern provinces which eventually proved mightier than the Roman legions.

Here and there we find a proposition, startling by its novelty, which cannot claim unqualified assent. "Augustus and Tiberius were two great enemies of Christian teachings because they sought by all means to reinforce Roman tradition." "Nero, with his repeated efforts to spread Orientalism in Rome, and chiefly with his taste for art, was unconsciously the collaborator of future Christian propaganda."

We submit that the efforts of the former to restore Roman simplicity, frugality and respect for the marriage tie, even if they were appeals to national tradition, were a far better preparation for the reception of the gospel than the players and singers and actors and other debauching elements introduced from the decayed and degenerate East by the half-mad and wholly criminal libertine who could guide the assassin's dagger to his virtuous mother's throat. The faith could exalt and sanctify the moral qualities of the sturdy, uncontaminated Romans; it could do more, for it could and did reform the slaves of that voluptuousness which Nero's life made fashionable. Some have seriously proposed the introduction into darkest Africa of Mohammedanism with its polygamy as an introductory step towards Christianity!

In one other respect our civilization has reached the Roman standard, viz., the world nowadays aims at an economic unity or industrial federation, "regarding with indifference every effort put forth to establish moral or ideal uniformity." This is, largely speaking, a plain statement of a hard fact. As "nothing succeeds like success" and success in the material order is most easily seen, an overweening desire to achieve that same success may take possession of the life and rule the actions of a community to whose ears moral and ideal uniformity is a hollow, empty sound. Such a community is bound to be of the earth, earthy.

The history of Rome is the history of the world, for unity and universality are its characteristics. The thoughtful reader will find lessons for all times in the story of the growth, glory and decay of Roman greatness. Men are not the mere playthings of material forces; they are affected but not controlled by their environment.

Laborers in God's Vineyard. By MADAME CECILIA. New York, Cincinnati, Chicago: Benziger Brothers.

This booklet claims a wider field than the Catholic Women's League of England, to whom the eight lectures it embodies were first addressed.

Madame Cecilia has no objection to women obtaining "a place in the Constitution." The women of the Old and New Testament were the helpers and not seldom the leaders and instructors of men. Christ, born of a Virgin and accepting the friendship and service of women, raised and ennobled womanhood; and while the Church held sway there were numerous examples in England, as well as Italy, of women, both secular and religious, distinguished for scholarship, hearkened to and revered by men. But Protestantism deprived woman, as a class, of education, and thus "put back the hands of the clock."

The nineteenth century brought a reaction. While the devotedness of Catholic women found generally an outlet in religious life, numerous charitable societies were founded by non-Catholic humanitarians on purely philanthropic principles "with no purpose beyond the grave." The political woman followed; but while the suffrage would enable Catholic women to do much for Christian education, there are so many more ennobling and useful activities nearer to her hand and conscience, that when she has discharged them she will have little time or taste for politics. She has many spheres of action that religious orders cannot enter, and here we get an interesting account of the history and rules of Catholic Women's Leagues organized within the last decade in France, Italy, America, Germany, Switzerland and England. In the wide Vineyard there is ample room for all and every woman has a special duty which grace and opportunity will determine, "but her chief field of labor is her home." It is the Christian mother who makes the family residence "home," and not merely a house. She too is consecrated, for, as St. Paul says, "she bears Christ in her body." She has duties to her husband, her children, her relatives and her household, that she may not transfer to club, nurse, teacher, servant nor society conventions. This chapter alone on "Home Duties" should make the book a necessity in every household.

"Standoffishness, the characteristic of upstarts, is absolutely opposed to Christian charity," and neutralizes social activities. Catholics "of our set" would not have been "on visiting terms with the Mother of the Word Incarnate, a simple villager, nor have condescended to speak to the Apostles, except perhaps to St. Paul, for Saul of Tarsus was 'a gentleman'." The Catholic Women's League breaks down such artificial barriers, created by un-Christian convention, and opens the gate of the vineyard to every worker. The woman who does no social work "may be said to vegetate rather than live," and an epitaph in a New York graveyard gives her life's epitome:

This Corpse

is

Phoebe Thorpe's.

A long and varied list is set down of social works among which child, maid and mother, whether sick or well, poor or rich, will find many that are feasible. The qualifications enumerated, with apt and humorous illustrations, are common sense, tact, aptitude, organizing power, broadness of view, control of imagination or absence of hysteria, sympathy and adaptability. Her example of the last is characteristic of her illustrative method. A Cornish woman insisted on her parson, Rev. Baring Gould, "saying a few words over her ow'd zow," which had been "taken bad." He visited the sty and solemnly addressed the occupant: "O pig, if thou livest, thou livest, but O pig, if thou diest, thou diest!" The pig recovered. Later the parson was apparently dying of quinsy when the woman, entering his room perforce, repeated solemnly: "O parson, if thou livest, thou livest, but O parson, if thou diest, thou diest!" and his laughter broke the quinsy. The moral is that kindly humor has its uses.

In this, as in her other brochures, Madame Cecilia is wise, practical and brief; she has the art of saying the right thing in the shortest and happiest way. The illustrations and cover design are artistic, and in harmony with the contents. It would make a handsome and wholesome present to wife or maid, and no "laborer in the vineyard" of either sex can fail to draw pleasure and profit from its perusal.

Blessed Edmund Campion. By LOUISE IMOGEN GUINEY. New York: Benziger Bros. Price, 80 cents.

The St. Nicholas series of books for Catholic youth has received a valued and welcome addition in this life-story of an accomplished man of letters who could choose wisely and well between time and eternity, between the favor of the world and the smile of God. From boyhood through the heyday of young manhood to the call to the religious life, thence to the dungeon and to the gallows-tree, the blessed martyr's life is so vividly, so thrillingly traced that we seem to accompany him along his strangely checkered course. We cannot forbear asking what might have resulted had his years not been cut short by the cruelty of men. Although our youths may not be called upon to give that supreme test of fidelity of laying down their lives in the cause of religion, they will undoubtedly be placed where they will have an occasion to be faithful to conscience or to betray God's cause. The brilliant, careless youth, Edmund Campion, was transformed by the proffered grace of God into a glorious martyr, a witness to the truth. That same divine truth needs witnesses in our day, if not unto the shedding of blood, at least in steadfastness in the right. May our young people find in the heroism of their forbear in the faith that incentive to loyalty to God which should be the distinguishing characteristic of a Catholic! Who can read the closing chapter without exulting in the thought that he can claim kinship with a soul so heroic? Blessed Campion's life is a lesson for our days, when the allurements of the senses and the world threaten so many with a strange spiritual blindness. In all ages the Church has had her heroes, because in all ages she has appealed confidently to the heroism of her children.

Reviews and Magazines

In the Nineteenth Century, J. Ellis Parker contends for the abolition of landlordism in England, both in town and country; G. M. Wrong explains away Canada's alleged grievances against the British parliament, and Professor Watson shows that Milton's "Tractate" on education is substantially a reproduction of "De Tradendis Disciplinis," published 1531, by Juan Luis Veves, a Spanish educator. Lord Kilanin's "Impressionist Study Enroute to India" outclasses the other contributions in style and power, with the possible exception of "Ireland's Need," by another Galwegian, Stephen Gwynn, M. P. This is a strong exposition of Ireland's primal need of self-government, the re-implacement of "the nerve centre which now lies outside the organism." It also contains a complete refutation of the slurs cast on the Irish priesthood in the September number of the same review.

"New Ireland" by Sidney Brooks, in the North American Review reaches the same conclusion as Mr. Gwynn, but by a strangely different process. It is the eleventh of a series which are all equally remarkable for mis-information and dogmatizing. The present article finds Mr. Brooks in a quandary, and leaves him in self-contradiction. The three Irish priests he had met in one week were ideal—learned, able, active, up-to-date, devoted to the secular as well as religious interests of their people, and all others that he knew of were "almost invariably gentlemen in essentials, and absolutely without stain." But "an organization is something very different from the sum of the individuals that compose it"; hence the same Irish priests are narrow, ignorant and domineering. A Protestant lady (who would have the priest "preach that stewed tea and white bread are poison") and the notorious "Pat," are cited in support; whence it follows somewhat that the priesthood derives its power from the English government, and the only way to break it is to grant Home Rule, which would spell "Rome Ruin."

This strange jumble is met by Mr. Gwynn's Nineteenth Century article, which effectively refutes Pat's specific slanders and brands the rest as "shamefully and ridiculously untrue . . . the figments of an imagination diseased by personal resentment." As a Protestant Irishman whose father is an Anglican minister and whose wife and children are Catholics, Mr. Gwynn should be a more capable and impartial witness than Sidney Brooks, who confesses himself "a casual visitor" whose impressions lack the intimate acquaintance that would alone give them value."

M. K.

The Irish Theological Quarterly has a goodly array of learned articles which philosophers and theologians will find valuable. Rev. L. J. Walker, S.J., shows that absolute truth exists though it does not preclude development, and that church and state have the right to prohibit the circulation of moral or dogmatic doctrines which have bearings on practical life. "Interfite errores, diligit homines" is always the church's principle; time and circumstances control the methods of enforcing it. Father Barry deals with the difficult question of "Fair Prices and Methods at Auctions," and if he does not settle it he surely contributes much to its solution. Dr. Coffey shows that Scholasticism as "a full philosophy and the whole truth has a harmonious beauty which must appeal" to modern thought, when "harmonized with modern science and presented in intelligible language". Other articles of note are "The Mosaic Authorship of Deuteronomy," "The Biblical Commission," and an excellent appreciation by Dr. Harty of the Catholic Encyclopedia, Vol. V.

Atlantic Monthly. Hugo Münsterberg discusses the standing of scholarship in America, seeking the reason why it is so little esteemed. He omits this very important one, that there are practically no scholars in America to-day except in the popular sense of the term, which means very little indeed. When the scholarly clergyman preaches a scholarly sermon, or the scholarly professor publishes a scholarly book, or the eminent scholar, so-and-so, says this or that, we feel ourselves in presence of stock epithets of very vague signification. The causes mentioned by Professor Münsterberg as working for the contempt of scholarship, work no less for the extinction of the scholar; and the means he proposes to restore the former to honor, will, if efficacious, revive the latter. Donald H. Rechberg has a thoughtful paper on the Lawyer's Function. In it he lays down the conditions under which the lawyer is a harmonizer of society and those under which he is a social parasite. He says many good things. A familiarity with the treatise De Jure et Justitia would have helped him to put them more forcibly. "Sincerity in Autobiography," by Anna Robeson Burr, is a long and somewhat obscure article. The author, a psychologist, seems to wish to tell her readers that, while it is desirable that one writing about himself should tell the truth even about the least details, what is important is his revelation of himself, which enables psychologists to study his soul. This may be so from the psychologic standpoint; but then we are not all psychologists. Moreover, it is so very obvious that nine pages of obscurity and fine writing glittering with such ornaments of style as littérateur and cher monsieur seem thrown away upon it. Gideon Welles' Diary is continued. There is an article on The College and The Freshman by William R. Castle, Jr., which we recommend to Catholics who are thinking of sending their sons to such universities as Harvard. It is virtually a confession of the powerlessness of the college to guard the freshman's morals. The usual articles in lighter vein fill an interesting number.

The Uncle Remus Home Magazine publishes in each number a letter of Joel Chandler Harris, usually from the collection his daughters made of the notes he sent them while they attended the Sisters' Academy at Washington, Ga. They have all the characteristics of "Uncle Remus," and the additional charm of having been written with no thought of publication. In the October number he says: "I am glad your teacher enjoyed the book, 'My New Curate.' It is a piece of real literature, and it is the finest book I have read in many a day." Later he paid even a higher tribute to "Luke Delmege." His appreciation of Father Sheehan's masterpieces is enhanced by the fact that Mr. Harris's reading was confined to the classics.

The Rosary Magazine opens with "A Cain-Branded Dynasty," a strikingly forcible portrayal of the tyrannical Norman Kings and the retribution that befell them. "Books and Memories" recalls the faraway days when Cooper and Scott were held in reverence, and Andrew A. McErlean reminds us that "Ireland's Saints" are not held in sufficient reverence. The long roll of Ireland's saints is unknown to many of Irish blood; even "Patrick" must be vulgarized by the addition of Sidney or Percy; Brigid is euphonized into Delia, and Michael, who is Irish by adoption, is excluded from the baptismal register. A detailed account of the Saints of Ireland by Mr. McErlean would most effectively attain his object. Maurice Francis Egan unites "A House Divided" by methods that make very readable fiction. Francis A. Furey contributes a masterly exposition of the "Catholic Revival in Germany," and M. A. Dunne gives a graphic and interesting picture of "Little Italy."

Volume VI of "The Catholic Encyclopedia," which has just appeared, contains 724 articles and goes from Father to Gregory. The number of contributors is 243, of whom 70 have not collaborated in the previous volumes. Numerically the United States leads with 90 names; England follows with 48; Ireland lends 15; France and Belgium 13 each; Italy 12 and Germany 11. Volume V has 632 articles from the pens of 224 contributors.

SOCIOLOGY

The evil of divorce in England threatens to spread with increased rapidity in the near future. The Incorporated Law Society, representing the English legal profession, is in favor of extending the divorce courts throughout England that relief from matrimonial unhappiness or faithlessness should be within the reach of the poor as well as the rich. To this end it has adopted a resolution calling for an amendment in the present laws so that persons of small means may obtain redress in the local courts. At present divorce suits are heard only in London.

According to a ruling of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue raisin wine is taxable; the tax upon it went into effect on October 1.

Two years ago the Right Rev. Thomas A. Cusack, D.D., Auxiliary Bishop of New York, officiated at the laying of the cornerstone of a new chapel for the Catholic inmates of the institutions on Blackwell's Island. The occasion was also made memorable by the presence of various Catholic societies of New York, notably the Knights of Columbus, who had been among the first contributors towards the undertaking. The chapel is now approaching completion, and to aid the good work a Grand Euchre and Reception will be held at Grand Central Palace, Lexington Ave. and 43d Street, October 27, at 8 p. m.

Henry D. Baker, a United States Consul in Tasmania, has called the attention of the department of commerce and labor to an opening for American capital in the handling and storing of grain in Russia. The farmers of Russia are reported to be at the mercy of a few cash buyers, who are afraid to purchase large lots because of difficulties in storage and freight transit.

Rev. A. Biever, of Loyola College, New Orleans, has invented a device for the destruction of the Argentine ant, which has been spreading rapidly in Louisiana, and proved very injurious to bee-keeping and horticulture.

SCIENCE

The National Geographical Society, in response to a proposal of the Peary-Arctic Club, adopted a resolution at its meeting last week agreeing to join the American Geographical Society and the American Museum of Natural History. Dr. Ira Remsen, president of the National Academy of Sciences, was authorized to appoint a commission to examine a report on the Arctic records, observations and data of Commander Peary and Dr. Cook. It is hoped that the report of the commission may assist in a final determination of the present controversy.

Gustave Gabet, a French inventor, is credited with having perfected a submarine which, as he claims, bids fair to revolutionize the naval policy of all nations. The new device of destruction is a radio-active torpedo, guided by Hertzian waves at a distance of from three and one-half to four miles.

Houses built of glass bricks are no longer a rarity in European cities. Engineers are agreed that they are used at no sacrifice of stability of construction, and that where cleanliness, light and uniform temperature are desired, they fully outclass the clay brick. For fire-proof walls they are encased with a wire coating to prevent the scattering of glass fragments dissociated by the extreme heat.

Nature is loud in its praise of Father Coronas' discussion of "Three Well-Developed Typhoons Which Occurred Within the Space of Ten Days," as published in the Manila Weather Bureau. It also calls attention to the timely warnings the observer was able to furnish his own stations and foreign services.

The United States Navy is now engaged in the construction of the first 14 inch gun, thus gaining the lead over foreign powers, and, in a measure, forestalling the United States Army, which has parallel ambitions for heavy ordnance. The contract for the assembled forgings has been awarded the Midvale Steel Company, the contract calling for the delivery of the parts toward the end of the present year.

The handling of these guns has necessitated important changes in the arrangement and equipment of the naval gun factory in Washington, and these have already been effected. These weapons are built up in accordance with the usual plan of concentric cylinders assembled by shrinkage. Brig. Gen. William Crozier, Chief of Ordnance Department of the United States Army, claims a longer life for these guns, inasmuch as the same effective striking force can be imparted with less velocity.

The new gun will measure 53½ feet, will weigh in excess of 63½ tons and will cost about $100,000 each.

The Scientific American has printed an article by Rev. William F. Rigge, S.J., proving the groundless character of the story in which Calixtus III. is represented as launching a Bull against Halley's comet.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Columbus Day was fittingly observed in the city of Philadelphia. The Italians had an imposing procession in which sixty-three societies participated, followed by a great meeting in the Lyric Theatre. The Spanish-Americans had a celebration of their own, consisting of a concert and addresses by distinguished citizens in Griffith Hall. But that which crowned the day with most distinction was the grand banquet at the Bellevue-Stratford, under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus. At the banquet his Grace Archbishop Ryan, the Governor of the State and the Mayor of the city were among the speakers. The Archbishop said in part: "In Christopher Columbus is an example of perfect devotedness to a grand idea. . . . He was great not only in what he did and in the manner of its accomplishment, but also in the motive by which he was actuated. Persecuted, he was silent in suffering, bearing all with the fortitude which God imparted to him. Great in deed, in manner and in motive he is a triple example invaluable in our day."

Among the Catholic features of the St. Louis Centennial, which ended on October 10, were several that deserve record apart from their value as items of news. We have already described the Parish Schools' celebration on the first day of the week's festivities. On the following Thursday there was a pilgrimage to Cahokia, the old Jesuit Mission which is mentioned in a letter of the Bishop of Quebec as early as 1698. Several thousand pilgrims walked three miles from the ferry landing to the historic site, where, in the presence of Archbishop Glennon, Bishop Hennessy of Wichita and Bishop Janssens of Belleville and a large number of clergy, an interesting program of speeches was carried out ending in Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. In the civic parade on Friday the figures of Marquette and Meurin were prominent among the floats and in the educational section, the students of the St. Louis University—one thousand strong—and those of the Christian Brothers' College were conspicuous. The celebration closed on Sunday with the unveiling of memorial tablets to mark the site of the old College Church and the old buildings of the St. Louis University. Mayor Kreesman was one of the prominent speakers.

The Sisters of the Good Shepherd at the Provincial house of the Order, New York, celebrated the beatification of their founder, Blessed John Eudes, on October 14. There was a solemn Pontifical Mass, of which the celebrant was the Most Rev.

Diomedes Falconio, D.D., the Apostolic Delegate to the United States, and a sermon by the Rev. Joseph W. Daily, C.S.S.R. The Most Rev. John M. Farley, Archbishop of New York presided in the Sanctuary. The occasion was especially noteworthy not only on account of the presence of his Excellency the Apostolic Delegate and his Grace the Archbishop, but for the large number of Monsignors and priests of the diocese. Père Eudes was one of a noble band of priests and apostles of France in the seventeenth century. Years before the vision of our Lord to Blessed Margaret Mary he was engaged in spreading devotion to the Sacred Heart, and had composed a Mass in honor of the Sacred Heart. The ceremony of his beatification took place in Rome on the 25th of last April, the Sunday following the beatification of Joan of Arc. On the Feast of the Annunciation, 1643, with the advice and approval of the Bishop of Bayeux, Blessed John Eudes established a society of priests, the Congregation of Jesus and Mary, whose object was to direct seminaries and to give missions. Before the recent expulsion this Congregation had a number of houses in France, and it has to-day flourishing branches in other parts of the world. Blessed Eudes' chief glory, however, is the foundation of the Order of Our Lady of Charity, better known as the Order of the Good Shepherd, whose institutions are now to be found in all parts of the globe.

Father Murillo, for some years past an associate editor of the monthly Razon Y Fé, has been called to Rome to occupy a chair in the Biblical Institute. Father Murillo's articles have been ever strongly in favor of traditional views on such questions as those of the multiple authorship of Genesis, the historicity of the Old Testament narrative, and the inadmissibility of error or inaccuracy in the historical books of the Bible.

Another Spaniard, who will serve as professor in the Institute, is Father Fernandez, S.J., of the Province of Aragon. He was Professor of Sacred Scripture two years in England and three years at Tortosa, in the house of studies of his own province of Aragon.

A large sum of money has been raised by contribution from the public to defray the cost of rebuilding the Youth's Directory, which was destroyed in the great fire. While engaged in promoting its collection the Reverend D. O. Crowley, for many years Director of the good work, was run down by a taxicab and so seriously injured that his life was feared for. We are glad to hear that he is recovering and will be able to leave the hospital soon.

EDUCATION

President Schurman of Cornell University, speaking of his recent trip abroad, said he had learned that in Europe knowledge and intellectual life are held in higher esteem than in the United States. "Universities can get along without sports and other side activities," he said, "but not without the real student. Every student activity which interferes with university work is a mistake."

Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, superintendent of the Chicago public schools, has begun agitating for the education of the working girls in large manufacturing works. The plan has already been started for the boys. An effort will be made at the next session of the Illinois Legislature to get a bill passed which will require employers of child labor to give employees, both boys and girls, between the ages of 14 and 18, either eight or ten hours' schooling each week. The "continuation schools," as they have been called, will conduct the classes, and attendance will be made compulsory, the responsibility resting on the pupil, his parents and his employer.

Dr. James B. Angell, for thirty-eight years head of the University of Michigan, retired from office on October 1. Dr. Angell's career as executive of the University was interrupted on two occasions when he obtained leave of absence to fill the posts of United States Minister to China and, later on, to Turkey.—Prof. Abbott Lawrence Lowell was formally inaugurated President of Harvard University on October 6.

Charles M. Pratt, General Secretary of the Standard Oil Company and President of the Pratt Institute of Brooklyn, announced recently that he and his sister, Mrs. E. B. Dane, would give to the school an endowment of $1,700,000. On the same day the Yale Corporation announced a gift of $450,000 from William D. and Henry T. Sloane, of New York, for the erection and equipment of a university physics laboratory. According to the official announcements recently made public Columbia University, New York, has received in benefactions during the past year $230,962; Trinity College, North Carolina, $84,000; New York University, $25,000.

An Institute devoted to the study of the mental, moral and physical condition of children, has been opened at Clark University, Worcester, Mass. Ultimately the Institute will consist of seven departments, each embracing a distinct phase of child life. Three departments are now in operation, one dealing with defective children. The inferences and observations of the doctors are communicated to the parents, with suggestions for suitable remedies. Another department is engaged in the study of "Child Language," and a third is a bureau for recording and classifying the observations made in the other departments.

The Holy Cross College Bulletin for October discloses a remarkable condition in that flourishing institution of learning in New England. A comparison with ten years ago, 1899-1900, shows that the catalogue registration for that entire year in both college and preparatory department was 309. The present Bulletin gives 360 in actual attendance in the college alone. What is most striking is that this immense growth has come during a decade of advancement in the standard of studies, with a close adherence to the strict classical course of Latin and Greek and no addition of special English, scientific or commercial courses. The number of students in the college proper is not only the largest in the history of the college, but the largest to-day in America in any college under Catholic control. There are 67 students in the Senior class and over 140 in the Freshman.

The Sisters of Mercy of Lustralton Hall, Milford, Conn., have been left a bequest of $10,000 by the will of the late Father Joynt, of New London, Conn. Lustralton Hall, a finely situated palatial residence, was acquired by the Meriden Sisters of Mercy some five years ago. They have since erected additional buildings with modern equipment, and already the Academy has acquired a reputation for progressive and efficient educational work.

The New York Training School for Catechists begins its annual sessions this week. The School is an adjunct of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, and its work has now been successfully carried on for almost a decade. Last season the number of pupils in the school was larger than ever before, and a still greater increase is expected this coming season. The work is carried on in seven different centres, two of the classes meeting on Monday, two on Tuesday and three on Wednesday evening of every week. Besides the foregoing, occasional lectures on subjects of interest and importance to Catechists will be given during the season. The Spiritual Director of the Confraternity is the Very Rev. F. H. Wall, D.D., and the Director of the School is Rev. S. P. Macpherson.

Harvard University received a gift of $30,000 lately from Mrs. Edith F. Perkins, of Burlington, Iowa, the widow of the late president of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy railroad.

A course of public lectures on the philosophical aspect of modern questions and theories is being given by Rev. M. Walsh at Loyola College, New Orleans, which has attracted large audiences. The first series embrace the various theories of life and the facts and fictions of modern scientists. Each lecture is followed by an open discussion, which has contributed largely to the interest in the courses.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

A friend enables us to publish the following extract from Dodge's Literary Museum, of Boston, Mass., October 28, 1854. Father Bapst was not of Italian but of Swiss origin.

"By a dispatch from Ellsworth, we learn that the Rev. John Bapst, the Catholic pastor in Bangor, was on Saturday night, 14th inst., tarred and feathered and ridden on a rail, in Ellsworth, the home of rowdies and ruffians. Mr. Bapst was on a visit to Ellsworth when the outrage was committed. He was formerly pastor there, and was once engaged in a controversy about the school question. The only thing the ruffians say for themselves in extenuation is, that they had previously threatened to tar and feather Mr. Bapst if he came to Ellsworth again. He has been pastor of the Catholic population in Bangor a few months. We understand he was born and educated in Italy. Since he has been here he has done much good among the Catholic population, and has brought about many useful reforms, winning commendation on all hands.

"For the twelve years in which we have tested the character of villages in the United States, Ellsworth has been notorious beyond all other places for its turbulent, vulgar population. Not a traveler visits it except from dire necessity, or remains a moment longer than he is compelled to. Every concert-giver or showman is insulted and abused; and so totally reckless and brazenly insolent have these rowdies become by long impunity, that the revered calling of a clergyman affords no shield against their crimes. If the State authorities of Maine don't visit them with speedy and condign punishment, the credit of originating the best temperance law will not save them from being despised.

OBITUARY

Mr. Philip Riley was buried from the Church of St. Francis Xavier, New York, on October 16. The deceased had a remarkable record as a Christian educator.

For thirty-five years he taught uninterruptedly one of the grammar classes in the high school attached to the College of St. Francis Xavier, and during that long period was conspicuous for the conscientious discharge of his onerous duties. Hundreds of students of the college are indebted to him as their guide in their preparatory studies. He not only taught well, he also endeared himself to his scholars. It is seldom that a layman gives his whole life unreservedly to the cause of education, and the record of his good work should be fittingly memorialized.

The Rev. Edward F. McSweeney, for the last twenty-six years Professor of Moral Theology and Church History at Mount St. Mary's Seminary, died at Emmitsburg, Md., on Tuesday, aged 63. Father McSweeney made his classical studies at the College of St. Francis Xavier, New York, where he was graduated in 1862, in the same class with the Right Rev. Mgr. John Edwards. On the completion of his studies for the priesthood in Rome he returned to America and later became pastor of St. Mary's Church, Poughkeepsie. Father McSweeney's contributions to the press and his articles in the Catholic World and the American Catholic Quarterly made him widely known among the clergy of the United States. The last years of his life were devoted to the education of the Seminarians at Mount St. Mary's, and he was a distinguished member of the faculty of that time honored institution.

He was keenly interested in every enterprise in the interest of the Church. Only two weeks ago the editors of this Review received from him the following characteristic note:

"Enclosed please find cheque to provide a few seminaries with the paper for one year. Our seminary is, through the kindness of a friend, already provided. I cannot imagine a better way of helping Holy Church in her war with the 'prince of this world.' With congratulations and best wishes for the success of your splendid journal,"

Faithfully yours,
EDWARD MCSWEENEY.

Very Rev. Canon P. M. L. Massardier, rector of St. Theresa's Church, New Orleans, and Consultor and Fiscal Procurator of the Archdiocese, died at his residence October 13. He had announced on Sunday the Forty Hours Devotion, which was to commence on Wednesday and end on Friday morning, in honor of the patronal feast of the Church of St. Theresa, of which he had been pastor for forty years. He was found dying on the morning of the ceremonies by his brother, Canon John Massardier, of Donaldsonville, La., who administered to him the last sacraments. Canon Massardier was born in France, 1843, volunteered for the Louisiana Mission 1867, finished his studies at St. Mary's, Baltimore, was ordained 1869 and became within a year rector of St. Theresa's. He edited the Morning Star for many years, and exercised much public influence by his ability, zeal and force of character.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the New York Times of last Saturday there is an editorial on the troubles in Spain, in which, in commenting on the disturbances in that country, there occurs the following extraordinary sentence: "The burden of priestcraft is intolerable." I would like to call the attention of all Catholics to this statement, which bears the stamp of full editorial approval, as an instance of the animus of this paper in dealing with Catholic affairs, and I hope it will always be borne in mind by all who, in the future, seek in the Times any unbiased information on such questions.

"Priestcraft" is an ugly word; one of those ugly words which like "Papistical," "Romish," "Mariolatry," and many others, owes its invention to hatred of Catholicism. These words never existed in our language before the so-called Reformation and the vulgarity of their etymology is only less striking than the venom of their inspiration. Peevishness and vituperation in argument are generally signs of weakness, and it is a fit subject for congratulation that in all our controversies with our separate brethren throughout the last three centuries and a half, we have never stooped so low as to attempt to invent a similar vocabulary to more effectively clothe our arguments.

Let us now analyze the statement in the Times.

Under the word "priestcraft" in the Standard dictionary we find the following definition: "The policy of a priesthood, especially when dictated by selfish motives; intrigue and imposition as practiced by priests."

Taking this to be the meaning in which the word is employed by the Editorial writer in the Times, I deny absolutely that any such policy exists in Spain, and I assert that the gentleman knows of no facts or statistics whatsoever, from any reliable source, which will support his deliberate charge. If, however, "priestcraft" is merely an ill-tempered expression to describe the strong hold which the Catholic church through her teaching and her priests possesses over the minds and hearts of her children in the Peninsula, then let us ask to whom is this so justly intolerable that attention should be called to it in an American newspaper.

It may be intolerant to Protestant missionaries of alien race who go there to pervert the natives and who find it impossible to make any headway with their proselytizing propaganda, but surely, the Spaniards are free to choose their own religion, however impatient or intolerant it may make such missionaries. The question is: is it intolerable to the natives of Spain who, after all, are the only people who count in the matter. To them it is not only not in the least intolerable, but rather the exact contrary is the case. The vast majority of them are devoted sons of the Church, and the minority who are opposed to her are the agnostics, the atheists and the anarchists. Among this minority must be counted the ominous monsters who, during the riots at Barcelona, broke open the graves of nuns, hacked the corpses to pieces and bore the mutilated members on pikes in procession through the streets, besides committing other nameless atrocities still more horrible. That Catholicism and its ministers should be intolerable to such people seems to me very creditable to the former.

Finally, nothing is more striking than the widespread outbreak against the Church, for which the execution of Ferrer, with which she had nothing to do, is made the excuse. Among the foes of organized society all over the world one unanimous howl of rage and execration has gone up. It ought to deeply impress all thinking people of every faith, and is the most striking evidence that could be given of her magnificent force as the champion and symbol of law throughout all the nations, and as the world's strongest bulwark against the powers of evil and the predatory cohorts of disorder.

Catholic Pamphlet Literature.

New York, Oct. 14th, 1909.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We have read with much interest an article appearing in AMERICA for October 9th, signed "J. J. D.", and dealing with the distribution of Catholic reading in pamphlet form. May we extend to AMERICA our hearty thanks for its encouraging words to the laborers in this field?—a field so needy of workers to-day.

The Catholic World Press, as the lineal descendant of the Catholic Publication Society, founded by the Rev. Isaac Hecker, has been engaged for almost fifty years in the work of spreading abroad good Catholic reading at a nominal sum. Through the mission bands of the Paulist Fathers, their own printing house and the efforts of The Catholic World, this literature has penetrated to almost every quarter of this country and Canada. The latest Catalogue of The Catholic World Press contains the names of several hundred books, pamphlets and leaflets, which deal with current topics of religious and social interest, and take up the exposition of the Catholic Faith. During the past six months The Catholic World Press has entered upon the work of placing stands for the sale of Catholic reading in the vestibules of our churches. This undertaking has already received the hearty approval of the Right Reverend James A. McFaul, D.D., Bishop of Trenton, who has authorized The Catholic World Press to take up this work in his diocese, installed a stand in his own cathedral church, and written a pastoral letter to his clergy urging this work upon them as one of the utmost importance.

These stands have been installed in many churches throughout the country. Books, pamphlets and tracts on all subjects vital to Catholics are in open display, so that the people may make their choice. The prices are plainly marked and the public is trusted to deposit the correct amount in the money-slot. This plan has been found to work admirably, and we consider it the most efficacious means of placing Catholic reading in the hands of our people.

After forty-five years of labor in the cause of Catholic truth, years which have been inspired by the memory of Isaac T. Hecker and a belief in the Apostolate of the Press, it is no small gratification to us to see that the members of the Editorial Board of AMERICA have taken up in their columns the crying need of Catholic literature in pamphlet form, and the upbuilding in this country, of an Apostolate of the Press.

Unbelief, the loosening of old ties, social unrest, the spirit of challenge and enquiry, the wide-spread interest of non-Catholics in the teachings of the Church—all contrive to make the need of cheap, timely, Catholic reading a vital one. Years of unceasing effort must bear fruit, and we shall soon have in America a Catholic press and a Catholic literature worthy of our people.

Very truly yours,

JOHN J. BURKE, C.S.P., Editor.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

Allow me to say on this occasion how delighted I am with your splendid weekly. It is a Godsend that came just in time. The intelligent portion of our Catholic people need such a paper to give them proper direction of thought and judgment on the great issues of the day, discussed by a public press devoid of Catholic principles, and in many instances positively hostile to Christian thought. While I hope that your circulation will grow day by day, I could wish in particular that AMERICA were attentively read by the officers and leaders and more prominent members of our large Catholic organizations, such as the Knights of Columbus, the Hibernians, the Foresters, the German Central Verein, the Catholic Benevolent Legion and so on. They will learn, among other things, where lies the field of that great and powerful Catholic Social Action, which alone can save modern society from running into moral corruption and social ruin. That the editors and contributors to AMERICA may be encouraged in their splendid work by the hearty support of American Catholics is the cordial wish of S. G. Messmer, Archbishop of Milwaukee.

AMERICA is great; I have not missed a number from the first, reading it from cover to cover. I am sure AMERICA will have a great effect upon the public opinion of the country. It is the right combination of news and discussion.—John Jerome Rooney, New York.

The new review conducted by the Jesuit Fathers in the United States, AMERICA, to which we referred in our last numbers, has developed beyond the expectations of its best friends. By means of an able band of contributors, information of the best and most reliable kind has been secured about Catholic affairs in the different countries. Nowhere else can such information be obtained in such concise and readable form, and for this reason alone, putting aside entirely the valuable articles that appear in each issue, AMERICA should be in the hands of the clergy and educated laity.—The Irish Theological Quarterly for October.

AMERICA

Thou art the goal of labored centuries,
Since first from Aryan valleys came the train
Of unrecorded men, aglow with pain
Of westward hope: from mountain lands, and seas
As mountains to their keels, they took rich fees,
Made wise the hills of Greece, each Roman plain
A mart, and Celtic towns beside the main
That taught the Teuton hordes amenities.

To thee the gathered strength of time remains,
And mightier grows thy power from East and West.
But wisdom keep for guide; court not decay;
Give vision more than mines or teeming plains:
One other line hold to thy sight as best—Upward! and thou shalt see Time's latest day.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA.....80

CHRONICLE

The President's Trip.—Mr. Taft early in the week spent a few days on his brother's ranch at Gregory, Texas. While there the President received a memorandum of the proposition of farmers and capitalists along 800 miles of the Rio Grande, regarding the irrigation of that desert-like part of Texas east of El Paso. The proposition of the Texas people looks to a duplication of work on the Nile, the building of reservoirs which will enrich millions of acres, but the river as an avenue of commerce will disappear. On October 22 he made an address to the convention of the Interstate Inland Waterways League, which was in session at Corpus Christi, Tex. Governor Campbell and other state officials with a number of Congressmen were present to welcome him. Cheers greeted Mr. Taft's declaration: "I am in favor of railroad rate regulation, but I am also in favor of fair play and fair rates for the railroads." Continuing his tour Mr. Taft strained his voice in an effort to make himself heard by the immense crowd gathered before his hotel in Houston, so that he was unable to speak above a whisper to the multitude assembled in the Dallas State Fair Grounds on the afternoon of Saturday. The crowds that welcomed the President to Dallas were somewhat disorderly and unfortunately were not held in check by the police and militia in attendance. In St. Louis he expressed decided views against apportioning money for improving waterways for political considerations which have prevailed in the past.

Events of the Week.—Justice Rufus Wheeler Peckham, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, died on Sunday at his home near Albany, N. Y. Justice Peckham was an appointee of President Cleveland. Some of his decisions commanded national attention. He held in the case against the Trans-Missouri Freight Association that a combination among railroads to fix rates was in violation of the Federal Statutes against trusts and monopolies. That decision has since become common law.—President Diaz says of his recent meeting with President Taft at El Paso: "The interview I had with President Taft was of a most cordial character and will redound to the benefit of both countries owing to the perfect understanding previously existing between the two governments, which was made precise through an interview still further tightening the bonds of friendship."—Pellagra, the disease that has excited much alarm in Southern States, is to become immediately the subject of official investigation at the hygienic laboratory in Washington. This action has been ordered by the Treasury Department at the instance of health authorities in several States who fear the disease may become a scourge. Dr. C. C. Carroll, of Meadville, Pa., claims to have discovered that the germs and parasites in the mould are closely related to those found in tuberculosis.—Dr. Frederick A. Cook says he is about to begin legal proceedings in the Mt. McKinley controversy against Edwin Barrill, the guide whose affidavits recently arraigned the Arctic explorer as a colossal fakir. The University of Copenhagen cabled to the National Geographic Society of Washington, declining to forego its privilege to the first examination of the North Pole records of Dr. Cook. Commander Peary's proof that he reached the North Pole April 6, 1909, his records and observations, were submitted to the same society on October 21. Dr. Cook promises to present his documents to the Copenhagen University within two months.—Miss Inez Milholland has been denied admission to the Harvard Law School. "Harvard University," says President Lowell, "is first, last and for all time, I hope, a college for the education of men, and men alone."

The Government vs. the Indianapolis News.—In the case of the Government against the proprietors of the Indianapolis News, the argument offered by the Government was that a newspaper is published in every place which a copy of it reaches, and can be sued or tried for libel in every such place, but Judge Anderson, of the United States District Court in Indianapolis, held that a paper had ordinarily but one publication and that was in the place where it was printed and posted. "That man," he said, "has read the history of our institutions to little purpose who does not view with apprehension the success of such a proceeding as this, to the end that citizens could be dragged from their homes to the District of Columbia, the seat of government, for trial under the circumstances of this case. The defendants are discharged."

Porto Rico.—Of the forty-nine bishops chosen to occupy the Episcopal See of Porto Rico, from the Conquest down to our own days, Juan Alejo Arizmendi y de la Torre was the only one born in the island. The statement is made on the authority of the Borinquen of Porto Rico. This illustrious prelate was born at San Juan, July 17, 1760, his parents also being natives of the island. His earlier studies were made in Caracas and Santo Domingo and in Santo Domingo he was raised to the priesthood by the Right Rev. Felipe José de Trespacios. He was transferred to Porto Rico in July, 1765. Here many important charges were confided to him. He was director of the Carmelites, then Vicar General, and finally, July 27, 1803, was consecrated Bishop of Porto Rico in the Cathedral of Caracas by Archbishop Francisco Ibarra. Bishop Arizmendi was the prime mover in founding the diocesan seminary, and out of his private funds bought the ground on which the seminary was built. It was also through his efforts that the sick poor were allowed by the Government to enter the Hospital of Charity. He had spent eleven years as chief pastor of Porto Rico when death cut short his saintly career, October 12, 1814.. His body was removed from the Chapel of Our Lady of Monserrate in Arecibo and laid to rest in the Cathedral in San Juan.

Great Britain.—The House of Commons adjourned from October 11 to October 18. The reasons assigned were to enable the Government to consider the changes in the Budget that had been accepted and to relieve the strain upon the members of the long session.—Steps are being taken at Ripon to erect a statue to the late marquis.—An Anglo-Japanese exhibition to be held in London has been arranged for next year. Prince Arthur of Connaught, who carried the Garter to the Mikado a few years ago, is the honorary President, the Duke of Norfolk being active President. The Japanese are taking great interest in it, the Imperial and Provincial Governments having voted £320,000 towards its expenses.—On the site of the old Blackfriars Convent, Stamford, have been found the embalmed remains of John Stamford, prior in the latter part of the fourteenth century. The body was in a perfect state of preservation and was reinterred, with a Requiem Mass from St. Augustine's Church, Stamford. A record of the facts was put inside the coffin.—Though Preston is the most Catholic town in England, it has not had a Catholic mayor since the Reformation. Even to-day it does not seem quite ready to follow the example of London. A committee waited on Alderman Myerscough, a leading Catholic, to ask what his position would be if he were offered the Mayoralty. He answered that he would attend his own church in state the Sunday after his assumption of office, and would appoint a deputy to attend the parish church on any subsequent Sunday. The Council, after a long discussion, adjourned the matter for further deliberation and finally rejected him.

Ireland.—Mr. John Redmond, M.P., has made several important statements before Liberal constituencies in England. A general election is imminent, and should the Government postpone it, it will become the duty of the Irish Party to bring it about. The Land Bill is a pressing necessity and its mutilation or destruction by the House of Lords cannot be tolerated. There are fifty constituencies in England which Irish voters control, and 100 others where they have considerable and often deciding influence. The Irish Party will advise that the casting of these votes be determined by two conditions: "(1) I say to Liberals as well as to Conservatives that Home Rule for Ireland shall and must be among the leading issues submitted to the electorate of the country. (2) The Irish votes shall not be cast for any candidate who will not declare, not only that he favors Home Rule, but that he will use his influence to have it placed among the leading issues that shall be dealt with practically and promptly in the next Parliament." The practical certainty that the elections will result in a better balance of parties, which will give Ireland a deciding vote, has prompted the Irish Party to send Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., to America "to lay the situation before our people and ask their prompt and generous aid. We appeal to our race to help us fight its most powerful enemies, landlordism, wealth and privilege."—The consecration of the Rev. Dr. McKenna, the distinguished writer and professor of Maynooth, as Bishop of Clogher, by his Eminence Cardinal Logue, was attended by the most eminent men, lay and cleric, of the country. In reply to addresses by numerous bodies, Bishop McKenna said: "I have no fear for the continuance in these happier days of that union of priests and people which is our greatest inheritance from the darkest period of our history. As bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh, my whole sympathies are with the National Movement, and I shall always regard it my duty to give it every assistance in my power. I am at one with you in believing in the capacity of Irishmen to manage their own affairs, and that the only way of adequately promoting the Nation's well-being is to place its destinies in the hands of its own people. To attain this end, the National organization demands the loyal support of every Irishman, so that Ireland may speak with one voice and move as one body in its march to freedom."

Australia's Catholic Congress.—The Third Australian Catholic Congress was opened at Sydney, September 20, and continued during the following week, which was also marked by other notable celebrations: the Silver Jubilee of Cardinal Moran's arrival in Sydney; the laying the foundation stone for the completion of St. Mary's Cathedral, a magnificent edifice and the Mother-Church of Australia; the dedication of a Collegiate Chapel at St. Patrick's College, and the opening of St. Columba's Missionary College. The Congress was held successively at various religious and educational institutions in Sydney and its neighborhood, with special sessions in St. Mary's Hall. The program of the numerous papers on Catholic Apologetics, Education, History, Archaeology and Missions, Religious and Charitable Organizations, Australian Discovery, Ethnology and Statistics, Literature, Science and Art, Catholic Literature and Newspapers, and Social Questions, covers a full page of the Sydney Freeman's Journal, which was specially enlarged for the occasion. Papers were contributed by distinguished Catholics from all parts of the world, among them one on "The Church and Science," by Father Cortie, S.J., and "Ireland's Hundred Years' Battle for Faith and Fatherland," by John Redmond, M.P. The Congress, by its numbers and intellectual character, made a profound impression on Sydney, where Catholic education is now a public question. All persuasions joined in the tribute to Cardinal Moran, whose achievements were well summarized by Mr. Jos. Devlin, M.P.: "His contributions to Irish history and archaeology entitle him to a permanent place in Irish history; his name will be imperishably associated with the rise of the Catholic Church in Australia, and his courage and zeal in the cause of democracy and progress will be an inspiration for ages to come." Since Cardinal Moran's arrival in Sydney, 1883, the priests of his diocese have increased from 100 to 403; teaching Brothers from 78 to 245; Sisters from 102 to 2,379; school children from 11,000 to 44,000; Catholic schools from 81 to 539; chapels and churches from 120 to 595, and charitable institutions from 5 to 40. The grand total for all Australia shows 2,066 churches, 903 secular and 606 regular priests, 705 Brothers, 6,070 nuns, 5 seminaries, 37 boarding colleges for boys and 179 for girls, 195 high schools, 1,653 primary schools, 123 charitable institutions, 136,495 school children, and a Catholic population of 1,052,863.—The unique distinction of blessing the first church in Christendom under the patronage of Blessed Jeanne d'Arc belongs to Cardinal Moran, who, on September 10, dedicated a very handsome church at Haberfield in the Sydney diocese to the Blessed Maid of France.

French Catholics and M. Briand.—Catholics in France are not satisfied with M. Briand's first public utterance on education. When it was announced that the Prime Minister of France would address a teachers' meeting at Périgueux, Catholics, arguing from the recent official declaration by a member of his cabinet that the government was in favor of "appeasement," hoped that M. Briand would allude in some way to the collective letter in which the French Episcopate, a little over a month ago, laid down the rights and duties of parents with regard to the education of their children. The Cardinals, Archbishops and Bishops of France solemnly warn parents to make sure that the neutrality required by the law of 1882 is faithfully observed in the school to which they send their children. Of course the neutral school is at its best a lesser evil; but there are circumstances when the Church tolerates the use of such a school on two indispensable conditions: the first, that nothing in that school does violence to the conscience of the child; the second, that parents and priests supply, outside of the class room, that religious instruction and training which is not given there. When the law of 1882 was passed by Jules Ferry, he insisted that a teacher who attacked the religious convictions of any of his pupils should be punished as severely as if he had committed a criminal action. But in the course of the past twenty-seven years a great number of so-called neutral schools have ceased to observe that neutrality and openly discredit and attack the Catholic religion. From such schools the bishops declare that parents must withdraw their children under pain of refusal of the Sacraments. In view of this weighty pronouncement by the French Episcopate it was expected that M. Briand would either insist on the strict neutrality required by the law of 1882 or advise the teachers not to pay any attention to the collective letter of the Hierarchy. But he did neither. He simply exhorted the teachers not to be polemical in their teaching, not to be aggressive, not to transform the school into a public meeting. The vagueness of his address on so important an occasion is very disappointing to Catholics who feel that, by not insisting on a strict observance of Jules Ferry's law, he is indirectly condemning it, and then they very appropriately ask: Where does your cherished policy of appeasement come in?

Germany.—The Germania is doing yeoman service in its efforts to arouse the followers of the Centrum to energetic preparation for the general elections which will be held two years hence. In its recent issues it makes clear the growing evidence of an agreement between the Liberals and the Social Democrats, the aim of which appears to be a joining of forces to overwhelm the Centrum party. Meantime it points out the unpreparedness of the Centrum for the attack, more especially because of the lack of effective work in the country election districts.—Prince Bülow returned to Berlin this week for the first time since his retirement from the imperial chancellorship last July. His visit is made at the special request of the Emperor and Empress in connection with the celebration of the birthday of the latter. Stress is laid upon the fact that the invitation was given since the Prince's retirement from office, as it proves that he is still in the Emperor's good graces.—Predictions are common enough that the new chancellor, Bethman-Hollweg, on account of the troubles growing out of the storms of the last session of the Reichstag, will scarcely be able to control a majority. And vastly stranger incidents have occurred in the German Parliament than the recall of Prince Bülow to his old place would prove to be.

Roman Affairs.—An interesting case has just been decided. Sixtus IV, in 1474 exempted from papal provisions two prebends in each cathedral of Castile and Leon, annexing one to the office of cathedral-preacher and the other to that of advocate of the chapter. They were to be filled by a concursus of graduates of Spanish Universities. To compete for the first one had to be at least a licentiate in theology, and for the second a licentiate in either canon or civil law. Moreover the bishop obtained the right to require the latter to teach in his seminary. Leo X extended the privilege to Granada and Navarre. The second of these prebends fell vacant lately at Malaga. The concursus resulted in appointment of Diego Gomez. His competitor, Pedro Mir, brought suit against this on the ground that Gomez, being a graduate of the Gregorian University, not of a Spanish one, was incapable of the office. As the degrees of the pontifical university were involved, the case was called to Rome, where the Sacred Congregation of the Council decided in favor of Gomez for several reasons of which the principal were: that there are now no universities in Spain giving degrees in Theology and Canon Law, and the status of those granting degrees in Civil Law is so changed that they are no longer held to be the institutions that Sixtus and Leo had in view, hence the privilege in favor of Spanish graduates has lapsed; that the alumni of the Spanish College in Rome, graduating at the Gregorian University, fulfil as nearly as possible the conditions of those popes; that the alumni are sent to Rome at the Pope's order, and it would be unjust to the bishops and to them to make this order a hindrance to their appointment to ecclesiastical dignities.—The Unione Tipografica-Cattolica Libreria, of which the object is the publication and sale of good books, submitted to the Congregation of Rites a form for the blessing of its shop and press, asking its approval and insertion in the Roman Ritual. Its prayer was granted.—The cause has been introduced for the beatification and canonization of Caroline Barbara Colchen-Carré de Malberg, foundress of the Daughters of St. Francis de Sales. She was born at Metz in 1829 and died in 1891 in the odor of sanctity. The immemorial cultus of Utto, founder and first abbot of the Benedictine Abbey of Metten in Bavaria, and that of his god-father and preceptor, Gamelbert, have been confirmed.

France and Our New Tariff.—On August 7 President Taft, in pursuance of the provisions of the new Tariff Law, notified France that our commercial agreements with that country would be terminated on October 31 of this year. Beginning November 1 American exports to France will accordingly be taxed at the maximum rates of the French Tariff Law, and similarly the exportations from France to the United States will pay our full schedule rates. These rates will be continued until March 31, 1910, when the new maximum and minimum rates of the Payne Act will go into effect. Government officials here are waiting to learn whether between now and March 31 of next year France will agree to give to the United States her minimum rates on substantially all of our exports into that country or accept the consequence of having to pay our maximum rates. These in the new Tariff Enactment are the regular rates of the Payne schedules with 25 per cent. added. The latter alternative would mean a tariff war with this Government. The effect of such a course would be to put France at a tremendous disadvantage as compared with practically all other European nations in handling American goods, and as the United States is France's best market for brandies, champagnes and other wines, that country will probably move slowly in declaring such a war. An official note issued by the French Government on October 25, announced the decision of the United States to impose its new tariff rates upon French imports after October 30, because October 31 falls on Sunday, and adds that France, "with more liberal traditions," will keep the French custom houses open throughout the entire day.

The Czar in Italy.—The Czar has been the guest of Victor Emmanuel at Racconigi, near Turin. He reached Italy by a circuitous route, it is said, to avoid passing through Austria. All admit that the meeting is of the greatest import and that it has most probably for its object the agreeing upon a common policy in the Balkans. If this be the case it involves hostility to Austria and consequently the withdrawal of Italy from the Triple Alliance. While the Czar and the King were in conference, King Ferdinand of Bulgaria had an informal meeting with the Crown Prince Alexander of Servia.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Facts about Ferrer

At nine o'clock, on the morning of Wednesday, October 13, in the fortress of Monjuich which looks down upon Barcelona, Francisco Ferrer y Guardia, known in Spain for the past thirty years, paid the penalty for his complicity in the murder, arson and pillage of last July. Complete details of the trial now permit us to supplement or correct the cabled reports which were fragmentary, one-sided and misleading.

After twenty years of prominence, during which he had several brushes with the police, Ferrer withdrew from all outward activity in politics and gave himself up to the establishment of so-called "Lay Schools." Their prospectus was such that it is hard to understand how any government could tolerate them. The nature of the instruction imparted may be gathered from the following: "The flag, a rag of different colors, stuck at the end of a stick, is the symbol of tyranny and misery. Soldiers should use their weapons to kill those who armed them. When war is declared, every soldier should declare a strike. Every evil, every suffering, every injustice, is due to that stupid and brutal thing called 'native land.'" In his Valencia school, an emblematic picture represented anarchy with a blazing torch, standing near the ruins of a throne amid broken military weapons, a soldier's cap pierced by a dagger, a torn copy of the laws, and fragments of a cross.

By thus instilling humane and patriotic sentiments into the impressionable minds of boys, Ferrer was paving the way for the full anarchistic program found when the fugitive's house was searched by the authorities. This program, typewritten but corrected, according to the testimony of experts given at the trial, in Ferrer's own hand, included the abolition of the bench, the army and the navy, the seizure of the banks and the property of public officials past or present, and imprisonment for these until they should prove their innocence or should suffer death. Incriminating correspondence with notorious European anarchists and a cipher-key were discovered at the same time. Several recent visits to Paris and London, where he hobnobbed with well-known revolutionists and anarchists, ended so as to leave him in Barcelona shortly before the outbreak. It is well to bear in mind that the rioting began when Cataluña was almost destitute of troops and that a small force of the regular army sufficed for the speedy restoration of order.

Shortly after the arrival of the troops, Ferrer, seeing that the movement was a failure, dropped out of sight. He was arrested on a country road by a squad of the town guard, who halted him without being aware of his identity, for he had shaved off his beard. Carrying a kodak and an umbrella, he told them that he was a member of the Esperanto Congress soon to meet in Barcelona. But they took him into custody and his identity was soon established. He consistently refused to reveal where he had been harbored.

On Saturday morning, October 9, the military court, consisting of Lieutenant Colonel Don Eduardo de Aguirre Lacalle and six captains, convened in the presence of two hundred reporters and about two hundred and fifty of the general public, as many as could crowd into the main hall of the Barcelona city prison. The competency of the court having been duly established and declared, the president summoned Ferrer. He entered, walking briskly, not handcuffed, and seated himself at a table. Then followed the reading of the Summary of the case, that is, an account of the steps taken by the authorities in imprisoning the accused and in searching his house, of the depositions of witnesses and the answers of the accused to their testimony, and his statements when confronted by the same witnesses. During the period of twenty-eight days allowed by the military code for presenting testimony in favor of the accused, nobody had offered him any help. A captain of engineers, however, Don Francisco Galcerán, was appointed his counsel, and had eight days to prepare for the trial. During the reading of the Summary, Ferrer paid the closest attention, now shaking his head in dissent, now smiling ironically, but preserving throughout an exterior calmness.

Fifteen witnesses deposed. The testimony showed Ferrer's efforts to stir up men in the suburbs to join the rioters, and his instigation to burn the convents. Three witnesses testified to seeing him actually leading a group of rioters. The testimony and the documents found in his house were the groundwork of the prosecutor's address to the court which was dispassionate, well-reasoned, and moderate in tone. Counsel for the defense followed with a brilliant and eloquent plea. Ferrer was then asked whether he had anything to say in his own behalf. His few remarks in slow, uncertain tones, produced an unfavorable impression on the throng in the court room, as was seen in their faces. The session was then declared at an end and the public filed out in a quiet and orderly way.

Late Tuesday evening, October 12, some Brothers of Peace and Charity were seen on their way to the fortress of Montjuich. The news spread fast. It was a sign of the approaching execution, for the Brothers attend those condemned to death, and do what they can to prepare them. On the following morning a few curious people, about a score in all, were loitering in the vicinity of the fortress. The country people were at work in their fields. In the city below, the busy hum of peaceful labor and trade was heard as if July had never been. No smoke and flames from the incendiary's torch were there, no howling miscreants bent on pillage and murder. At nine o'clock, the loiterers heard a volley from the hillside. Francisco Ferrer y Guardia had paid the earthly penalty of his crimes.

Cesare Lombroso

Cesare Lombroso, whose death was announced in our last number, was born in 1836. He studied medicine at Turin and served as a surgeon in the campaign of 1859. Having become superintendent of the insane asylum at Pesaro, he undertook the study of the physiology and psychology of criminals, and with the publication in 1862 of his book, "Criminal Man," became famous as the founder of a new science, Criminology. Of this the method is to study criminals in their stock, their physical condition, their environment; to classify them according to the crimes to which they are inclined; to examine as to whether crime is on the increase or not, and to decide upon the remedies of crime either in general or in particular persons.

No one will deny the utility of such investigations if they are carried on in a truly scientific spirit. All admit that one is born more disposed than another to evil, and that one may be naturally disposed to one class of crimes, another to a class entirely different. Moreover, these predispositions in their last form come from the sensitive nature, not from the intellectual. In all, this is corrupted by original sin. In all, the intellect is darkened, the will weakened and inclined to evil. These are the necessary results in the soul of the most amiable as well as in that of the most vicious of the loss of sanctifying grace. The differentiation of the evil tendencies of this general corruption of the nature in the external order may be assigned to physical causes.

Such studies, therefore, as Lombroso's, if directed to the correction of inherited defects, of physical imperfections or faults of environment, are most profitable, provided they are subordinated to the moral agents that work for the restoration of the soul. The trouble with this science, as with most others is, that it wants the whole field for itself, and insists on looking on physical or racial defects or those of environment as the only causes of crime, to the exclusion of everything else. So Lombroso did. He grew to be so infatuated with his science that he came to consider it practically impossible for a woman with a certain facial angle or other physical characteristics to be virtuous, or for a man similarly constituted not to be a thief. Free-will had no place in his system, nor was there room in it for the healing processes of grace.

For this reason the Christian sociologist must hold himself aloof from Lombroso and his followers. He knows that the reform of criminals, no matter what their ancestry may be, no matter what their facial angles, no matter what their physiognomy, no matter what their physical conformation, is never impossible with God, and that grace, the sacraments, the influences of prayer and of the Gospel teachings are the means God has put in man's hand for the healing of his brethren. Christianity would gladly have the criminologist as an assistant in this work, it would gladly use his research and experience, it would join with him in his plans for the segregation of habitual criminals, the amelioration of their lives, the improvement of their physical state. There are divinely appointed functions for the natural and the material as there are divinely appointed functions for the supernatural and spiritual. The latter reach their fulness by means of the former, but the former without the latter are barren; for the supernatural must be supreme, because to it the Creator of man has given the work of man's regeneration.

But Lombroso would not have this; his disciples would not have it. So he missed his opportunity and as years passed by drifted into new, fanciful and useless theories; into false theories that he could hold only by shutting his eyes to inconvenient facts and generalizing from those that suited his purpose. His followers, pushing his theories to their conclusions, propound unnatural, odious remedies for what they presume to call incorrigible crime. Thus it came to pass that the master lost the honor that might have been his, and went down into the grave a failure amongst men, and sadder still, the human race is deprived of the fruit it might have reaped from his labors.

The Latest New Religion

President Eliot is back from his voyage of exploration into the future. However exciting the adventure may have been to himself, and however suited to his tastes the land he has found, yet the report of his discovery reads like a leaf torn from Dr. Cook's or Capt. Peary's description of the bleak and frozen North—at least for those who with Rosalind know this workaday world as a place full of sorrows and sigh for a better.

The first thing that he has to tell us about his new religion is its idea of God. Manifestly this idea should be made clear from the start, because it is one that is fundamental. But unfortunately when we seek it in the address it seems to have learned tricks from the cuttlefish. He must be a discerning reader indeed who shall tell what it looks like. It may be pantheistic; it may be materialistic; it may be neither. To hazard a guess, I should say that "God" is employed here as a synonym for the abstract term "Nature"! Now afterwards in the course of the address he blames the religion of the past—to what religious denomination the remark would apply he does not say—for viewing God as one who after starting the world on its course withdrew and left it to itself. But what the God of the future—probably impersonal, and probably the very world itself—is going to do for the world, we are puzzled to learn from the lecture. It may be that the idea is brought in at all, not on its own account, but because his religion needs a God, though only in name. What he understands by religion itself he nowhere tells us. Here would apply a remark of Prof. Ladd, writing in the current number of the Hibbert Journal on Prof. James' Pragmatism, to the effect that there can be no advance in our search after truth unless we assign definite meanings to our terms and adhere consistently to those meanings throughout.

With these two fundamental ideas left in obscurity, he proceeds to divest religion of almost everything for which it stands in the minds of those for whom "God" and "religion" mean anything definite. Now we can admire outspoken frankness in an opponent whilst we disapprove what he says. If President Eliot had told us plainly, what he seems to insinuate, that the religion of the future is going to be no religion at all, we should at least know what he means. But it does not help the cause of truth to palter with words and to play fast and loose with ideas.

Not to mince matters, the address is less an account of a new religion than an attack on the old, and an attack made according to unfair methods. President Eliot represents his new religion as Christianity, nay, as Christianity in its highest development, and of course desires us to accept it as such. Here are the last two sentences of his lecture: "Finally the twentieth century religion is not only to be in harmony with the great secular movements . . . but also in essential agreement with the direct personal teachings of Jesus as they are reported in the gospels. The revelation he gave to mankind thus becomes more wonderful than ever." Agreement, indeed! The "religion of the future" is in flat contradiction to "the sayings of Jesus as they are reported in the gospels." Where obscurity forms the opening and disguises the close we may well distrust what lies between. If we were to revise the Declaration of Independence, beginning thus: "When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to reunite the ties which the hands of our fathers should never have severed, and to resume the dependent and subordinate station where we properly belong, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the submission"; and having recast all the contents to accord with this preamble, should end by saying: "The new document is in essential agreement with the old; the Declaration of Independence thus becomes more wonderful than ever"—we should have done something very much like the feat which President Eliot has accomplished, except that he leaves out the "causes."

The least we might expect of the President Emeritus of Harvard is that when he undertakes to treat of a subject so delicate and important he should be scholarly; the least we could ask of the apostle of a new religion, which he represents as one of love and hope, is that when he blights the hopes of millions he should first be sure of the necessity and then do so with all possible tenderness. But, alas! there is much to be found that is not scholarly in the address and much that is unlovely; not scholarly because inexact, unlovely because it shows odium theologicum. For instance, when he wrote this sentence: "Even the Hebrews offered human sacrifice for generations; and always a great part of their religious rites consisted in sacrifices of animals. The Christian church made a great step forward when it substituted the burning of incense for the burning of bullocks and doves; but to this day there survives not only in the doctrines, but also in the practices of the Christian Church, the principle of expiatory sacrifice," we are puzzled about the facts. Unless "sacrifice" is used in different meanings in the same sentence, as seems not unlikely, Protestantism has rejected sacrifice altogether. Of those Christian denominations that retain it none, so far as we know, has substituted incense for bullocks and doves, the only sacrifice they offer being the Sacrifice of the Mass, which they hold to be the same as the Sacrifice of the Cross. As to human sacrifice offered by "the Hebrews," the matter seems to be worse. If "Hebrews" is used consistently throughout the address, it means here the religion of the Old Testament, which Christ Himself ratified. So understood the statement is worse than false. Understood otherwise we can but guess at what he means. Perhaps he alludes to Moloch. If so, the historical fact tells against his point since this worship was not progress but retrogression to an enormity which called down the curse of Jehovah and made Gehenna forever a name of horror.

We thought to unmask the opposition of the new religion to Christianity by simply setting its teachings side by side with the "sayings of Jesus as reported in the gospels." President Eliot himself invites to this by continually contrasting the religion of the future with the religion of the past. Unhappily, however, for the most part he so misstates our beliefs that we cannot use his wording. Thus, for instance, he says: "The new religion will not rely on either a sudden conversion in this world or a sudden paradise in the next, out of a sensual, selfish, or dishonest life." Surely there should be no need to tell him that our religion, far from teaching us to rely on such a thing, teaches us not to rely on it. But, if he means that there is no such thing as a "death-bed conversion," then his "religion of love" takes the words of pardon from the lips of the dying Christ, and his religion of hope brings despair to one who has led "a sensual, selfish and dishonest life," since the penitent thief should have been told: "Never shalt thou be with Me in paradise." But then his religion has no paradise.

More important misstatements than this are those concerning the Incarnation, Providence and Original Sin.

There are, however, a few doctrines where his own wording sufficiently accords with our belief, and fortunately they are just those which he represents as bringing out the characteristic differences between the new religion and the old. We shall give the words of Christ together with those of President Eliot, and leave it to the reader to judge whether they are in "essential agreement." We might have multiplied the utterances of Christ on each point.

PRESIDENT ELIOT.

The religion of the future will not be based on authority either spiritual or temporal.

The new religion will not seek to reconcile men and women to present ills by promises of future blessedness either for themselves or others.

The modern man would hardly feel any appreciable loss of motive toward good or away from evil if heaven were burnt and hell quenched.

It will believe in no malignant powers—neither in Satan . . .

In short, the whole spirit of Christianity and of the new religion are not merely different, but tend in opposite directions. The one teaches that we have not here a lasting city but look for another; the other does not look beyond this earth. The one is a religion founded on the rights of a personal God, the absolute ruler of the universe, who will hold his creatures responsible in the after life for their behavior in this; the other is a worship of humanity, which feels free to leave God out of consideration and arrange everything to suit itself. We might carry out the comparison indefinitely but we will end by saying: President Eliot's religion is not a religion, not even a system of ethics, but only a vague appeal to honor; it is not new, but as old as the unsatisfactory efforts to make virtue its own reward; it is not the religion of the future, because the masses will not live by it, and the very prospect it holds out is frightening away from it the souls that seek Him who proclaimed Himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life.

CHRIST.

And I say to thee: That thou art Peter; and upon this rock I will build my church and the gates of hell will not prevail against it. And I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven. And whatsoever thou shalt bind upon earth it shall be bound also in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth it shall be loosed also in heaven. MAT. XVI, 18-19.

The Sermon on the Mount.

"If thy hand . . . thy foot . . . thy eye scandalize thee . . . cut it off . . . pluck it out. It is better for thee . . . maimed . . . lame . . . with one eye . . . to enter into the kingdom of God than . . . to be cast into the hell of unquenched fire. MARK IX, 42-48.

I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven.

Changes Rung by Time

Throughout the field of civil and political activity, we seem to have wandered into devious ways, for every now and then we hear the anxious and imperious cry: "Back to the old ideals, learn from the past when all was well, recall its spirit and imbibe it to the full." Now, in the light of what has been, this cry seems rather a sign of discontent with actual conditions than a well thought out appeal to what was and is not, yet ought to be.

The civic virtues of former generations, their honesty in business, their uprightness in public affairs and their self-sacrificing patriotism are held up for our admiration and imitation. Verily doth distance, whether of time or place, lend enchantment. Since September, 1787, when the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia finished its labors, upwards of a thousand proposed amendments to the Constitution have been formally presented for adoption. Thousands of people, therefore, unmindful of the fact that an appeal to the Constitution is necessarily an appeal to a partisan interpreter of the printed page, have hoped to obtain for themselves and us a measure of earthly bliss by pruning and budding that venerable instrument. There have always been and always will be civil and political grievances. One comes as another goes; or, more exactly, one appears and another disappears for a time, with a certain periodicity or in a certain rotation. While treating one national ailment, another breaks out; before this a second yields to a remedy, a third appears, or there is an aggravation of the first. And it was always thus.

Study the words of General Washington, when, in November, 1783, he took leave of the army: "Although the general has so frequently given it as his opinion in the most public and explicit manner, that unless the principles of the Federal Government were properly supported, and the powers of the union increased, the honor, dignity and justice of the nation would be lost forever, yet he cannot help leaving it as his last injunction to every officer and soldier to add his best endeavors toward effecting these great purposes." The tone of this, his last order, is not markedly buoyant. It seems to mirror his experience with Congress, which was simply an advisory board to thirteen contentious bodies of legislators who wanted no advice.

Then followed the Constitutional Convention, where the different States had their defenders, active, jealous, alert. Their struggle to break away from Great Britain had been crowned with success; failure long seemed all that could result from their efforts to cleave together. Petty local jealousies were aired and upheld as if they were the weightiest principles of law. Unanimity shone by its absence. When at last the Constitution, that work of infinite patience and painstaking, was sent out for adoption or rejection, our first distinctively American party names came into existence. Jay, Madison and Hamilton who spoke or wrote in defense of it were called Federalists; Patrick Henry and Samuel Adams who would reject it were styled Anti-Federalists.

Without a dissenting voice, Delaware, New Jersey and Georgia promptly voted for adoption, and Pennsylvania subscribed by a vote of two to one; but in some other States, a change of five or six votes would have caused the rejection of the Constitution. States did not trust their neighbors; citizens did not trust their fellow-citizens of other States. All this sounds very modern, but it is from the cradle days of the Republic. "On Saturday, the twenty-first of June, 1788, at one o'clock in the afternoon," New Hampshire, the ninth State to ratify, registered her vote and thus, by a provision of the Constitution, set in motion the new and untried machinery of the Republic. Virginia and New York soon joined the majority.

The various State governments were things existing and known, and of an age sufficient to command a certain respect and fealty; but the new Constitution was simply an experiment, to be judged by its working. Hence, it may be gathered that, of those who voted for its adoption, most voted to make a trial of the proposed scheme of union from which, should it suit their interests or convenience, they could withdraw at pleasure.

In Virginia, the debate on ratification, was brilliantly, even heatedly conducted. Against Madison, the "Father of the Constitution," was pitted Patrick Henry, whose appeals to Southerners against Northerners, to the debtors of the British, to the slaveholders, and to "all who valued personal liberty," were so violent that he who had cried, "Give me liberty or give me death," seemed to be in danger of the latter from a genuine burst of feeling.

On the first Wednesday of January, 1789, ten State legislatures chose the first Presidential Electors, seventy-two in all. Rhode Island and North Carolina had not ratified, and the New York legislature, owing to a deadlock, made no choice. The adoption of the Constitution had been materially helped by the general persuasion that Washington should be the first President. The electors had not been "instructed" to vote for any particular person, nor had such "instruction" been contemplated by the Constitution; for they, in their wisdom and patriotism, were to be the sole judges of the candidate's fitness. Bryce, in his "American Commonwealth," remarks that this original and uncopied feature of the Constitution was never in full vigor and long ago ceased to be operative. In our day, a presidential elector is as purely and simply a messenger as a boy who is sent on an errand to a market or a shop.

When the method of choosing a President was under discussion in the Constitutional Convention, somebody proposed "election by the citizens of the United States," but George Mason, of Virginia, an ardent Anti-Federalist, objected that "to refer the choice of a chief magistrate to the people would be as unreasonable as to refer a trial of colors to a blind man." In his stand against a popular election, the vote showed that all the States but Pennsylvania were with him. In colonial days comparatively few were permitted to vote. Maryland, founded by Catholics, excluded them later on from voting and office-holding, and obliged them to pay a double land-tax; Virginia forbade Catholics to vote, to give testimony in any court, or to possess firearms of any description; some colonies excluded Jews and Quakers; but in Georgia, the youngest and weakest and the most liberal of the colonies, though negroes were excluded, the possession of "any mechanic trade" made a white man a voter. Only in Pennsylvania was there no discrimination against Catholics. Even to-day United States citizenship does not include the right to vote, for each individual State has the power to admit to the polls or to exclude from them by State provision and enactment. Still, the State laws are so framed that we have throughout the Republic a close approach to manhood suffrage, and in four States, women stand on the same footing as men.

Those who had any voice in the adoption or rejection of the Constitution were a distinct minority, about one-fourth of the adult males in the country and no more could vote for members of the State legislatures. Therefore, when these legislatures chose seventy-two electors, few of the rank and file gave the matter any thought. Even the voting of the electors aroused little interest among the citizens in general; too few had had a voice at the polls. The majority of the people, with no concern and little curiosity about a matter so far removed from them, went on as before, with their profound discussions of the weather and the crop. Time, with the extension of the franchise, has given to every citizen, present and prospective, an interest in election which the Revolutionary patriots neither had nor knew.

Catholic Teaching in Belfast's University

The Philosophy of the Schools has been long assailed in tome and pamphlet, press and platform—mostly by people who know little or nothing about it—but not until two weeks ago has it been formally arraigned by legal procedure, attacked and defended by King's Counsel, and solemnly pronounced on by judges of the land. This happened in Dublin Castle, October 11-14, before a special committee of the Privy Council consisting of the Lord Chancellor, Judges Johnson and Ross, the Crown Solicitor, Sir Patrick Coll, the Under-Secretary for Ireland, Sir James Dougherty, and Head Commissioner Sir David Harrel.

The same act that had established the National University of Ireland, mainly under Catholic auspices, granted Queen's College, Belfast, the rights and privileges of a University for the benefit of Protestant Ulster, though, nominally at least, sectarianism was excluded from both. Of Ulster's 1,500,000 inhabitants, 800,000 are Catholics, and as the Belfast Commissioners, all Protestants, were loth to lose the majority of students in their province, they established a chair and lectureship of Scholastic Philosophy, elected a qualified Catholic layman, Professor Parke, M.A., to the former, and a Catholic priest, Rev. Denis O'Keeffe, M.A., to the latter. They also accepted gratefully a Dean of Residence appointed by Bishop O'Neill as chaplain of the Catholic students, and thought they had done a good stroke for their college; but the bigotry of Ulster was yet to be reckoned with.

The Presbyterian Conference denounced the Commissioners' action. Scholastic Philosophy was St. Thomas Aquinas, who was Catholic Philosophy and Theology rolled into one. The Commissioners had endowed a chair for the Pope and the Jesuits in Belfast University; Protestantism was in jeopardy, and the battle of the Boyne had been fought in vain, unless the Privy Council should grant their petition to inhibit Scholasticism altogether. The Marquis of Londonderry, determined that "the maiden city should be a maiden still," entered formal protest on his own account. Accordingly the Privy Council of the Lord Lieutenant appointed a distinguished committee, of whom Sir Patrick Coll was the only Catholic, to try the case.

It was really the Spirit of Calvin vs. St. Thomas Aquinas, though it transpired that philosophically there was little conflict between them. Mr. Gordon, K.C., and Mr. Wilson, K.C., appeared for the petitioners, Mr. Matheson, K.C., and Mr. McGrath, K.C., for the University Commissioners, and for three days Dublin Castle was turned into an Aula Philosophiæ. Learned counsel and expert witnesses quoted freely from St. Thomas, San Severino and Leo XIII; the "Summa," the Stonyhurst Series and Newman's "Grammar of Assent" were contrasted with Locke, Whately and Spencer; all the papers were full of this "Disputatio de Universa Philosophia," and even the Dublin cabmen were discoursing of Philosophy.

The whole contention of the petitioners was that Scholastic Philosophy necessarily included Catholic Theology, and was, therefore, in violation of the Statutes which forbade religious teaching. Mr. Gordon opened by accusing St. Thomas of teaching Roman Catholic dogma. Judge Johnson interrupted: "There was no Church in those days called Roman Catholic; it was the Catholic Church." When Father Clarke's "Logic" was cited as proving Papal Infallibility, Sir James Dougherty said: "I found 'Clark' a very useful book when I was a teacher of logic." A Presbyterian minister and others who urged that the Scholastic chair would repel Protestants but had not estimated how many Catholics it would attract, drew from Judge Ross the remark: "They do not consider the other side of the question at all."

When Professor Seth of Edinburg University, who had also taught Moral Philosophy in the United States, testified that St. Thomas made authority his fundamental principle and taught that Philosophy was subordinate to Theology, Judge Ross remarked: "That is very much the tone of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica.'" On cross-examination Mr. Seth was compelled, like the other petitioners, to admit his ignorance of Scholastic teaching, and when appealed to "as a man of common sense," he gave away his case by declaring: "I am not here as a representative of common sense, but of philosophy." Another witness who protested against the "Romanization" of the University, had no answer to Sir James Dougherty's question: "Is it more sectarian to have Catholic Philosophy taught by a Catholic, than Philosophy, approved by Presbyterians, taught by a Presbyterian?"

Judge Shaw of the Belfast University Commission said the Queen's College had been essentially Protestant, and they had established this chair in order to give equal chances to Catholics, and therefore make the new university really non-sectarian. He had known of fourteen Protestant ministers and quite a number of Protestant students who had attended Father Finlay's lectures on Philosophy, and declared that Catholic dogma was never obtruded. Two of them had won studentships in Scholastic Philosophy. Mr. Meredith, a Protestant barrister who had studied under Father Finlay, testified to the same effect.

The only Catholic called as witness was the Rev. T. A. Finlay, S.J., but his evidence was ample. Having defined philosophy as "an interpretation of all experience in the light of certain definite principles," he expounded at length the system of St. Thomas, which, he said, was "based on rational thought. A philosophy that was based on dogma or authority would be no philosophy at all." The teacher of philosophy should "use every development of modern sciences, for philosophy is the synthesis of all sciences . . . The successors of St. Thomas in the fifteenth century were mere quibblers, but I look upon Scholasticism proper as the most perfect training of the mind that can be devised." Here Judge Johnson interposed: "I am afraid we'll be all Catholics before Father Finlay is finished."

On cross-examination Father Finlay replied that the Church was the oracle not of all truth, but of revealed truth; that no books on philosophy are or can be altogether free from religion; that Scholastic Philosophy was unintelligible to the general professor and could only be taught properly by one who knew and believed it. "But an atheist may teach mathematics," said Judge Johnson. "But he believes mathematics," was the reply. Catholics asked for a scholastic chair because their Church approved of Scholasticism; Protestants sometimes asked for it because they believed it to be the best. Catholic philosophy contains nothing that may not be accepted by any believer in revealed truth.

The Lord Chancellor announced at the end of the inquiry, which he said was long "but not one moment longer than it deserved," that, by unanimous decision,

"the Committee will advise his Excellency (the Lord Lieutenant) that the three petitions should be dismissed." Thus the three days' battle ended with Catholic Philosophy in permanent possession of the Presbyterian stronghold, for it was conceded by all parties that only Catholics were qualified to expound Scholasticism.

The Protestant experts went away wiser, if sadder, men. The general impression produced not only on Catholics but on Protestants, was that Scholasticism is the only definite system of Philosophy, and that its exponents were the only witnesses who knew whereof they spoke. This impression was intensified by an address delivered before the Catholic Truth Society, which happily held its annual convention in Dublin while the Privy Council was in session.

Dr. Windle, President of Cork University, speaking on "The Intellectual Claims of the Catholic Church," showed that she is not only the Church of the ignorant but of the wise, that "she has been the fondly loved mother of more great writers and pioneers in all branches of discovery than have all the other religions of the world put together"; that contempt of Scholasticism is a mark of ignorance; that biologists and chemists have gone back to the Schoolmen, who anticipated by 500 years the transformism of to-day that has falsified the scientists of yesterday; and that the "Summa" of St. Thomas is the classic of systematized wisdom. The Church is as much a marvel from the intellectual standpoint as from any other, and the learned have as much reason as the ignorant to cry: "Thank God for our Holy Faith!"

Regarding a paper read by Father Watters, C.M., on "The Press," Archbishop Healy said: To have a powerful Catholic Press, you require powerful writers, men of sound education, wide culture and high principles; and such you will not have unless they go through a course of sound moral and mental philosophy, ethics, economics and kindred questions; that is to say, a thorough university education under the safe guidance of Scholastic philosophers. Opportunity was denied before, but the National University should now enable Catholic young men to equip themselves for effective Catholic journalism.

Cardinal Logue also insisted on the need of sound philosophical education for the propagation of Catholic Truth. Alluding to the Privy Council Inquiry, he said that our Catholic system had proved its pre-eminence, its decriers had proved their ignorance, and the brand of heresy was no longer the brand of respectability, social or intellectual.

According to a special despatch dated October 23, from Colon to the Sun, two-thirds of the construction of the Canal has been completed. Of this, one-half had already been done by the French. It consisted of an excavation of 85,000,000 cubic yards; 87,000,000 more have been excavated since 1904, when our Government assumed the work, and 87,000,000 remain to be excavated.

"At Least You, My Friends!"

The "Month's Mind" was over. The priest had unvested and was making his thanksgiving before the altar in the little basement church. The widow and her two little girls in deep black still knelt in the seats at the top of the aisle. The sacristan removed the catafalque and stowed away under the organ the six tall candlesticks with the yellow candles.

I met him in the porch as I went out. "John Callaghan," he said in answer to my unspoken question. "He drove a wagon for Belford's, the coal people. Thim's the widow and two girls. The boy works in Schultz's, the grocer. The haythen wouldn't lave him free to come to the month's mind this mornin'! The Lord reward him—and He will, too. When his turn comes he'll know what it is to need a friend. Purgatory'll be terrible lonesome for some people—if they're lucky enough to get there."

"Mike," said I pointedly, "how long do you think anyone will remember us?"

"Well, sir," said Mike, "I'm thinkin' it'll be just about as long as we remember thim."

"If that's all, then the Lord be merciful to us, for we'll need it." I meant it, too, for only a couple of days previously I had heard from Thomas a Kempis some searching truths on the point.

"Well who knows?" said Mike. "Listen now—Mornin', James, 'tis a beautiful day."

His salutation was addressed to an old man coming out of the basement. His face was abundantly familiar to me, seeing that every morning he occupied the same seat at the back of the centre aisle. It was such an old man's face as one sees often in Ireland, on which the peace of childhood seems to have so softened the marks of time, and struggle that the lines are all reposeful and harmonious. The sacristan presented me formally to Mr. James Nolan—"a County Cork man like yourself, sir!"—and we exchanged conventional greetings.

"Well, James," said Mike, somewhat suggestively—not to say provocatively, "John Callaghan'll rest easier to-day."

"He will so," said James. "Lord ha' mercy on him! He was a good, steady man. I knew his father in old St. James's down town. He's dead this twenty-two year. He went after Paddy Sheehan and before Molly Joyce. Lord be good to thim! There's a great plenty gone since thin."

"We've more friends that side than this," said Mike, surreptitiously pulling my coat sleeve.

"Begor, we have that!" said James with a laugh. "I'll have tin more names in me envelope next Sunday for this year."

"An' how many'll that make, James?" Mike's voice dripped simulated nonchalance while his face worked with the strength of his desire that I should see the point.

"A hundherd an' thirty-four last year an' tin this year—that'll be a hundherd an' fortyfour," answered James with perfect simplicity.

"Well now, look at that!" said Mike with a perfectly natural air of surprise. "A hundherd an' forty-four! It bates me how you can remember thim all, James."

"'Tis aisy enough to remember thim whin they're yer friends," said James.

"I suppose ye could call the roll any time," said Mike endeavoring to infuse yet more indifference into his tone.

"Deed I could," said James, "why not?" and then and there to Mike's undisguised joy in that church porch, the old man commenced the litany of his dead. It went somewhat as follows:

"Grandfather an' grandmother, uncle Pat, uncle James, father, aunt Bridget, aunt Mollie, mother; Lord ha' mercy on her! Cousin John, Mat Malone, Mary Shea, Father Daly, Owen McGuire, Father Sheridan, Owen O'Neill, Patsy Bryan, John Byrne, Mary Byrne, Doctor Ford, Willie Clancy, Nellie Murphy, Dick Cronin, little Jamesy, John Molloy, Bridget Mahony, little Mollie,"—and so on.

His wife's name came late in the list. He called her his "darlin' Mollie." I could hardly repress a start when he named "Charles Stewart Parnell," and a little later "William Ewart Gladstone." For what seemed many minutes he stood there his eyes closed, the names coming rapidly and without a shadow of hesitation. It took him perhaps three minutes to recite the roll—at last came—" . . . John Callaghan an' Richard Lonergan, an' certain others an' thim that has none to pray for thim."

We had prayed the first time for Lonergan's soul the previous Sunday. Mike looked at me with triumph in his eye and James came to himself with a jerk.

"That's a long list," I said lamely.

"'Tis not manny for sivinty-six years, sir," said James, "an' there's thim I've forgotten, too. Lord ha' mercy on thim! An' I hope they'll forgive me when my own time comes. 'Twon't be so long now, ayther, Mike. Well, good mornin' to ye, sir—mornin' Mike!" and off he trudged down the street.

"Well," said Mike, "what d'ye think of that?"

"Oh! Mike—there's them he's forgotten—he said so himself. May the good Lord forgive us—me, I mean!" As I spoke Father — came through the porch on his way to breakfast. He caught my last words.

"What's the matter?" he said.

"Father, I'm tempted to wish I was dead and on James Nolan's list," I said. Mike left us and went back into the church, grinning widely as he went.

"You might be worse off. He'll be in with five large sheets of foolscap next Sunday. Did he call the roll for you?"

"He did," I said.

"And did you stop to ask yourself how he was able to do it almost without drawing breath and without a stop?"

A great light poured in on my mind.

"Every morning of his life he calls his roll at Mass.

Some of the people on it are dead these sixty to seventy years. I suspect 'twould be a waste of good prayers for most of them only there's no such thing. No I don't mean what you think—I mean they're in Heaven long ago if they are James's kind, and James's prayers are undoubtedly distributed elsewhere. I hope James is in my parish when I die."

He stopped in hesitation a moment.

"I'll tell you something more if you'll promise not to laugh. How did he finish his list?—I mean after the names stopped."

I told him.

"I thought so. How do you suppose he came to put in the phrase, 'certain others?' Well I'll have to tell you—it's too good to keep. When I first came to this parish and James' list came in, I made a business of getting acquainted with him and he told me about it. Just for deviltry, I said to him—'James, there's a big list of deaths every day in the Herald—why don't you pray for them, too?' "'Tis a good notion,' says James. And every day he puts them in in the 'certain others' part of his list and completes his intention later by going to the sexton's office and borrowing the Herald to read them over. James has many a friend in the next world, I fancy, that he knows nothing about."

No! It was not laughing that threatened me.

ANDREW PROUT.

When advocating the establishment of Episcopalian Parish Schools at the annual dinner of the Hamilton Club, Brooklyn, Monday evening last, Bishop Frederick Burgess said that the increase of six millions in the membership of the Catholics during the past thirteen years was due largely to the Parochial Schools. In New York alone, the Catholic Parochial Schools have 100,000 pupils, the Bishop said, where the children are taught Christian truth as received by the Catholic Church; the teaching of these truths is the real educational force, and all education must include religious teaching. The children in Catholic schools learn loyalty to their religion and affection for their teachers.

The public schools are a drawback to religion, as they give no religious teaching. Our Church would do well to establish schools, says the Bishop, and "I hope that we may soon see the establishment of parochial schools."

It is one of the ironies of fate, no doubt, that the former owners of Everybody's Magazine should have been charged with the very accusation it has so often brought against prominent financiers and corporations, when lately its managers were turning it over to the Butterick Publishing Company. When some of the stockholders of this company set a valuation of $3,000,000 on Everybody's, they admitted that the property consisted chiefly of good will and a well organized staff, although the members of the staff were not under contract.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Balkan Troubles

In the early part of this year, all Europe was seized with war-fever, because the ruler of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, in virtue of his sovereign right, annexed a corner of the Balkan peninsula. In 1878 Austria freed Bosnia and Herzegovina from Turkish rule and with the consent of the European powers exercised protectorial rights over them from that time to the 7th of October, 1908, when she peaceably annexed the two provinces.

Austria's nearest neighbors, Serbia and Montenegro, were aggrieved and claimed that their rights had been disregarded. Urged on by England and supported by Russia, Serbia not only demanded that Austria should reconsider her action, but threatened to wrest the two provinces from her by force of arms and add them to the Servian Kingdom. Turkey also protested, whereupon Austria offered her fifty-four million crowns, twenty-five million Turkish pounds, in compensation for her loss. Turkey accepted the compensation and forfeited all rights to the annexed territory. Austria then demanded that Serbia should renounce her claim to Bosnia and Herzegovina, acknowledge the annexation to be just and promise immediate cessation of warlike preparations. Moreover, Prince George, the Servian heir-apparent, was required to abandon his claims to the crown. To all this Serbia agreed without any compensation whatsoever, but scarcely had the official documents been signed, when the Servian Minister of War publicly declared that peace would be of short duration, that Serbia had been forced to yield to Austria, because Russia having abandoned her at the last moment, she was unprepared for war, but that she would never relinquish her claim to the annexed provinces.

Serbia is restless, the army is being strengthened and public meetings in which the people are being stirred up against Austria, are the order of the day. Prince George, contrary to his signed declaration, persists in claiming the crown and is the most active agitator against Austria.

So unsettled is the country that parties are even demanding the deposition of the entire Servian Karagjorgjevic dynasty, for not maintaining the rights of the people. It may interest readers of AMERICA to hear something of the past and present history of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

These provinces are bounded on three sides by Austro-Hungary in the north the River Save separates them from Croatia and Slavonia; on the north-west the River Una; Dalmatia forms the southern boundary and Serbia, Montenegro and Turkey the eastern. Together, the two provinces have an area of about 950 geographical square miles and have the shape of a right-angled triangle whose southern side touches the Adriatic at two points. Till the end of the fifth century the Romans ruled in these lands, the northern portion belonging to Pannonia; the southern to Illyria or Dalmatia. In the sixth and seventh centuries came the Croats and settled in the present Croatia, Slavonia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Dalmatia and Montenegro. Their eastern neighbors were the Serbs, who inhabited present Serbia, eastern Bosnia to the River Bornas, old-Servia, to-day part of Turkey, and Sandzak, a Turkish district between Serbia and Montenegro.

The Croats and Serbs are descended from two tribes of the same Slavic people; their language is the same except for some insignificant differences in dialect and the same may be said of their national customs and mode of life. In character, however, they differ considerably, a fact, no doubt, chiefly owing to religious and political causes. Both tribes accepted Christianity early.

In the eighth century, Croatia was already an important state, and had become powerful in the ninth. Prince Tomislav, having united Herzegovina and Bosnia, had himself crowned in 925 as King of Croatia, but the dynasty founded by him died out in 1102, when the Croats chose as their ruler the Hungarian King, Kuloman, because of his near relationship to Thelma, the last Croatian queen.

The Servian tribes formed several small principalities, dependent either on the Byzantine or Bulgarian emperors, until Prince Michael united all the Servian lands and caused himself to be proclaimed king in 1078. Pope Gregory VII sent him the royal insignia except the crown, while he commissioned a special ambassador to confer the crown upon the Croatian King, Demetrius Zvonimir.

The first Servian King to receive the crown from the Pope was Stefan Prvoojencani (The First Crowned). It was conferred upon him by Honorius III in 1220, but already in the following year, King Stefan with his people went over to the Greek schismatic faith, and since that time the Serbs have remained schismatics, while the Croats have preserved the Catholic belief and allegiance to Rome. Bosnia (Upper and Lower), Herzegovina (formerly Kulm) and Montenegro (Duklja or Zeta) were dependencies of Croatia till 949. In that year Serbs, persecuted by the Bulgars, sought refuge in Herzegovina and Montenegro; later Servian princes occupied both these lands.

The northern part of Bosnia, called Lower Bosnia because it lies lower than Upper Bosnia, the old districts of Soli, Ursora, Dolnjikraji, Zapadnestrane always belonged to Croatia. Southern, or Upper Bosnia, was the Bosnia of the Middle Ages. From the eleventh century sometimes under Croatia, sometimes under Serbia, sometimes under Byzantium, it became independent for a time, but in 1135 came again under Croatian rule, remaining under it almost uninterruptedly till the middle of the fourteenth century. About the year 1279, there ruled in Bosnia, Banus (Croatian word for warrior or ruler) Stefan Kortroman, who remained a vassal of the Hungarian-Croatian King, Banus Inlasden Subic. His successors ruled in Bosnia till its conquests by the Moslems in 1463.

Herzegovina (Kulm) was at first independent, then came under Croatia and in 949 under Serbia. In 960 it belonged to Duklja (Montenegro). Later it passed to the Bulgarians, from the Bulgarians to the Greeks, from the Greeks to Montenegro and from Montenegro to the Serbs.

In 1198 Andreas, Duke of Croatia and Dalmatia, and son of the Hungarian-Croatian King Bela III, was its ruler. Duke Andreas bore the title of "dux totius Dalmatiæ, Croatiae et Kulmii." In 1326 Herzegovina passed under the rule of Banus Stefan Kotroman (son of Kortroman). His second successor, Stefan Trvtko I (1353-1391) conquered Serbia and Montenegro and had himself crowned King of Bosnia and Serbia in 1376. Later, he conquered Croatia and Slavonia and proclaimed himself King of Croatia, Stefan Trvtko I, was next to the Servian King Dusau Silni (1331-1355), one of the most powerful and celebrated of the Slavic rulers; the only one of his day whose name was not stained with crime.

He was succeeded by six Bosnian kings all called Stefan, but intrigues for the possession of the throne, the interference of Hungarian-Croatian kings, the lawlessness of the native magnates, the advance of the Turks and bitter religious dissensions put an end to the young kingdom. The Bogumili sect, alias Peterer or Albiogusees had so won the upper hand that the Hungarian-Croatian ruler with the approval of the Popes undertook three crusades against them. In 1446 the last Bosnian King, Stefan Tomasević, was assassinated by order of Mohammed II and Bosnia and Herzegovina were incorporated with Turkey. Upon Mohammed's withdrawal to Constantinople, Matthias Corvinus, the Hungarian-Croatian King, conquered Lower Bosnia (northern part lying along the River Save) which remained a possession of the Hungarian-Croatians till 1528. In that year Bosnia and Herzegovina were again taken by the Turks and retained by them till 1878 when Austria freed them.

In the nineteenth century Europe began to rid itself of the "unspeakable Turk." In 1876 Serbia was freed and formed a principality under the suzerainty of Turkey till 1878, becoming a kingdom in 1882. Greece was freed in 1829, becoming a kingdom in 1830; and receiving a part of Thessaly and Epirus in 1879. Montenegro became an independent principality in 1878; Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia were still under Turkey, but in 1887 Roumelia became an independent kingdom; later Bulgaria annexed Roumelia and since 1908 both these countries form an independent kingdom.

It was a happy hour for Bosnia and Herzegovina when under Austria they were freed from Turkish rule. Many abortive attempts at freedom had been made by the much persecuted inhabitants. For thirty years Turkey has been only the nominal ruler of these provinces; on the 7th of October, 1908, it forfeited all claims even to this empty title, and to day Bosnia and Herzegovina are integral parts of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

STEFAN BAUMONIĆ, S.J.

Catholics in Westminster Abbey

LONDON, OCTOBER 13, 1909.

"Dear me, you mustn't do that. If you wants to pray you comes to the regular service at three o'clock. I'm sorry to interfere but you are delaying the party, and there's a lot of tombs to see yet."

The story goes that this speech was addressed by a verger (not at Westminster Abbey but in one of the old English cathedrals) to one of a party of tourists committed to his guidance, who was so untouristlike as to kneel down to pray. It is an eccentric proceeding that the average showman-verger does not understand and sometimes resents. But at Westminster to-day, as the result of experience during the last twenty years, the vergers are giving Catholic visitors every opportunity of praying at St. Edward's shrine, for it is the feast of the sainted king, whose tomb alone of all the old shrines of Catholic England remains unviolated. There his sacred relics most certainly are still enclosed.

O'Connell, during one of the last years of his life, wrote, under the impression of the Oxford conversions, that one might hope soon to see Mass said again in the Abbey. Nearly seventy years have gone by and the realization of that hope is still remote. But it is something that on St. Edward's day and during the octave those who keep his Faith are again allowed to pray at his tomb, and Westminster becomes for awhile a Catholic sanctuary. The movement began timidly twenty years ago. A few Catholics came to the shrine and knelt regardless of the wonder of the Protestant onlookers. Now they come in hundreds. During the Abbey services St. Edward's chapel is deserted, but as soon as these cease the stream of pilgrims flows steadily in and out hour after hour. Priests and laymen, men and women, nuns with little processions of school children, form changing groups about the shrine. They touch it with rosaries to gain a new blessing for the beads. The scene makes one wonder if this is still Protestant London. Until the accession of the present King Edward VII, the shrine was bare, its original stone base below, and above a sixteenth century structure of wooden arches. King Edward has adorned his namesake's shrine with a splendid pall of red silk embroidered in gold. At one end of it a little altar has been erected, with a brass cross. I am told that early on St. Edward's day a number of High Churchmen have a "celebration" here in strict privacy.

The Abbey of Westminster is itself a historic argument against Anglican theories and a monument of the loyal devotion of Old England to the Holy See. Edward the Confessor had vowed to make a pilgrimage to Rome, but it was considered that a prolonged absence of the King would be perilous for his kingdom and the Pope dispensed him from his vow on condition that he should bestow in alms to the poor the amount his journey would have cost him. Not content with this the holy king decided to rebuild and re-endow the Benedictine Abbey of St. Peter at Westminster, founded by his predecessor King Sebert. The new buildings were completed just before his death and he was entombed in the choir. On his canonization in 1181 the body was solemnly transferred to a shrine in the chapel behind the High Altar. When the stone coffin was opened the body was found incorrupt, clad in golden robes, and with his beard "long, white and rather curly" flowing down over his breast. When Henry VIII despoiled the shrine the body of the saint was reverently buried on the north side of the sanctuary. Under Queen Mary the shrine was repaired and the sacred relics replaced in it in 1557, enclosed in a wooden case. In the reign of James II the fall of a scaffold pole broke the upper woodwork of the shrine and forced the case open. It was repaired and during this work an examination of the sacred relics showed that the body was reduced to a skeleton. An enamelled crucifix, originally on the breast suspended by a gold chain, had fallen on to the shoulder blades. There was a gold circlet round the brows. The jaws were full of teeth all in good condition. In the coffin there was much dust as well as fragments of linen and of gold embroidered silk. We have thus a continuous record proving beyond all doubt that the relics of St. Edward are still in the Westminster shrine.

The coronation chair, often spoken of as the "Chair of St. Edward," dates only from the time of King Edward I. The abbey has been rebuilt throughout since the days of the sainted king, but one of the few remaining portions of the original structure has just been reopened to the public after having been closed for centuries. This is a small chapel opening off the cloisters. It is known as the "chapel of the pyx," but in this case the word "pyx" is used in its original sense of a box of any kind. The chapel was long the place where crown jewels were kept in the custody of the abbot of Westminster, and later it contained a coffer or "pyx" in which tested specimens of each issue of the coinage were deposited. It is a small vaulted room with a massive pillar in the middle from which the arches of the roof spring. Placed against one wall is a small altar, the only altar in the abbey that escaped destruction at the Reformation, probably because the chapel was then a treasury. The original altar stone is there, the only damage done to it being the removal of the relics. A hollow in the centre of the stone shows where they once lay. There are very few altar stones of the pre-Reformation church still in their original positions in England. In fact at the moment I can remember only one other instance, that of Christ Church near Bournemouth. The Reformers in their fierce hatred of the Holy Mass were not content to remove the altars. The Elisabethan bishops ordered that the consecrated stones on which the Holy Sacrifice had been offered for centuries should be "broken up or devoted to common uses." This does not prevent Anglicans from arguing that the Reformation made no essential difference in the faith and worship of England. The old altar of the Pyx Chapel is for Catholics a link with the past, and one is glad to think that it will not be further desecrated by High Church "celebrations." Perhaps in the far-off future the day will come when in the hollow of the altar stone other relics will be placed, those it may be of a martyr who died that the Mass might still be said in England, and the Holy Sacrifice will again be offered on this old altar. The English Benedictines testify to their persevering hope that Westminster will be one day restored to Catholic worship by regularly electing a titular Abbot of Westminster, just as the Church keeps up the titular succession to the sees of western Asia and North Africa which were swept away by the Mohammedan conquests. In both cases there is the same prayerful hope that one day Our Lord will deal favorably in His good will with Sion that the walls of Jerusalem may be built up.

The Irish Friars Minor and University College, Cork

An event of more than local interest in its relation to Catholic education took place recently in Cork. This was the formal opening of St. Anthony's Hall and Hostel by the Bishop of Cork, on which occasion the Most Rev. Dr. O'Callaghan, O.P., invested Dr. Windle, President of the University College, with the insignia of the Knighthood of St. Gregory the Great conferred upon this eminent Catholic scientist and littérateur by his Holiness, Pope Pius X. The honor was significant as giving indirectly Papal and episcopal approval to the transformed Queen's College which, as one of the "godless colleges," in the midst of a Catholic community had been placed under a ban by the Holy See and the Irish Hierarchy. Now incorporated with the new National University of Ireland by Mr. Birrell's epoch-making Act, it has been launched on a new and, it is to be hoped, a more prosperous career, with the ecclesiastical ban removed. With a distinguished convert at its head and a staff of professors, most of whom are Catholics, it will attract more Catholic students to its halls and will be practically a Catholic University College. The establishment of a Catholic hostel, on the lines of those of Oxford, adjoining the college buildings is an important move in that direction. Here, as elsewhere, Catholics are recovering or recapturing lost ground.

St. Anthony's Hall, which is to serve the double purpose of a House of Studies for Franciscan students and a hostel or house of residence for lay Catholics taking out lectures at University College, is very suitably situated close to the College, "not wholly in the busy world nor quite beyond it," like Tennyson's garden. It is a large building, formerly called Berkeley Hall after the eccentric philosopher and philanthropist who was Protestant Bishop of Cloyne (1734-1753) and had strange notions about the existence or, rather, non-existence of matter and the medicinal properties of tar-water. Under its previous title it was an abortive attempt to establish a Protestant house of residence for Protestant students. Not even the name of that celebrated Irish metaphysician saved it from being a failure ab initio. After being long untenanted and disused the present Lord Mayor (Councillor Thomas Donovan) bought it and re-sold it to the Irish Friars Minor, donating liberally to its transformation into a Franciscan Hall.

The site thus secured by the Franciscans is on ground hallowed by antique religious associations. Here, or in this immediate neighborhood, stood, many centuries ago, the old monastic school of Cork, one of Ireland's ancient schools, which was still flourishing in the time of St. Malachy. Its genesis was at Gougane Barra, where St. Finbarr, founder of the old city and see of Cork, gathered around him in his island hermitage a few poor scholars from the wilds of west Cork who formed the nucleus of the larger school at St. Finbarr's Abbey, afterwards called Gill Abbey, a name by which the high ground to the east of St. Anthony's Hall overlooking the city is even still known. It took its name from the monastery founded in the twelfth century by Giolla Aedha O'Muidhin, who was Bishop and Abbot of Cork from 1152 to 1172, and is commemorated in the Annals of Innisfallen as "a man full of the grace of God, the love of virginity and wisdom of his time."

This Abbey had been previously known as the Abbey of the Cave, or the Abbey of St. Finbarr's Cace—Antrum Sancti Fion Barrie—the favorite retreat of St. Finbarr for solitary prayer and contemplation. It was the oldest ecclesiastical foundation in Cork and stood near where University College and St. Anthony's Hall now stand. It is associated with the golden age of Irish monasticism. All this part of the environs of Cork is historically holy ground, once inhabited by saints and sages whose names are enshrined in Gaelic story. Boullaye le Gouz, a French traveler, who visited Cork in 1644 makes mention of the ruins of a monastery here, and "a cave which extends far under the ground, where, they say, St. Patrick resorted often for prayer."

Old chronicles relate that seventeen prelates and seven hundred monks dwelt at one time within the precincts of Gill Abbey. The late Dr. Caulfield, a local antiquary, conjectures this is an error grounded on a misrepresentation of a passage in the Litanies of Aengus Kilideus, or Aengus the Culdee, in which he invokes the assistance of the seventeen bishops and seven hundred servants of God, whose remains were interred there.

However, this may be, the Abbey contributed much for many centuries to the religious growth and government of the city and surroundings. A large number of the abbots of St. Finbarr's, or Gill Abbey, became Bishops of Cork. Down to the Anglo-Norman invasion a regular succession of bishop-abbots was preserved and recorded in the Church of Cork. The incident of the Catholic Bishop of Cork standing beside the Catholic President of the new University of Cork and consecrating for the religious direction of its students a Catholic house built on the site of St. Finbarr's, bridges the present with the past and marks the continuance of its ancient and holy traditions.

The Portola Festival

San Francisco devoted last week to celebrating with great pomp the one hundred and fortieth anniversary of the discovery of its famous bay. Sir Francis Drake and other navigators had sailed past the Golden Gate without perceiving it, and had never entered the inland waters to which it leads. How the discovery is connected with the name of Gaspar de Portola, a few words will tell. He had been sent from Spain to enforce the decree of expulsion against the Jesuits of Lower California. Having accomplished this he led an expedition into Upper California to prepare the way for the Franciscan missions. His plan was to march northward along the coast as far as the port of Monterey, where a ship with supplies was to meet him. Not recognizing the landmarks of Monterey he passed it, pushing on through the Santa Cruz Mountains, until on October 31, 1769, from the uplands somewhere near Point San Pedro he saw the ocean stretched out before him with Point Reyes in the northwest and the Farallones on the horizon. The wiser of the party saw, what they had for some time suspected, that they had passed the port of Monterey, and that what was now before their eyes protected by Point Reyes, was what seamen had called the port of San Francisco. They wished, therefore, to turn back. Portola seems to have been somewhat self-willed; and, though his men were worn out with sickness and travel, insisted on sending a party still northward along the coast to search for Monterey and the supply-ship. After three days his men returned saying that their progress was impeded by great estuaries running into the land to get round which they had been obliged to make wide detours. Portola visited the entrance of the estuary now called the Golden Gate.

It is possible that he never saw the inland waters of San Francisco Bay. He was on the coast looking out over the ocean and between him and them lay the mountains. As for the other estuaries that his men told about, they have vanished so completely that one might hold that they existed only in the imagination of men who did not want to go north on a wild-goose chase, and therefore never got very far away from Portola's camp. Possibly they did not see the actual Golden Gate, for had they done so they would have recognized that it was no estuary to be passed by any detour however wide, and had they diverged in the least from their line of march to mount one of the neighboring hills, they would have seen the bay in all its splendor spread out before them.

SAN FRANCISCO RESTORED.

Portola, however, is not the essential nor the chief object of the celebration. San Francisco wanted to celebrate, and if imperial Cæsar's dust may serve to stop a crevice, the memory of Portola might be used as a picturesque setting for its festivities. These were really in honor of the restoration of the city prostrated in the calamity of April 18, 1906. Three years and a half to a day had elapsed since that dreadful morning when on the 18th inst. the celebration began. It was of the usual kind. A descendant of Spanish pioneers acted the part of Portola entering the city with all solemnity. English, German and Japanese warships joined our own to make a brave show. The streets were gay with flags and bunting. Soldiers and citizens marched in grand parade, and sight-seers flocked in from all the country round. God was not forgotten. When His hand was heavy on them the Archbishop bade the people turn to Him in penitence; now that it was open in blessing, filling them with all manner of good, he called upon them to lift up thankful hearts. In every church there was a Mass of thanksgiving, and in the cathedral it was accompanied with extraordinary pomp.

The heart of the whole country went out to the rejoicing city as it had gone out to the ruined city in its disaster. At Chicago, New York and other places, congratulatory banquets were held, at which was drunk the Portola toast, formulated by the President himself, wishing enduring safety and prosperity to the much-tried city of the Golden Gate.

Is Spirit Photography "Shameless Imposture"?

This is the heading of an interesting article in the October number of the American Review of Reviews. It begins by stating that "almost simultaneously from both sides of the Atlantic come charges that the so-called spirit photography is a fraud pure and simple." The reviewer does not say that it is; but he gives such plausible proofs of the serious charge that most readers will be convinced it is so. And yet the article proves nothing but the skill of the writer. It is a well developed specimen of the familiar sophism which concludes from some particulars to the universal. It comes to this:

Several spirit photographs have been proved to be frauds; therefore all are frauds. One case is called "A Convincing Experiment," which is anything but convincing. A Mr. Bedding was told how to make such a picture; he tried his best to do it, but he failed; therefore it cannot be done. The same Mr. Bedding begins by declaring "he knew nothing whatever of spiritualism," and yet more than half the article is taken up with his witty remarks on the subject.

The question is worth investigating. Spiritists claim that they have hundreds of thousands of intelligent men and women who firmly believe in their pretensions of dealing with the spirit world; and spirit photographs are among their boasted proofs. They admit that much imposture is connected with many of their séances; but they maintain that they can really deal with disembodied spirits.

If the Review of Reviews, or any writer whatever will prove that spirit photography in particular is a shameless imposture, he will render a great service to its dupes. On the other hand, if any one will prove beyond a doubt that it is a reality, he will render a valuable service to the still larger number of those who consider all spiritism as mere imposture. He will thus support the contention of Catholic writers generally that, along with much imposture, spiritism contains dealings with real spirits; and as those spirits are confessed by their votaries to be often lying spirits, that it leads to dealings with the devil. The matter has a moral bearing which is of the highest importance. It is a gross sin of superstition to commune with evil spirits, or to expose oneself willingly to the danger of dealing with the enemy of God and man; it is like the treason of soldiers who, in time of active warfare, would have secret dealings with the foe. The Church strictly forbids the practice of spiritism. To tell the faithful that it is mere imposture is like the language of the old serpent in Paradise: "You shall not die . . . you shall be as gods knowing good and evil." Curiosity to know has ruined many besides our first parents. It is the bait thrown out by spiritism, the more seductive since it is made to appear as merely harmless trickery. The Church does not pronounce spirit photography to be devilry, but she forbids her children to meddle with what may be devilry; and in this the Church acts as the interpreter of divine prohibition applying to all men whether members of the Church or not.

A New Logic

A great many Episcopalians trust implicitly the London Church Times, which takes advantage of their confidence to dogmatize with appalling freedom. Sometimes, less wise than Falstaff, it gives reasons for its assertions, using for this a logic of its own. A short time ago we called attention to the discrepancy between this and what is commonly used; and the number of October 8 gives another example of it in "To Correspondents," running as follows: "As the Pope is admittedly fallible on some occasions, and these occasions are not infallibly known, it is evident that he may be wrong on any given occasion." If this be good enough logic for the Pope, it is good enough for anybody. Let us put "John" in place of the Pope, and for "is fallible" substitute the simpler verb "lies," and see how it works out. John admittedly lies on some occasions; but these occasions are not infallibly known, therefore he may be lying on any given occasion. John will probably think it rather hard to have his character for truthfulness made dependent upon the perspicacity of others; but when he sees how utterly the Church Times' logic shatters his reputation, he will probably forget the minor grievance. According to that journal we may suspect him of lying on any occasion.

Let us take one on which he has sworn solemnly to tell the truth. If the Church Times' logic be right, John's occasional inaccuracy makes him a probable perjurer. The conclusion, fortunately for John, will hardly be accepted. It would destroy the value of much evidence in courts of law, since most men are much as John is. Put the argument this way: John admittedly lies on some occasions, i. e., in a certain category of assertions, e. g., such as concern his horses, his dogs, his guns, his bags of game, his hands at whist and the blunders of his partners, etc., now one, now another is untrue, but which these are we do not know; and then see what the logician of the Church Times has a right to conclude. In the first place his conclusion must be confined to the category implied in the premises, and may not call in question John's truthfulness in business matters or in the explanations he gives his wife of his late hours. If John is to be suspected of universal lying he must at least be proved an occasional liar in every category either actually or equivalently. Secondly, the conclusion: "therefore on any given occasion where there is question of horses, dogs, etc., John may be lying," is not the only one possible from the premises.

APPLICATION TO THE CHURCH TIMES.

Suppose for a moment the logician of the Church Times to be John. How would he like his best stories to be received with polite incredulity just because occasionally a lively imagination has betrayed him? He would be the first to see that from the given premises one may conclude speculatively not only the possibility of John's lying on any given occasion, but also the possibility of his telling the truth; or that the conclusion may be the practical judgment that we had better be on our guard against John, or that he is probably lying, or that he is probably telling the truth, or that we have not sufficient grounds for making up our mind one way or the other. Which of these it should be must depend upon circumstances, especially upon the frequency or infrequency with which John draws the long bow.

Having settled John, let us come back to the Pope.

He may reasonably ask the Church Times why his fallibility should be in the direct ratio of the obtuseness of Anglicans and their friends? Then, as the possibility of his erring is admitted with regard to only a certain definite category of utterances, the Church Times can no more conclude from this his fallibility in any given utterances, say definitions ex cathedra, than from John's occasional inveracities it can conclude him to be a probable perjurer. Again, as the practical conclusions concerning John's veracity in matters of a determined category must depend on his general attitude towards truth in such matters, so must the conclusions regarding the Pope's utterances not strictly ex cathedra depend on the general correctness of his teachings, even for those who do not recognize fully his teaching office. As it would be most illogical and unjust to put John down as one whose word in matters regarding sport is always to be doubted because occasionally he has forgotten himself; so is it most illogical and unjust to put the Pope down as one to be always mistrusted because in all the utterances of nearly two thousand years an enemy may twist half a dozen till they look something like mistakes.

The President on Foreign Soil

Whence arose the persuasion which influenced practice until these latter days that the President ought not to leave the country during his incumbency? A trip to South America or even to Europe implied an absence of some duration with the necessity of handing over the reins of government to the vice-president; but a friendly call on the Canadian side of the boundary, or a visit to Ciudad Juarez could be paid without slipping a cog in the machinery of State. Let us see. As oaks rise from acorns, so a national custom may spring from some event which might now seem trifling, although it was at one time full of significance. We think that we find in the administration of President Washington the first official act to which the practice of his successors in keeping within our boundaries may be traced, and that act was what it was intended to be, a direct snub. At the first Presidential election, even at the time of the inauguration of Washington in New York City, April 30, 1789, Rhode Island and North Carolina were not a part of the United States of America, for neither had ratified the Constitution and neither had had any voice in the election. When, therefore, President Washington made an official visit to New England, the presidential party was careful not to enter the "foreign territory" of Rhode Island, as a gentle reminder to its citizens, we may say, that while they held out against the Constitution they deserved to be boycotted and could expect to be treated as foreigners. This incident way well be the real cause of the unvarying practice which followed, although the President's action was prompted by purely local and temporary conditions, and was intended to arouse in Rhode Islanders a realization of their helplessness and isolation.

Suppressing Slander

Their prompt suppression of a widely circulated slander on the priesthood at Meridian, Miss., is typical of the many local services rendered to the Church by the Knights of Columbus. The Meridian Woman's College, which is advertised as a "Safe College for Young Ladies of High Order, Non-Sectarian and Open to All Denominations," issued from its printing-press a leaflet purporting to give the oath sworn by all Catholic priests, and put its advertisement on the back of it. This oath pledges the priest "to hang, burn, boil, flay and strangle, waste and burn alive all Protestants, and spare neither age, sex or condition," with a number of stringent details that would make it rather difficult to execute. Moreover, failure to carry out the whole program consigns the poor priest to eternal perdition.

This oath is a picturesque enlargement of the equally apocryphal "Jesuit oath," which the London courts made costly for some editors not long ago, and may sound ludicrous in New York, but in Mississippi, and rural districts generally where Catholics are thinly settled, it is by no means amusing. It is believed, and this "undenominational" institution used it to increase the number of its students. "A genuine religious atmosphere pervades the place," said the advertisement, and to make sure it was really "genuine" the leaflet had a pendant: "Josiah Strong says Catholicism is one of the great perils of our country."

The Meridian Council of the Knights of Columbus sent a committee to the college demanding retraction and secured from Principal J. W. Beeson a signed card repudiating the leaflet, while admitting that he had knowingly published it, and calling upon all readers to discount its contents. The Knights of Columbus are still investigating this and similar slanders with the intention of bringing the guilty parties to justice.

Calumny and injustice are not uncommon even in places where Catholics are more numerous than in Mississippi, and we commend the action of the Meridian Knights to Catholic societies everywhere.

The resignation of the Maura cabinet and the formation of a Moderate Liberal ministry under the presidency of Señor Moret is looked upon by the Spanish correspondent of the London Times as a concession to foreign opinion and not as a domestic necessity, for the country is tranquil. It is believed that the Moret cabinet will be shortlived, for it represents heterogeneous elements and has not sufficient support in the Cortes.

The Spanish Minister of War, Lieutenant General de Luque, has confirmed the report that the Government will soon bring the Moroccan campaign to a close. He also declared that Ferrer had been proved guilty on evidence, and legally condemned.

THE HUDSON-FULTON LOAN COLLECTION

THE MINOR PAINTERS.

The minor painters of Holland, if one may so style craftsmen who were masters, are the painters of small figure or genre, the landscape and marine painters, and the painters of still life. "One cannot attempt to speak of all. But in the collection, as it is before us, and it is fairly representative of Dutch art in the seventeenth century, Jan Vermeer and Pieter de Hoogh are supreme in figure work, Jacob Ruisdael and Hobbema in landscape. Of the whole group, Pieter de Hoogh has most charm. His interiors are so interesting and so harmonious; there is a rather warm, deep, and subdued tone about them that lends itself admirably to the rendition of "scènes intimes." The rich color, beautiful, soft light, and masterful depth of perspective obtained are remarkable qualities. Furthermore these pictures of domestic and social life in Holland are very valuable in their accuracy and perfect truth; he could better spare those of Steen, who is nevertheless thought so important; but the Dutch mothers and the gracious gentlemen of De Hoogh are as genuinely seventeenth century, and in better taste, than the tavern jesters, drunkards and merry wives of Steen. Steen certainly painted cleverly and with miniature finish, but how restless and fatiguing are his canvases! You turn to De Hoogh and a silence seems to spread around you: these quiet people in their tranquil homes and sunlit courtyards make no noise. You stand at gaze and peace passes out from them to you. The least good of these little scenes is, perhaps, the "Woman and Child in a Courtyard"; it has excellent points but on the whole is somewhat flat and the varnish spoils it. But all the other De Hooghs are gems. The "Woman at the Washtub", with the little child playing beside her and the maid drawing water at the pump, is in a lovely tone of warm browns and reds, with a subdued glow as of evening coming, a stretch of sky away behind the distant spires, and all sorts of exquisite details painted in. These little, old-fashioned, brick courts of Holland have an intimate charm that it is hard to express. In the "Bedroom" (the figures are said to be the painter's own wife and child) a picturesque, antique four-poster with green curtains is in the corner, the woman, busy about her domestic employments moves about in an almost religious silence; objects of familiar household use make the room almost animate; the door opens to admit a small daughter who can scarcely reach the knob and, with her, a flood of soft light streams in athwart the floor. It would be impossible to look upon a lowly home scene with eyes more loving or more poetic. "Cavaliers and Ladies" shows a rather more sumptuous interior. A game of cards is in progress, a page in attendance; fine clothes and feathers are in evidence, a tapestry hangs upon the wall; yet it is the inside of the room, a room clean and comfortable and to be lived in, not mere stage decoration; you almost get the atmosphere of it, mild and a trifle musty from those old hangings, but the gathering of kindred spirits makes you think it must have been pleasant to live in Holland in 1660. In the "Music Party" there are two predominant figures of young women, a stately one in white satin and a secondary one standing in a robe of red that is like a dull flame. It may be that the greatest artistic value is in De Hoogh's "The Visit." It is unusually happy in composition, though composition is one of De Hoogh's best qualities; the figures are grouped simply and easily about a table; the light, falling from a high window, illuminates the entire panel with its gentle, suffused glow and fills the air with almost physical warmth. Two distinct color-notes are struck: one in the woman standing in full light under the window, she wears a long coat of a faded, rich, claret-red; the other in the soft green of curtains around the bed. All the rest melts into a perfect harmony. This picture has more to give than will appear at first glance; and though we are not prepared to say, as some more enthusiastic have done, that it is the finest painting in the exhibition, we do think that it is of a well-nigh inexhaustible richness and will grow ever more wonderful under greater and more careful study. We must not omit the chiaroscuro and aerial perspective, and the perfect illusion of depth, or third dimension.

With Jan Vermeer we pass into another world. His tone is generally quite cold; clear, fresh grays; light that shows white instead of mistily gold, and he has a special understanding and love of the color blue (a cold color in itself) and uses it to effects of great beauty. Vermeer also seems to see the human figure in a manner special to himself; it is less an object for individual interest and to be placed in juxtaposition with others of its kind, than an object to be considered in relation with backgrounds and its own inanimate surroundings. Value will of course mean a great deal to one so sparing of color. His work is profoundly interesting and uncommon. Whether you like it as well, or whether you suffer from this fast and abstinence from warm colors, the man is a true artist in his own field. True in some pictures, such as the "Girl Sleeping", he uses reds in combination with blues; but these canvases are less personal and less representative. Take the "Lady Writing" for an example. She bends over her table, flesh-tones almost colorless, a house-jacket of lemon-yellow (one of Vermeer's favorite notes) and ermine; a blue table-cover pushed back and, though it is admirably painted, you thank your stars for the deep-blue of the frame, without which you would have endured some distress. Vermeer could never be seen to better advantage than in the canvas that hangs as a companion piece to this: the "Girl with the Water Jug," also in a most commendable dark blue frame. The picture is wholly charming. A girl stands with her hand upon a casement-window which she is opening. The light streams in upon her, upon the snowy white of her coiffe, the quaint, long, light-yellow bodice and deep-blue of her kirtle. Upon the table beside her is a handsome basin and ewer, and a blue drapery which reflects upon these. Another blue is in the rods and knobs holding a map upon the wall behind her. The whole thing is clear, cold, distinct; firmly and artistically drawn; perfectly original in design and color scheme; and perfectly harmonious within its own limited scale. It impresses one as something of an experiment—though repeated frequently,—but the handling is consummate, and one gains an insight into the beauties of blue in itself. Gerard Terborch should be mentioned briefly in connection with his vivid and miniature-like "Lady Pouring Wine" and Gabriel Metsu for his "Visit to the Nursery"; both paintings of merit and alluringly descriptive of old Holland.

It is idle to say very much about Jacob Ruisdael; he came of a family of artists and is esteemed the first landscape painter of Holland. To our modern eyes these woods and waterfalls are seen somewhat tamely and represented perhaps too studiously; yet the green glades will open occasionally for our pleasure and give us a momentary rest. He paints noble skies, blue and cloud-swept; he paints water admirably, and excels in tree-formation and in foliage reproduction: this he does with a fine, accurate careful brush and infinitesimal small touches. The "Forest Stream" is sober in color, green and browns alternating in the tree-tops, and the rocks and pool with its many reflections are faithfully rendered. One should insist perhaps on Ruisdael's truth to nature in his painting of trees and in the manner of his boughs projecting and forming masses of foliage, a feat where the manner of painting is so minute. The "Cottage Under Trees", and the "Waterfall" are equally fine. Our ancestors thought Ruisdael a portrayer of the melancholy and poetic sadness of nature. Whether this mood is to be found in his canvases we do not know; but, personally, it is a pleasure to turn to Hobbema, whom we will cheerfully grant you, if we must, to be an inferior artist. Here are great spaces of sky with the wind whirling and piling up the clouds as Albert Groll sees them today over the western plains. Here is sunlight, such as it is, straggly perhaps, but no quiet subdued woodland that the wild gust of the North will never shake and the white glare of moon touch. Somehow when you come to Hobbema you feel suddenly alive. Yet his foliage resembles Ruisdael (only too much resembles Ruisdael), for he seems to place himself under restraint when he works away and delicately pecks at the tops of his oaks and beeches. Hobbema lived to the beginning of the eighteenth century, and was consequently the most modern of them all. His "Road in the Wood," the trees clothed in autumn foliage, is one of his best examples here; so is the "Cottage among Trees," (several cottages), again the "Wooded Road." But we have a weakness for his stark wind-mills, and that unforgettable "Avenue at Middelharnis" of the National Gallery, that used to scandalize so many critics by its austere simplicity of space and its child-like composition. Even Ruisdael could be magnificent when he would consent to lay his horizon-line low and straight and plunge his brush fearlessly in cloud.

Aelbert Cuyp stands in a class by himself. He has painted portraits, cattle, landscape, still-life—he used to be noted for his grey horses—but of all these things there was one that he painted best of all, and that was a soft golden light dissolved in mist. Occasionally he has been like Turner. But in most canvases he has the atmosphere of Corot, done in paler translucent ambers where Corot used silvery grey. Cuyp knew the low horizons of his native land, the fog, the sweep of ether, the vast plains. And whatever he painted, remembering the clear warm light that comes with sunrise or with sunset and the losing of outlines in vapory atmosphere, he flooded his skies with a soft, pale outpouring of gold. You can take any one of his landscapes at random. "Milking Time," with the kine at rest in the pasture; the West is set low with spires marking where the city lies, and above, the glory of the evening light plays among clouds edging them with a hue between crocus and rose. In the "Landscape with Cattle," there are hills, unusual in the Dutch country, — bridge, a stream, figures, trees and cows—but except for the red coat of a peasant there is scarcely any color. One sweeping monochrome of light spreads from the left corner of the picture, illuminating the hills, gilding the inside of the bridge arch, warming the river surface, rounding the quarters of the animals and suffusing the entire scene with its soft, aerial quality. The "Maas near Dordrecht" shows a broad river with sailing craft upon it, figures and boats on the near shore, and the city seen dimly on the other bank across the water. The note of red, abhorred of Ruskin, is in the pennant of one of the ships. For the rest, there is the same golden glow rising at the left, intense at its centre, and widening and embracing all. The outlines of sails are lost in it, and the sail becomes of one tone with the light. The wide bosom of the tide reflects the radiance; there is a stillness and mistiness of far effects as though moisture mingled with the sunbeams: Venice has hours like this, and Rome swims in the after glow of her sunsets. But with Cuyp it issues from one point, limpid, clear and brilliant at its birth, and in color like the heart of a tea-rose.

LITERATURE

Darwinism To-Day by VERNON L. KELLOGG. New York: Henry Holt & Co. London: George Bell & Sons.

This book might be called an apology for Darwinism. The author wishes to forestall the evil effects which he sees will be exerted on the minds of Americans, when the adverse criticism of Darwinism that is appearing in Europe and especially in Germany has made its way across the Atlantic. The book may be divided into three parts: the attacks on the theory, the defense of the theory, and an account of the more important of the theories advanced either to supplement or supplant it. There is, besides, a chapter in the beginning on the definitions of and distinction between the terms Darwinism and evolution, and another at the end giving the author's own view of the present standing of Darwinism. The recent activity of biologists, and their modifications of the old theories have made it difficult for those who are not specialists to keep up with the rapid advance of the science. It is for this class of "unspecialized but interested students" of evolution that the book has been prepared. Appendices however, have been added to each chapter, with notes and references for the use of more advanced students.

A very close distinction is drawn between the general theory of evolution and Darwin's explanation of that theory, between doubts as to the soundness of evolution and doubts as to the soundness of Darwinism. Mr. Kellogg assures his readers that the theory of descent is for the world of biology what gravitation is for physics and chemical affinity for chemistry. That all organisms have had a common origin, that the line of ancestry of all species, whether living or extinct, goes back to a first species or to several first species, Mr. Kellogg holds for certain. This, he would have us believe, is a biological fact that no naturalist calls in question to-day. But he readily admits that there is to-day in scientific circles a great deal of doubt as to the validity of Darwinism as an explanation of that fact. It is these doubts that the author has summarized and discussed rather extensively. The book, however, is far from being a mere compilation; there is throughout much original and independent criticism and comment.

The author's final judgment on Darwinism is given in the last chapter. "Darwinism can no longer be regarded as the 'all-sufficient or even most important factor in species-forming,' and hence it is not an adequate explanation of evolution. The theories of Natural and Sexual Selection, it must be admitted, have their limitations. They cannot explain the beginnings of variations, or the beginnings of new species, or of new lines of descent. But this is true not only of Darwinism, but of the alternative theories as well, and of them in a still greater degree. Evolution or the theory of descent cannot be accounted for until the ever appearing variations have been accounted for; the causes, however, of these variations are still unknown. Of what utility, therefore, is natural selection? It is, the author tells us, the arbiter of the course of evolution. It assumes control of modifications, as soon as they begin to be useful. As for the repeated declarations that Natural Selection is "non-existent, a vagary, a form of speech, a negligible influence in descent," Mr. Kellogg regards them as "unconvincing." That the author should have found these reiterated statements of scientists to the effect that Darwinism is dead or dying only "unconvincing," is a striking commentary on the absolute finality with which the theory has been put before the public for so many years; that the author should have found it necessary to write 400 pages in order to save for Darwinism even a vestige of the importance that has long and so uncompromisingly been claimed for it is a remarkable vindication of the position taken by the Church—a vindication that was neither looked for nor desired, but which has come, as it was sure to do, even from unexpected quarters. The book should read a lesson to Catholics on the unerring wisdom of the Church.

Needless to say Mr. Kellogg does not intend this lesson; he does not even wish his book to be read by Catholics. Indeed, he practically excludes them from the circle of his readers. For after summarily rejecting creation as being untenable by scientific men, he adds: "If such a summary disposal of divine creation is too repugnant to my readers to meet with their toleration, then my book and such readers had better part company." We suspect that Catholics, on the whole, will respect his wishes, especially as he finds it impossible not to add a more or less insulting epithet to the word theologian every time he uses it. There is one rather amusing instance of his anti-clerical prejudices; it is as follows: "I have, however, assiduously sought out and perused the original pourings-forth of criticism and vilification, even to the extent of reading some matter written by certain Roman Catholic priests with a considerable amateur interest in natural history and a strong professional interest in anti-Darwinism." (p. 30.) What naive condescension! We wonder if the author refers to Father Gerard and Father Wasmann. Naturally such expressions are not likely to recommend the book to Catholics.

A Certain Rich Man. By WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE. New York: The Macmillan Company.

At a time when questionable themes of life are all the rage in fiction, and novelty of views is taken as literary originality, Mr. White has had the courage and manhood to write a story in which the common moral sense of men—outside of the neurotic studio and the wildly speculative professorial chair—is taken for granted. "A Certain Rich Man" is a conscientious attempt to embody high and pure ideals.

We might find fault with the inadequacy of the motives which Mr. White adduces as sufficiently effective for the many noble things his characters have to their credit. We cannot, however, blame a man for not seeing things which lie beyond his experience. Mr. White has worked with the best of intentions; and in this latest work from his pen, he leaves a most favorable impression of literary ability and essential rectitude of view.

The scene of the story is laid in a small Kansas town, called Sycamore Ridge, which we see growing from an antebellum frontier village into a modern thriving city that is the seat of a university. Three generations with their loves and hatreds pass before us in the pages; but the central figure all through is that of John Barclay, who becomes in the course of time what is called "a captain of industry." He is unscrupulous and selfish and has been drawn with the conventional strokes used nowadays to describe successful financiers. His wickedness, however, is not unrelieved, and he remains human and interesting throughout.

Mr. White's literary manner is not above criticism. He is evidently making a try at that will-o'-the-wisp—the great American novel. The consciousness of his high aim is shouted aloud from every page and chapter. Evidently he made elaborate preparations, and we catch glimpses of his preliminary studies. Frank Norris was one of these. Then we have the soft pedal of Donald Mitchell, and the button-hole confidences of Thackeray, and Dickens's trick of repetition, and even—what a surprise!—Meredith's "Book" in "The Complete Poetical and Philosophical Works of Watts McHurdie." But, in spite of imitation, Mr. White's florid and breezy individuality manages to give a vital unity of style to his novel.

The Life of Our Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, in Meditations, by MAURICE MESCHLER, S.J. Translated from the Fourth Edition by a Benedictine of the Perpetual Adoration. 2 vols. Herder, St. Louis, 1909.

The great credit that Father Meschler enjoys with his own people and the merit of his work have brought this Life of Christ to a fourth edition in Germany. Those of us who know his worth and the value of his spiritual writings welcome its translation into English. It goes without saying that Father Meschler is thoroughly up in all that is sound and sane in the results of biblical criticism. Hence the most learned may use his book with profit. But together with learning he has the precious virtue of humility. He understands the doctrine of the Imitation, that the knowledge of Christ which is eternal life, comes from the humble, prayerful study of the Gospel. Therefore he does not force his learning upon his readers to the detriment of devotion, but treats his subject in an easy familiar style so that the simplest can understand him. For this every devout soul will be grateful, and we earnestly recommend this work to all. Though the work is cast in the form of meditations so that it can be used as a manual for mental prayer, it does not adhere so rigidly to this form as to lose the narrative style. It can therefore be read with great pleasure as a connected history of our Lord's life.

The translator has done her work well. She has evidently put into it severe, conscientious labor, but we are sure that she feels thoroughly compensated for it by its results.

The index is good and it should be called index, not contents. We would recommend the omission in it of the "fs," which ordinary readers do not understand. "Mt.," "Mk.," "Lk." and "Jn." are not the usual abbreviations for the names of the Evangelists. By an oversight, Jacobsbrunnen has been left on the maps of Our Lord's journeys. This should be changed in the next edition. So should the paper, as the volumes are extremely heavy.

to nature in his painting of trees and in the manner of his boughs projecting and forming masses of foliage, a feat where the manner of painting is so minute. The "Cottage Under Trees", and the "Waterfall" are equally fine. Our ancestors thought Ruisdael a portrayer of the melancholy and poetic sadness of nature. Whether this mood is to be found in his canvases we do not know; but, personally, it is a pleasure to turn to Hobbema, whom we will cheerfully grant you, if we must, to be an inferior artist. Here are great spaces of sky with the wind whirling and piling up the clouds as Albert Groll sees them today over the western plains. Here is sunlight, such as it is, straggly perhaps, but no quiet subdued woodland that the wild gust of the North will never shake and the white glare of moon touch. Somehow when you come to Hobbema you feel suddenly alive. Yet his foliage resembles Ruisdael (only too much resembles Ruisdael), for he seems to place himself under restraint when he works away and delicately pecks at the tops of his oaks and beeches. Hobbema lived to the beginning of the eighteenth century, and was consequently the most modern of them all. His "Road in the Wood," the trees clothed in autumn foliage, is one of his best examples here; so is the "Cottage among Trees," (several cottages), again the "Wooded Road." But we have a weakness for his stark wind-mills, and that unforgettable "Avenue at Middelharnis" of the National Gallery, that used to scandalize so many critics by its austere simplicity of space and its child-like composition. Even Ruisdael could be magnificent when he would consent to lay his horizon-line low and straight and plunge his brush fearlessly in cloud.

Aelbert Cuyp stands in a class by himself. He has painted portraits, cattle, landscape, still-life—he used to be noted for his grey horses—but of all these things there was one that he painted best of all, and that was a soft golden light dissolved in mist. Occasionally he has been like Turner. But in most canvases he has the atmosphere of Corot, done in paler translucent ambers where Corot used silvery grey. Cuyp knew the low horizons of his native land, the fog, the sweep of ether, the vast plains. And whatever he painted, remembering the clear warm light that comes with sunrise or with sunset and the losing of outlines in vapory atmosphere, he flooded his skies with a soft, pale outpouring of gold. You can take any one of his landscapes at random. "Milking Time," with the kine at rest in the pasture; the West is set low with spires marking where the city lies, and above, the glory of the evening light plays among clouds edging them with a hue between crocus and rose. In the "Landscape with Cattle," there are hills, unusual in the Dutch country, a bridge, a stream, figures, trees and cows—but except for the red coat of a peasant there is scarcely any color. One sweeping monochrome of light spreads from the left corner of the picture, illuminating the hills, gilding the inside of the bridge arch, warming the river surface, rounding the quarters of the animals and suffusing the entire scene with its soft, aerial quality. The "Maas near Dordrecht" shows a broad river with sailing craft upon it, figures and boats on the near shore, and the city seen dimly on the other bank across the water. The note of red, abhorred of Ruskin, is in the pennant of one of the ships. For the rest, there is the same golden glow rising at the left, intense at its centre, and widening and embracing all. The outlines of sails are lost in it, and the sail becomes of one tone with the light. The wide bosom of the tide reflects the radiance; there is a stillness and mistiness of far effects as though moisture mingled with the sunbeams: Venice has hours like this, and Rome swims in the after glow of her sunsets. But with Cuyp it issues from one point, limpid, clear and brilliant at its birth, and in color like the heart of a tea-rose.

LITERATURE

Darwinism To-Day by VERNON L. KELLOGG. New York: Henry Holt & Co. London: George Bell & Sons.

This book might be called an apology for Darwinism. The author wishes to forestall the evil effects which he sees will be exerted on the minds of Americans, when the adverse criticism of Darwinism that is appearing in Europe and especially in Germany has made its way across the Atlantic. The book may be divided into three parts: the attacks on the theory, the defense of the theory, and an account of the more important of the theories advanced either to supplement or supplant it. There is, besides, a chapter in the beginning on the definitions of and distinction between the terms Darwinism and evolution, and another at the end giving the author's own view of the present standing of Darwinism. The recent activity of biologists, and their modifications of the old theories have made it difficult for those who are not specialists to keep up with the rapid advance of the science. Roses and Shamrock, by L. ANN CUNNINGTON. London: Alexander Moring, Ltd., the De La More Press.

This is in its externals a handsome volume, with delightful paper, print and binding—just such a setting as poetry deserves. The title is somewhat misleading, since Ireland has not furnished as much inspiration for the volume as it might lead us to expect. Opening the covers we find a large collection of lyrics, ballads, narrative poems and translations, suggesting varied experience and wide travel on the part of the author. We wish she had been severer in her choice of verses for publication. We have copiousness—and enjoy it after a manner—but the labor limae and a more fastidious standard of selection would have done her muse more credit. We quote what seems to us the freshest lyric in the volume. It borrows the title of Villon's most famous poem:

Where are the myriad plans
That man proposes?
Gone with the last year's snows,
Gone with the roses,
Pink and white petals blown,
Hither and thither;
Fairest of blossoms thrown
Singly to wither.

Where are the nesting birds,
Guests of the wild wood?
Where are the wreaths of joy
Crowning our childhood?
Driven afar from us
Hither and thither;
Tossed by the hands of Time
Singly to wither.

Songs and Ballads. Walter and Lilian. By EDMUND BASEL. Farmingdale, L. I.: The Nazareth Trade School.

The little paper-covered volume with the double title encloses a number of lyrics and one narrative in verse. The writer proves that he has a nature sensitive to the beautiful things in sky and field and human heart. But there are numerous signs of youthfulness impetuous for utterance and not yet submissive to self-discipline in artistic expression.

Night Thoughts for the Sick and Desolate, by ROBERT EATON, Priest of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, Birmingham. London: Catholic Truth Society, London; St. Louis: Herder. Price 45 cents.

This little book has been prepared for those upon whom dark days come and especially for such as, in the evening of life, await the call of the Master of the vineyard. Its thoughts are well adapted to their purpose; and those that use them will find them full of consolation.

Reviews and Magazines

Razón y Fe for October has an article from the pen of E. Victoria which is, so to speak, disconcerting. In writing on "Sweet Wine for Altar Use", he tells us, as a result of his investigations in various parts of Spain, that the method of making sweet altar wine gives a product whose use in the Holy Sacrifice is illicit. And yet this method, we are informed, is very generally used in wineries whose proprietors guarantee goods especially for altar use. The points objected to are the introduction of sugar and alcohol and the use of a variety of foreign substances in clarifying the wine.

R. Ruiz Amado, answering those who object to the "excessive number of nuns" in Spain, says that the country has 100,000 men who are free to marry and will not, old bachelors more than forty years of age. As the "conflicting sex" is in the majority, it follows that about 500,000 must remain single, for lack of a life partner. Every young lady, therefore, who enters religion brightens the matrimonial prospects of the half million who are "unattached." But he gives another aspect to the question, one that, though often ignored, has great importance in the economic world and applies equally to both sexes: All who withdraw from the world to religion leave a more open field with better chances for those who remain. By becoming a monk or a friar, a young man waives his opportunity to succeed in public life or medicine or law and facilitates the success of his neighbor who does not follow a call to religion. By entering a convent, a young woman affords her sister a distinct advantage in more readily obtaining and holding a respectable position in the great workshops of feminine activity. Therefore, if religious men and women did absolutely nothing but betake themselves to the cloister and stay there, they would confer a great, positive and lasting benefit on the human family. But where are the religious who do no more? The great missionary enterprises of the Church depend on the religious. The Benedictine monks who civilized and christianized Gaul have their successors today in Asia, Africa and Oceania. Without the nuns, what would become of our asylums and schools? Even the strict contemplatives, who ask nothing of the world, and live very contentedly on their own dowers, have already contributed to the general well-being and continue active members of society by bringing home to us the great lesson that this world is not everything nor is it the highest good. Something more noble, more exalted, has claimed and won their whole being; that something should exert a controlling and guiding influence over every life. It follows, therefore, that vocations to religion are distinctly helpful to society and to the Church.

The London Tablet, October 9, has several noteworthy articles. Father de Zulueta applies the fable of the Wolf and the Lamb in taking the Times to task for its habitually unfair exposition of the religious question in France, and especially for its Paris correspondent's letter of September 29. This has the true wolf tone, complaining of the naughtiness of the lamb in making things unpleasant at the very moment the wolf is mildly going to church to the funeral of the victims of the airship République. Nevertheless, as Father de Zulueta points out, the wolf has made up his mind to devour the lamb. Father Rickaby furnishes a popular exposition of the Catholic doctrine of mental restriction, showing besides that, though he reviles our saner teaching and practice, the truth-loving Briton is on occasion ready for a downright lie, satisfying his conscience with a principle he imagines he holds in horror: "The end justifies the means." It gives the Archbishop of Montreal's pastoral regarding the Eucharistic Congress to be held next year in his episcopal city, a summary of a lecture on London by Father Woodlock of Leeds, and his letter to the Yorkshire Post pledging himself to establish absolutely certain miracles. A remarkable paper read at the Catholic Truth Society Conference by Mr. Leslie A. St. L. Toke is given in full. It is on the Rationalist Propaganda, and contrasts the activity of the Rationalists in spreading their literature with our inactivity in counteracting them. It is useful, of course, to know what our enemies are doing, but our zealous Catholics should not forget that the Church and her foes are to be compared to a man beset by a swarm of bees. "They came about me like bees."—Ps. cxvii, 12. Each individual bee has one objective, to go straight and fix its sting in a certain particular spot. The man is divided in resisting the attacks from all sides.

In the current Fortnightly Review there is an article by Douglas Ainslee, entitled "The Philosopher of Aesthetic; Benedetto Croce." Mr. Ainslee ranges himself with Columbus and Dr. Cook and Mr. Peary as a lucky discoverer, because he has found out, hidden away in the environs of Naples, the man who has solved "the problem of the Aesthetic." The characteristic quality Mr. Ainslee's description of his discovery is its vagueness. This, of course, may be due to the shadowy uncertainty of Croce's philosophy, which seems to be a bewildering mixture of Hegelianism, Kantism and other modern systems spiced with a few idiosyncracies of the author's own. Mr. Ainslee's topsy-turvy manner of presenting his subject is exemplified in the following: 'Croce is opposed to Loisy and Neo-Catholicism, and supports the Encyclical against Modernism. The Catholic religion, with its great stories of myth and morality, which for many centuries was the best thing in the world, is still there for those who are unable to assimilate other food.' The second of these sentences is used to explain the first. Modern thought is sometimes most befuddling.

The Contemporary Review for this month is chiefly devoted to sociological and economic issues. Lord Courtney of Penwith, in "Peace or War", finds two possible, though very remote, causes for war between the United States and Great Britain, namely, pretensions to exclude trade and the status of the Dominion of Canada. He shows incidentally that in demanding the return of Messrs. Mason and Slidell after their seizure by Captain Wilkes of the San Jacinto, Lord Palmerston went against the principles of international law as laid down by Lord Stowell and practised and enforced by the British Government. The news, though late, is gratifying. A thoughtful and judicious paper on the recent troubles in Catalonia demonstrates that Herbert Adams Gibbons rises above the level of newspaper claptrap. At Palamos, a town of eight thousand inhabitants, the Spanish flag had been hauled down and the "patriots" had given themselves up to the delights of debauches and dynamite. Twenty soldiers arrived. Without a shot or bayonet prod, they arrested the ringleaders in their houses, whither they had scurried like scared rabbits and public peace was restored. Anarchism is impotent to withstand the forces of law and order when once exerted. William Scott Palmer's "Life and the Brain" cannot be called a clear and satisfying contribution. He suggests and implies many excellent conclusions, but he writes as one who is not sure of the sympathy of his readers.

"The Berlin Labour Exchange" by Eulenspiegel contains so many helpful directions for conducting a great employment office that it furnishes a tried and approved plan of action for similar ventures in America. The honest idle workman easily loses one of his qualifications, if he is constrained, through ignorance of labor conditions to consort with those who are idle from choice. The writer sets before us in detail a working model of a municipal employment office which, from a humble beginning in 1883, has grown to colossal proportions, to the advantage of both employer and employee, with no small gain to the public peace. No sociologist can afford to overlook the rich suggestiveness of the Berlin Labour Exchange.

The Century for November begins with an article by Brander Matthews in which he elaborates the theme that dramatists have always been more or less determined in their subject matter and style by the condition of the actual theatre in their own times. Richard Watson Gilder brings to a conclusion the record of his friendship with Grover Cleveland. Another series of articles—those on French Cathedrals—is also concluded in this number. The writer, Mrs. Elizabeth Robins Pennell, closes her enthusiastic description of the Amiens Cathedral with the hope that it will "outlive popularity and prosperity, as it has outlived wars and revolutions, heresies and persecutions." Louise Imogen Guiney has a poem entitled, "St. Ives", which is unusually fine. It is as delicate as a flower and tingles with lyric spirit. If we had more such verses, Patmore's "song-sleepy times" would no longer be true.

The Irish Ecclesiastical Record has an excellent scientific article by Dr. Coffey showing that the discovery of transmutable and transmuting elements, has not only verified the theory of the alchemists, but enhanced the argument from design for an All-Wise Ruler, who has drawn the varied phenomena of nature from the latent potentialities of a few beginnings. Father Fullerton continues his able exposure of the shallow fallacies of the so-called scientists who would make mind an evolution from matter. The editor concludes the story of the Lay College at Maynooth, which the bishops established at their own expense and discontinued only when the Government insisted on Protestant Visitors with the view of making it a feeder for Trinity College. On the refusal of the Maynooth authorities to submit to Protestant control, the lay college was suppressed by the Government. The article gives interesting side-lights on the obstacles put in the way of Catholic education in Ireland, and the wisdom and courage by which the Church authorities surmounted them. Other contributions of note are "Some Features of English Catholicism", and a touchingly eloquent picture of Joan of Arc by R. Barry O'Brien, B.L.

The October number of the Archivum Franciscanum Historicum gives us another chapter on Franciscan missionaries in China in the seventeenth century, when the question of the Chinese Rites created such a hubbub. The writer, Father Pérez, O.F.M., gives very copious references.

Father Goyens, O.F.M., prints an annotated copy of the "Speculum Imperfectionis" of Father John Brugman, a celebrated German spiritual director of the Seraphic Order in the fifteenth century, which may well be recommended to religious and especially superiors of today.

EDUCATION

Owing to the Irish National University taking over their buildings, the Jesuit Fathers are about to vacate University College, Stephen's Green, Dublin. They have already acquired a building on Lower Leeson Street and a residence for students in Leeson Park.

The Governing Body of Galway University, including Archbishop Healy and Bishop O'Dea, have appointed Dr. J. P. MacEnri, Professor of the Irish Language and Father McAlinney as Catholic Dean of Residence.

The new boarding college of St. Charles, Grand Coteau, La., of which the foundations had been laid in March, was opened to students October 1. The main section is a four-story building 383 feet in length, equipped with all modern apparatus and with accommodation for 200 resident students. Founded 1838 in the centre of the district settled by the Acadian exiles, Grand Coteau College had been the chief educator of the public men of Louisiana until 1900 when the college buildings were burnt down. Another fire destroyed the hall of residence in 1906. Situated on an elevated plateau in a well-wooded domain of 700 acres, the new college possesses exceptional advantages. The board consists of Rev. Henry Mahring, S.J., rector; Revs. A. Fields, M. A. Grace, J. Chamard and D. P. Lawton. The curriculum includes classical, scientific and preparatory departments.

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, in his address delivered before the Association of Schoolmasters of New York and vicinity, April 24, 1909, and reprinted in the Educational Review, September, 1909, advocates the introduction of the human element into the administration of college admission requirements and into college admission examinations.

After dwelling upon the advantages afforded by the College Entrance Examination Board, Dr. Butler points out that a single test examination is not fair to the students, that not only the individual's scholastic achievement, but his temperament, his home environment, his hopes and plans for future life should be taken into consideration. The new method of admission to college is to combine the examination test with the certificate system.

Regarding the trial of examination, the President of Columbia University utters a statement which some modern educators would probably denounce as an educational heresy. Dr. Butler is not willing to give up the college admission examination "for the reason that one of the most useful exercises that a human being can ever be trained to, is to do what is hard and distasteful for him. In practical life we are called upon to do this sort of thing all the time. . . . This is what adults are doing all the time, and by sixteen years of age it is time that a child had some little taste of it by way of preparation. This experience may be hard on pupils, but it does them good."

It is then proposed to have in Columbia a committee on undergraduate admission, headed by a chairman, who is an officer of professional rank, with no other present duties, who is to come in close touch with the institutions which serve as feeders to Columbia, and become familiar with their educational efficiency. He weighs in connection with the results of the examinations the record of the pupil's former work in the class rooms or laboratory day by day, week by week. In one word, the new method will not, as in many schools and, we believe, at present the New York Regents' examination, consider one written test or an examination, but will reasonably take into account the work of preceding years. We think that this method has been observed in most schools as the one human and reasonable method, and it is gratifying to see that the much-lauded system of the college entrance examination board needs a corrective and supplementary aid.

There is one other remark in Dr. Butler's paper which is significant. He divides college students into two classes: (1) those who are looking forward to a definite purpose, viz., ministry, teaching, law or medicine; and (2) those who go to college primarily for a social purpose. This new type of college student desires to share in the attractive associations of an American college; in athletic sports, and often looks forward to membership in a university club. This new type is not to be excluded from the university according to Dr. Butler's idea. This class of students should be treated like the candidates for the Oxford pass examination. "Let this new type come to college, but say to him distinctly at the outset: 'You must subject yourself to the discipline of proved value which is offered in this particular curriculum.'"

Repeatedly the warning has been given out that students who have no definite object in view, and who come to college only for social purposes to be realized while at college or later, are an undesirable element, and that many disgraceful escapades and scandals among the students are owing to their aimless existence. Besides, the presence of such students, whose number will steadily increase, will have a deleterious effect on the serious scholars. Renowned and strong universities have acted on this sound policy of not attracting this class. But the wisdom of changeable expediency, not of firm principle, is advocated by the head of Columbia when he says: "When the colleges generally recognize this distinction (i. e. of the serious students and those who go to college for the sake of incidental social benefits) and act in accordance with it, they will have adjusted their methods to the changed conditions of the twentieth century, and will silence much of the criticism now raised against them."

Not all just criticism will be silenced; neither, if silenced, will it be silenced on good grounds.

In view of the recent strictures passed upon the ethical and religious teaching in many American colleges and universities it is easy to appreciate the comfort which the notable development in the Catholic schools of the country must bring to parents who still hold to Christian principles.

Opportunity came to the writer quite lately of a trip through the Middle West, and the progress evident in the Catholic colleges throughout that flourishing section affords ample reason of congratulation. First class secondary schools and colleges are found in Detroit, Chicago, Cleveland, Toledo and Cincinnati; universities well equipped for the post-graduate, technical and professional courses already opened and with plans for fuller and broader development, occupy strong strategic positions in Notre Dame, Milwaukee, St. Louis and Omaha. The average enrollment of 1,000 students in each of these institutions attests the good repute already achieved by their faculties; finally at St. Mary's, Kan., and Prairie du Chien, Wis., thoroughly up-to-date boarding colleges are enjoying a prosperous experience.

These institutions stand high in the repute of intellectual training, as proved by the success each has achieved in the inter-collegiate contests in vogue in those parts and better still by the true success of the alumni in after-life. Each gives due attention to the physical development of the student, both in the arrangements of its daily life and in athletic sports;—throughout the Middle West the students of these schools are regarded as models of clean and honorable play and as opponents against whom it is honor to be matched.

Above all there prevails in the life of each a spirit of open manly piety. The Christian life in its daily practice is the normal, regular condition; it is held in honor and enters to shape and mould conduct and character. As a consequence, a strong attachment usually binds the students of these houses of training to their alma mater not only during their college days but throughout life. And through the devoted loyalty of their sons a splendid reputation, which is ever widening, attaches to the colleges and their enrollment is growing year by year.

SCIENCE

The London Times notices the completion of the first section of a network of electric roads through the Pyrenees. It is a little over thirty-four miles in length, and connects Villefranche, altitude 1,407 feet, with Bourg-Madame, altitude 3,750 feet, passing over Col de la Perche at a height of 5,220 feet. The gradients average 6%. A remarkable viaduct crosses the Têt 229 feet above the river's bed. The gorge of the river is 98 feet wide, and is spanned by an ogival arch, which supports one of the piers of the viaduct. This has semicircular arches 65.6 feet in diameter. The whole viaduct is 853 feet in length. Its width at the top is 8.2 feet; but on this is laid a platform of reinforced concrete resting on corbels, to give the necessary width of roadway, 13.8 feet. This plan has worked out most economically. The motor-coaches are fitted with four motors of 50 horse-power, two on each bogie. The central generating station at La Cassagne, about the middle of the line, contains four units, each of which consists of a turbine of about 1,500 horse-power, and a dynamo giving a continuous current of 850 volts, the pressure at which the line is worked. For delivery to five sub-stations along the line the current is stepped up to 20,000 volts. The trains are composite, consisting of a motor-coach and trailers. They accommodate 300 passengers and 80 tons of goods, and are run at a speed of 12.4 miles an hour. This is of special interest in view of the report that the Southern Pacific Company is about to work its lines through the Sierra Nevada by electricity.

Commander Peary has handed over to the National Geographic Society of Washington a detailed statement of his claim that he reached the North Pole and the board of managers appointed as a committee of judgment, Rear Admiral C. M. Chester, U. S. N., retired; O. H. Tittman, Superintendent of the U. S. Board and Geodetic Survey, and Professor H. Gannett, geologist of the U. S. Geological Survey.

It is definitely stated that the only question on which the organization will pass is whether the explorer reached the point farthest north and there will be no mention made nor investigation into his claims of priority of discovery over Dr. F. A. Cook.

In handing over to the Wright trustees a check for $20,000 as part payment of the $30,000 stipulated upon as the price of the Wright aeroplane the U. S. Government has expressed itself satisfied with the instructions these aviators have been offering the officers of the U. S. Signal Corps.

The opening of the Gunnison Tunnel, on the western slope of the Colorado Rockies will reclaim more than 150,000 acres of land in the Uncompahgre Valley. Almost $4,000,000 were expended in the construction of the tunnel, the excavating having been begun in February, 1905. The entire system will be under government control, the redemption of the cost of the project will come out of the land reclaimed.

The staff of the United States Weather Bureau, so recently the subject of severe criticism, seems now to stand fully vindicated. Every stage of progress of the tropical storm that visited Key West a few days ago was heralded with warnings and this from the inception of the storm centre in the Caribbean Sea, west of the island of Jamaica, on October 2, until it passed without the limits of observation ten days later. It is admitted that great loss to life and property was thus averted.

Dr. Simon Flexner, the discoverer of the serum treatment of epidemic cerebrospinal meningitis, offers his official report covering observations of three years. Of the 712 cases treated, 488 cases recovered, a reduction of mortality by considerably more than a half. In view of the fact that the treatment is still in its experimental stage, it is far from unreasonable to hope that the future may offer more favorable figures.

The Vatican Polyglot Press has just issued a work that is of great interest to Americans generally. It is "Notes sur la Médecine et la Botanique des Anciens Mexicains" by A. Gerste, S.J., which consists of a series of papers on old-time Mexican medicine and botany reprinted with notes and additions from the Revue des Questions Scientifiques. The publication is at the expense of the Duke de Loubat who has in recent years spent much money very intelligently in reprinting old manuscripts and articles relating to America. Some of the reproductions of old codices from the Vatican and other libraries executed with absolute fidelity to the original in color and type have given him a deserved reputation as a patron of early American history. The present volume contains many items of information likely to surprise those who think that only in recent times have we come to valuable discoveries and made serious investigations in medicine, or that whatever has been done has been accomplished by European methods and traditions. The old Mexicans had an immense amount of precious knowledge with regard to medicine and Father Gerste reviews this very suggestively.

Many different classes of drugs were used by these herbalists. Doctors possessed secrets which descended from father to son. Father Gerste mentions among other classes of drugs, antidotes, diuretics, febrifuges, depuratives, emetics, emollients and vermifuges. They had an endless number of medicaments for all forms of indispositions, light or grave. They gave their drugs in many different ways as decoctions, infusions, oils, ointments, plasters and certain gums and resins were used as electuaries. They made use of vapor baths and in general varied the treatment very well to suit the individual patient. There are well authenticated traditions that when occasionally European physicians failed to cure European patients in Mexico, the native physicians were successful. Cortes and his men were so successfully treated for illness and wounds that he asked the Spanish Court that no physicians of the old world should be allowed to come to the colony. Some of their remedies anticipate modern advances for they used the seeds of a plant for anaesthesia and a form of liquor for lessening the painfulness of operation. Sahagun, who studied the old Mexican medicine very carefully talks even of antiseptics.

It was not alone in the use of drugs, however, that the old Mexicans were skilled for they had what we must look upon as scientific knowledge of botany. When the Spaniards landed Mexican botany was in advance of that of the old world. Several centuries later the genius Linnaeus enabled him to substitute for long descriptions of plants a concise designation—a generic name and a specific epithet. Several centuries before he introduced this system the old Mexicans had something resembling it and possessed a botanical nomenclature far superior to that of Europe. Their classification was also superior. Besides they have already made some beginnings in geographic botany which is of much more recent origin among Europeans. They had traced the influence of temperature and elevation upon plants and systematized their knowledge in this matter to some extent. In a word, while their botanical knowledge was imperfect it furnishes abundant evidence of excellent observation and descriptive power and makes it very clear that a large amount of work was expended on the subject.

One of the Milwaukee daily papers refers editorially to the cablegram from Rome announcing the discovery by Signor Baroni, the noted astronomer, of an enormous spot on the sun, and his opinion that there was a relationship between this sunspot and the recent magnetic storm. It then calls attention to the fact that this discovery and probable relationship had been announced thirty-six hours earlier by Father McGeary, professor of astronomy at Marquette University.

St. Margaret's Daughters, a charitable organization of Catholic ladies having branches in the various parishes of New Orleans, La., celebrated the twentieth anniversary of its establishment October 17. In its objects and labors it corresponds to the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, and it has received the same privileges from Leo XIII. Besides aiding the sick and poor in hospitals and homes, the Society provides clothing and education for poor children, and holds night classes conducted by its members. Father Biever, S.J., the spiritual director, reported that $27,000 had been expended during the year, and 7,000 visits had been made. His Grace, Archbishop Blenk, imparted to the Society the special benediction of Pius X.

The statistics of Retreats for the working classes in Belgium during the past year have been published. Over 10,000 men and 19,000 women attended the three days' spiritual exercises. There are six Houses of Retreats exclusively for men and fifteen for women, besides many others where occasional retreats are given to various classes of the community.

chinery to the value of £2,000,000 in Germany. This has been brought about by the push of certain German banks that financed the company on condition of getting these orders for their friends. The banks have apparently made a good thing out of it, having taken up the mortgage bonds for their share of the investment, and sold the shares to British investors." This is only one example, says the London Times, of German methods; and as English banks will not undertake this class of business, there is a cry in London for sound industrial banks for this purpose, managed according to German methods.

PERSONAL

Among recent deaths at St. Albans, England, was that of Mme. Emma Le Clair, a convert, who was eighty-two years old and a descendant of the famous John Bunyan, author of the "Pilgrim's Progress."

Sir John Knill, the new Catholic Lord Mayor of London, has been elected President of the Superior Council for England of the St. Vincent de Paul Society in succession to the late Marquis of Ripon. There was another candidate, Mr. P. E. J. Hemelryk, Japanese Consul at Liverpool, who received 87 votes out of the 270 cast. The Lord Mayor has selected Father Shehan, an Irishman, as his chaplain.

Bishop McFaul has purchased a farm of 131 acres near Pennington, N. J., where he will open a sanitarium for consumptives which will be in the care of the Sisters of Charity. The bishop is chairman of the commission appointed by the Governor of New Jersey to fight tuberculosis in that State.

Henry Charles Lea, a well-known Protestant writer on the Spanish Inquisition and other subjects of semi-religious character, died at his residence in Philadelphia on Sunday. Born in Philadelphia in 1825, he entered into business at the age of 17 and for many years was at the head of a large publishing house in his native city. He was a grandson of Mathew Carey, the distinguished Catholic publisher and writer of Philadelphia, who in 1790 published a folio edition of the Bible, the first English Bible in Folio issued from any press in America.

Mr. Lea's writings are chiefly remarkable for their strong anti-Catholic bias. In 1886 he published "Superstition and Force," and a year later his "Sketch of Sacerdotal Celibacy," a reprint of which appeared in London, 1907. The "History of the Inquisition in the Middle Ages," in three volumes, appeared in 1882. Several other volumes dealing with the Spanish Inquisition and the Religious History of the Middle Ages were published more recently. "A History of Auricular Confession and Indulgences in the Latin Church" drew forth a clever rejoinder from the Rev. Patrick H. Casey, S. J., in his "Notes on a History of Auricular Confession," published by Benziger in 1899.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Church militant lost a doughty champion as noted in last week's AMERICA, when Rev. Dr. Edward F. McSweeney answered adsum in the roll call that summoned him to the life beyond. For twenty-six years he taught moral theology and Church history in Mount St. Mary's Seminary, and his spiritual sons by the hundreds, who at his feet learned though widely scattered in distance from each other, are united in spirit at his bier. His was a striking personality. A brilliant Roman student, he early gave promise of a distinguished career in the Church. Nobility of character was stamped on every lineament of his expressive face, and his charm of manner and grace of speech marked him out as one of God's chosen priests, whose name would be written high in the annals of the American Church. But he turned from it all to cloister himself here in the "Old Mountain" Seminary resting at the foot of the Blue Ridge Mountains, where he taught a generation of Levites, the noblest of sciences, and gathered fresh flowers for this Nursery of American Bishops.

"to tread the heights where flamed the Paraclete"

The whole country-side turned out at his funeral today. The services, begun in the modest College Chapel, were honored by the presence of Cardinal Gibbons; and the great Catholic seminaries of the east, Dunwoodie, Overbrook, Woodstock and St. Mary's, were represented by their master theologians and canonists. After a touching eulogy by Rev. Dr. D. J. Flynn, the president of Mount St. Mary's College, the Cardinal performed the final absolution over the body. Then in good old Catholic fashion began the march to the grave. From the Chapel, across the terraces and down the broad avenue, the funeral cortege passes through the lines of the student body drawn up at respectful attention, to the old Emmitsburg turnpike road. The memory travels back to that time forty-six years ago, when Lee's army traversed it on the fateful journey to Gettysburg. As one looks back from a gentle eminence upon this road of pleasant windings, the scene is one to be long remembered. The warmth of an October sun makes the air genial, as the hundred surpliced priests and seminarians lead the funeral cortege; the faculty of the college and the senior class in cap and gown follow, and then the student body, nearly 300 strong. Next come a score of Mother Seton's Sisters from nearby St. Joseph's, whose blue habits and white cornets give color to the picture, and finally the people of the vicinage of all ranks and conditions. A half mile of road is traversed, and then begins the ascent of the lumber trail through the woods to the cemetery on the hillside, the hallowed resting place of sainted mountaineers for more than a century. Here the turning leaves present a spectacle of bewildering beauty. Not yet has summer resigned to give place to November's chill when "The shivering mountains, bare as bankrupt Kings Sit beggared of their purple and their gold."

Flaming crimson, deepest yellow and the green of the emerald are everywhere, and when the hilltop is reached and the eye feasts on the plains below with its trim corn stacks keeping sentinel watch over this land of plenty, it would seem that no fitter time or place could be found for the funeral of one who was gathered like a ripened sheaf in the harvest.

The final services at the grave are over. The notes of the "Benedictus" sung by the priestly choir have died out. Strong men bowed with grief, have turned away with streaming eyes to take up life's burden without him, who lying with his face to the east may await with serenest calm as a sainted priest of God the coming of the Resurrection Morn.

RICHARD M. REILLY.
Emmitsburg, Md., Oct. 22.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

From all that I had known of the staff of the AMERICA newspaper, I hoped for great things from its publication. These hopes have been thoroughly realized, and I wish the paper continued success in its great mission.—P. J. Ryan, Archbishop of Philadelphia.

AMERICA possesses all the required nourishment for those who roam in distant lands. I read it from cover to cover, and, like Oliver Twist, I look for more. It is a fountain of reliable knowledge—a great educator that should be read by every Catholic young man in America.—Leo McCormack, Wrangell, Alaska.

I look forward to every Saturday when I come home and open up AMERICA for an evening's pleasure, to dwell upon the same till the next copy arrives.—James H. Guthrie, Chicago, Ill.

CHRONICLE

The Elections.—Tuesday was the day of municipal elections throughout the Union. The most important political contest was in New York where there were three principal candidates for the Mayoralty. The efforts of the different political parties were directed mainly to gain control of the Board of Estimate. There were few State contests, those of chief interest being fought over constitutional amendments, not over rival candidates. With few exceptions, the principal Fusion candidates were elected in both the city and county. In six States of the Union State tickets were voted for—Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Virginia, which elected Governors, and Nebraska, Pennsylvania and Maryland, which elected minor State officers. Maryland had under consideration the problem of disfranchising the negro, while Alabama proposed an amendment dealing with the liquor question. In Rhode Island three constitutional amendments were to be voted on, two of which give the Governor the veto power and redistrict the State. In Cleveland, Ohio, Mayor Johnson was defeated after his fourth consecutive term. All over Ohio the municipal contests were of exceptional interest as beginning with next year the affairs of each city will cease to be controlled by a municipal board, as at present, and will be in the hands of the Mayor. In California the chief interest attached to the Mayorality election in San Francisco, where three candidates were in the field; Patrick H. McCarthy of the Union Labor Party, is elected, and Francis J. Heney has been defeated for District Attorney. A number of municipal officers broke down the usual party lines, rendering the result doubtful. New Jersey elected eight Senators and an Assembly, Republicans gaining. In Utah the most interesting campaign was in Salt Lake, where the anti-Mormon candidate, Mayor John S. Bransford, was re-elected. Republican Governors were elected in Massachusetts and Rhode Island. Virginia elected a Democrat. Nebraska is Republican. The attempt to disfranchise the negro in Maryland was not successful. The Republicans carried Philadelphia.

The President's Tour.—Saluted by a roar of guns from warships at anchor in mid-stream, by the clanging of bells and the deafening cheers of an army of enthusiasts who lined the banks of the Mississippi, President Taft on Saturday morning landed at New Orleans and made a happy ending of his long trip down the river from St. Louis. This feature of Mr. Taft's tour had been arranged by the advocates of river improvements to build up sentiment in preparation for the deep waterway convention to be held in New Orleans immediately upon the close of the journey down the Mississippi. And it is curious to note the developments following their very elaborate and in some ways spectacular program. The setting of the opening scene just before the departure from St. Louis, was entirely favorable. Immense crowds of Missouri and Illinois citizens had made clear the demand of these states for a practical and practicable channel from the lakes to the gulf, and at luncheon, as guest of the St. Louis Business Men's Association, twenty-nine governors of states, thirty-four United States Senators, and two hundred and seventy-eight members of the House of Representatives sat with the President and listened to the story of the work already accomplished in the waterway propaganda. The impetus desired appears to have been given to the movement. Mr. Taft in no uncertain tone gave expression to his confidence in the ultimate and rapid completion of the big canal. All the way down the river the enthusiasm of the people in regard to the project was evident, and everywhere were heard the pleas for the canal. In Cape Girardeau, in Hickman, Ky., in Memphis, where Mr. Taft was welcomed as an old friend, this city having been in his circuit in the old days of his judgeship, in Helena, in Vicksburg—everywhere the enthusiasm of the people made the journey a history-making one. Only the President appeared to change—he reiterated over and over again his confidence in the ultimate success of the waterway plans, he pledged himself to aid the proposed projects of a bond issue to cover the enormous expense of the undertaking, but as the difficulties of the project grew upon him whilst the fleet steamed down the river, and as the conditions of the actual river traffic came home to him, Mr. Taft injected a new note into his addresses: "There is no use pouring millions into the Mississippi," he said in Helena, "unless conditions make it profitable. Your own business men do not patronize the river. It is not enough to have a river; there must be terminal facilities also. You yourselves must make it worth while." Thus the matter stands at the close of the trip; the friends of the waterway improvement must prove their plan not only feasible but profitable from an economic standpoint as well. Then will Mr. Taft aid them. Meantime the project will encounter opposition in another quarter. Speaker Cannon is not in favor of a bond issue, being rather of the opinion that the work can be done in the contract or piecemeal system thus far followed in the Mississippi improvement. To this President Taft objects vigorously, and if the extended waterway construction be approved he will insist on a bond issue. The contract system, he claims, has already cost the country five hundred millions with no real results.

Lakes-to-Gulf Convention.—The fourth Deep Waterway Convention, held at New Orleans, October 30-November 2, was attended by the President, members of the cabinet and of Congress, governors, senators, army and navy officials and prominent representatives of business interests. The purpose is to induce Congress to support the plan of securing a mean depth of 14 feet from Lake Michigan at Chicago to the Mexican Gulf at New Orleans. Illinois has authorized a $30,000,000 canal from Chicago to the Mississippi, and a $10,000,000 corporation is building barges to operate between St. Louis and New Orleans and from these points to cities on the Ohio and Mississippi. Speaker Cannon has withdrawn his opposition to the larger scheme, and it is thought the New Orleans convention will greatly forward its realization.

Events at Home.—Judge Holt of the United States Circuit Court has decided that the United States Government had been too slow in prosecuting two of the eight men who were indicted last July together with the American Sugar Refining Company on a charge of violating the criminal clause of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law by engaging in a conspiracy to restrain trade and commerce.—The State of Texas won another victory over the Standard Oil Company on October 26, when it secured judgment against some of its subsidiary concerns. The suit was for penalties aggregating $75,000,000 and the compromise judgment was for $200,000. It was against the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, the Union Tank Line, the Navarro Refining Company, and the Security Oil Company. The two last companies must not only pay their share of the penalties, but their charters have been forfeited and they must quit the State.—Under the new State Insurance law passed last spring, the Union Life Insurance Company of New York has been put out of business and its policies transferred without cost to the Metropolitan Life Insurance of New York. Investigation showed that more than one-fourth of the premiums paid by policyholders went to pay the salaries of the president, the vice-president, the treasurer, and the medical director of the company.—From New London, Conn., it is reported that the Scott Shipbuilding and Engineering Company of Edinburgh, Scotland, is making arrangements to meet the requirements of the new tariff on private yachts built abroad by establishing a shipbuilding plant at Groton, Conn. With American materials and on American soil it will be possible for American yachtsmen to avail themselves of the services of that firm without paying an annual duty of $7 a ton.—The steamship Hestia of the Donaldson Line, which left Glasgow on October 9 bound for St. John, N. B., was wrecked on a shoal near Old Proprietor Ledge, Grand Manan, on October 25. Only six lives are known to have been saved out of the ship's complement of forty men.—As a result of a fire which destroyed the principal business buildings in St. Johnsbury, Vt., nine persons lost their lives, two were probably fatally burned, and two seriously injured.

Corporate Reunion.—On Saturday, October 30th, the Society of the Atonement, Graymoor, near Garrison, N. Y., was received into the Catholic Church, the ceremony taking place in the Chapel of St. Mary of the Angels. The Rt. Rev. Mgr. Joseph H. Conroy, Vicar General of the Diocese of Ogdensburg, acting under the authority of the Archbishop of New York, officiated. He was assisted by the Rev. Paschal Robinson of the Franciscan Monastery at Washington, and the Rev. Patrick H. Drain, pastor of the Church of Our Lady of Loretto, Coldspring, in whose parish Graymoor is situated. Seventeen were received in all, two men and fifteen women, others are to follow their example.

The Society heretofore has been a body of Anglicans, living under the rule of St. Francis. Its founder, Rev. Paul James Francis has been advocating the corporate reunion of the Anglican Church with the Holy See. He is editor of the Lamp, published under the auspices of the Society, with the Rev. Spencer Jones as joint author. The reception of the Society as a body, preserving its name and corporate existence, is an exceptional privilege granted by Rome, as the result of a petition made last August to Pope Pius through the Apostolic Delegate at Washington. The Graymoor community has been under the instruction of the Right Rev. Mgr. C. G. O'Keeffe, of Highland Falls.

Porto Rico.—The new Governor of Porto Rico is Col. George R. Colton, who left New York for San Juan last Saturday to take up at once the important duties of his post. Col. Colton has had official experience in San Domingo and the Philippines and in both places has shown himself an able business man, soldier and diplomat. With the free trade relations which Porto Rico has enjoyed her external trade has increased from $18,000,000 in 1901 to $56,000,000 in 1908.

Mexico.—Early frosts have done damage to the amount of sixteen or more million pesos. The heaviest losses are in Querétaro and Durango, where corn, beans and chile, the main food of the population, are nearly destroyed. In Guanajuato, beans are a total failure, but corn will give half a crop. Thirty thousand tons of corn have been ordered from Argentina to ward off the threatened famine.—In advertising Mr. Kenneth Turner's lurid articles on Mexico, the publishers mentioned Carlo di Fornaro's work on "Diaz, the Czar of Mexico." Señor Rafael Reyes Espindola, of Mexico, brought suit in New York against di Fornaro on a charge of criminal libel before Judge Malone of the Court of General Sessions, the trial lasting two days. After being out a few hours, the jury brought in a verdict of guilty. With a view to invite and promote immigration, the Government has sent Señor José F. Godoy to the United States to study our immigration laws in preparation for further Mexican legislation on the subject.—A freshet in the Usumacinta River in the State of Tabasco destroyed the town of Santa Rosa and inflicted heavy losses upon a dozen other towns or villages situated in the lowlands. The loss in livestock and crops amounts to $5,000,000. Torrential rains in the State, filling all rivers to their capacity, preceded a cloudburst which caused the inundation.

Great Britain.—J. H. Hofmeyr, of Cape Town, died suddenly in London on 17th ult. During the last quarter of the nineteenth century he organized the Dutch of Cape Colony into a political party, founding the newspaper

Ons Land and establishing the Farmers' Association which in 1883 became the Afrikaner Bond. He was leader of the party in Parliament till 1895, making and unmaking ministers at will, though he never took office himself except on one occasion when he held a minor portfolio for six months. During the war, being out of touch with his party, he went abroad, returning at its close. He was loyal to the British Government in the sense that many in the colonies and in India are; he looked upon union with England as necessary during the time his country must use in preparing for independence.—Eleven suffragists, sent to jail at Newcastle for disturbing the peace on the occasion of the visit of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, undertook the hunger strike. Of them, Lady Constance Lytton and Mrs. Brailsford were released after fifty-three hours without having been subjected to forced feeding. The others were kept in prison and, when necessary, fed by force. The discrimination has caused much comment. An application was made before the Lord Chief Justice and Justices Darling and Bucknill for an order requiring the Stipendiary Magistrate at Birmingham to issue summons against the Home Secretary, the governor of the prison and the medical officer in connection with the forcible feeding of suffragists. In discussing it, the Lord Chief Justice characterized the suggestion that the women might have been released as monstrous, since it would have established a precedent for any criminal desirous of escaping punishment. The application was granted as regards the governor and the medical officer so that, as the Lord Chief Justice said, there might be a full enquiry which would be very useful.—In the House of Commons, Mr. Grayson (Socialist) attempted in vain to introduce a discussion of the conduct of the Ministry in not interfering on behalf of Ferrer. The Foreign Secretary said that interference with the domestic affairs of other nations would be intolerable. Commenting on the simultaneous demonstrations made in all parts of the world, The Times is constrained to admit that such agitations are ordered by the secret heads of the Revolution and that Ferrer must have been very close to these.—The election in Bermondsey division occasioned by the death of the member chosen at the last election, resulted in a victory for Unionists and Tariff Reform by a plurality of 987. The united Liberal and Labor majority was reduced from 1759 to 448. On account of the strained political situation this is considered most important as Bermondsey is a working-close to these.—The election in Bermondsey division 1435 votes; the Liberal candidate 3291; and the Unionist 4278. The Education Bills contributed to this result.

India.—Mr. Gokhale, native member of the Viceregal Council, addressed the Students' Brotherhood (native) at Bombay. He said that growing participation in politics would bring them from the sentimental to the responsible stage. Colleges are needed, he said, to train the political sense of students, so that they might engage in politics without participating in agitation. The young men should oppose the propaganda of independence, and raise their character and capacity to the level of Englishmen; otherwise India would have to wait for another generation to give her faithful service. The advanced party is not satisfied with such sentiments from a councillor, and the Hindu Punch press has been confiscated for articles inciting to violence and murder against him. —A large meeting of natives has been held at Madras to protest against the continued ill-treatment of Indians in South Africa. Resolutions urging the Imperial Government to interfere on their behalf were carried, and also a demand for the stoppage of all furnishing of contract-laborers as a protest. A Calcutta Athletic Society has been suppressed as a centre of disaffection. At Patiala fifty-three men have been arrested for sedition; among them were an executive engineer, Department of Public Works, a Treasury officer, the headmaster of the High School and the headmaster of the Police School. The Times of India recommends the suppression of the Ganpati festival at Poonah, which, it says, has become a purely political gathering.

Prince Ito and the East.—The slaying of Prince Ito Hirobuni at Harbin, on October 26, as the result of a "patriotic" Korean plot, has drawn the attention of the world, and especially of the United States, to conditions in Manchuria. Prince Ito was shot down while arranging with M. Kovosoff, the Russian representative, the commercial status of Russia and Japan in Manchuria and Corea, with the view, it is believed, of closing "the open door" to other nations. Prince Ito, who rising from low estate had modernized Japan and planned her victorious wars with China and Russia, was also the directing mind in gathering the fruits of victory. He had turned Japan's "suzerainty" of Corea into practical annexation and so reduced China's power in Manchuria that she disclaims all responsibility for his murder on the ground that the police control of the railway zones, the most important part of that territory, had been denied her. Acting-Secretary Wilson has declared his appreciation of Prince Ito's "fairness to foreign interests," but it is generally understood that the Harbin tragedy will impede the plans of Russia and Japan and make the United States and other powers more alert in guarding their interests in Manchuria and the Eastern seaboard.

Germany.—A bill was recently introduced in the Chamber of Deputies of the Bavarian Landtag urging the foundation of free popular libraries and school libraries in order to check efficiently the spread of trashy literature.—Prince-Regent Luitpold of Bavaria, now in his eighty-ninth year, celebrated this week the seventieth anniversary of his appointment to the honorary colonelship of the Bavarian field-artillery regiment which bears his name.—High tribute of praise was given to the representatives of the American press by Grand Admiral Von Koester on his return to Berlin from New York, where he had commanded the fleet of Germany at the Hudson-Fulton celebration. "The reporters whom I met treated me with delicacy and showed a sense of fair play which I admire and appreciate. Often I mentioned things in confidence and in no instance was that confidence betrayed." The Admiral added that he was still under the spell of the kindness of the treatment he met in New York as representative of the German Government.—Accompanied by a brilliant suite, Emperor William and the Empress were among the auditors at the opening of the American Lecture course in the University of Berlin. President Benjamin Ide Wheeler delivered the introductory address of his lectures in the so-called Roosevelt course, and his subject, "Power of Public Opinion in America," permitted a bright epigrammatic style which frequent applause proved to be keenly interesting to the distinguished circle in attendance. Professor Moore of Harvard, professor of the history of religion, spoke on "Religion." Professor Moore is the exchange lecturer from Harvard.—The question of the new commercial relations between Germany and the United States arising from the changes introduced in the tariff by the Payne-Aldrich bill, is engaging the interest of the German press. A pessimistic feeling appears to prevail because of the dependence of German industries upon a heretofore flourishing American trade. Certain newspapers of standing in the Empire express the fear that the United States will declare for maximum rates in its German import trade unless the authorities agree to the admission of American meats without the prevailing harassing inspection laws. The Government appears to have no such misgiving. Well-informed people, in quite close touch with official life, agree that the Government is determined in this matter to rest upon its claimed impartial handling of all nations alike. Meantime announcement is made that at the end of November the Government will take up the whole question of the new trade relations with the United States in a conference to which representatives of the industrial life of the Empire will be called.

Canada.—The Plenary Council was closed solemnly on the Feast of All Saints.—The steamer, Accommodation, built by John Molson made its first voyage between Montreal and Quebec November 1, 1809. On Monday last, therefore, was celebrated informally by a display of bunting on all ships in the river, the hundredth anniversary of steam navigation on the St. Lawrence. The approach of the closing of the river, made the more formal observance of the day impossible.—The Provincial Parliament of British Columbia has been dissolved in order to allow the people to pass on the Government's policy subsidising the Canadian Northern Railway. This road parallels the Canadian Pacific, which has protested.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Hook-Worm and the War With Spain

The newspapers announced last week that Mr. John D. Rockefeller had given $1,000,000 in order to carry on the fight against the hook-worm disease which has been found to exist so commonly in our Southern States and to be the cause of anemias and various run-down conditions which were formerly attributed to the effects of the climate and of malaria upon the Southern population. The disease is extremely interesting for many reasons, but perhaps for nothing more than the lesson of charity in judgment which it teaches. "To know all is to forgive all," has been well said, and the hook-worm disease illustrates the expression very well. We first began to know something about it in the United States after the occupation of Porto Rico. We found among the population of the island a very large number of people who did not seem to have energy enough to live. They dragged themselves round, there was a peculiar blankness of expression in their faces and a lack of lustre in their eyes, they had scarcely activity enough to eat, and they seemed to be hopelessly lazy. Their condition was thought to be due to the conditions under which they existed, with no opportunity for ambition, no outlook for initiative and no hope except in emigration to some better land for those who had any energy. This was the judgment openly expressed, and Spain was blamed for the utter lack of enterprise which Americans were sure soon to awaken.

It took but a few years for the American medical experts to change this opinion completely. The inhabitants of Porto Rico were found to be suffering in large numbers from a severe anemia due to the presence of a particular parasite in the intestines. This is the so-called hook-worm, usually about half an inch or less in length, which had been found originally in Egypt about the middle of the century, though the description of old writers shows that it probably existed in that country over 3,000 years ago. When the worm was originally discovered it was thought to be exclusively an Egyptian parasite. Later when tunnels through the Alps were attempted this worm was found to be the cause of the peculiar anemia called the tunnel workers' anemia which for a long while had been attributed to the impure air that the workmen had to breathe. Later it was found among the miners and brick workers and other workers in the soil in various parts of Europe, especially Southern Germany and Hungary. Until its discovery in Porto Rico there was no idea that it was on this side of the water at all, but American investigations show that our type of the worm is a little larger and therefore more serious in its effects than the Egyptian and European form.

The supreme surprise in its history was yet to come. Stiles, working in the Southern States, showed that the hook-worm disease existed very commonly among the so-called "poor whites" of the South, and that it was the anemia thus produced which led to their characteristic defects of lack of ambition and absence of energy. Before this time the anemia had been attributed to the effects of malaria, a word which can be and has been used to cover a multitude of conditions quite unrelated to it. The more careful the investigation the more cases of the disease were found until it became very clear that very few of our Southern States were without a great many patients suffering from it. Further investigations showed that our miners in Pennsylvania, like those of Germany, also had the disease, though it was neither serious in character nor widely diffused. In the meantime the same thing had been found by English observers for the miners in Cornwall, in England, and workers in the soil as brick-makers and the like in various parts of the country were found to be sufferers. The disease has spread very much among the miners in Europe in recent years so that there is considerable risk of its spreading also in this country, and Mr. Rockefeller's donation is likely to do very great good and probably will lead to the eradication of the disease in the next ten years.

While the disease has diffused itself so persistently it is not difficult to combat once its presence is recognized. The parasites are rather easily killed by means of very simple antiseptics, and the important thing is to prevent reinfection and secure the prophylaxis of other people. The disease spreads through the digestive tract; that is the eggs of the worms ejected by patients somehow get on to the hands of others, and then being swallowed with food infect a new host. This used to be considered the only mode of infection. Loos, however, described another mode, which is so striking in its details that were it not confirmed by other observers it would seem like a fairy-tale because of the curious migrations of the worm. According to Osler, "Loos showed that the embryo worms readily enter the skin and are carried by the veins to the right side of the heart and to the lungs. Escaping from the pulmonary vessels into the air spaces, they pass up the bronchi and trachea to the pharynx and so down the gullet to the stomach and intestines. These remarkable observations of Loos have been confirmed by Schaudinn. Bentley, Allen J. Smith, and others have suggested that the 'ground itch' of the tropics, a peculiar form of dermatitis, may be due to the penetration of the skin by the ankylostoma embryos, and Boycott and Haldane think that the skin eruption known as the 'bunches' in the Cornish miners may be associated with the entrance of the worms."

It will not be difficult to secure prophylaxis by teaching habits of cleanliness and by securing careful washing of the hands of workers and of the feet of those who go barefooted. This latter has been the favorite method of entrance for the parasite among the children of the poor whites at the South. It would seem, then, that the Spanish-American war is destined to confer on us two quite unexpected benefits. One was the working out compelled by necessity on the part of our medical experts of the way to prevent the spread of yellow-fever, and the other the present discovery with regard to the cause of tropical laziness and its prevention, which will surely result from the treatment and prevention of the hook-worm disease. Things work out very differently from human anticipations. This is the last sort of benefits that one would expect to be derived from war, but here we are in the midst of them. Providence is still with us, bringing good out of evil; God's in His world and all's well.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D.

The Protest of the French Bishops

The pastoral letter addressed by the archbishops and bishops of France to the Catholics of the country touches on the vital question of education. It is a measured, temperate, carefully worded, clearly expressed document that puts before those for whom it is written their rights and their duty in the matter on hand.

It reminds them that they have the right to insist upon their children receiving a Christian education, in harmony with the religious belief that they themselves profess. Their children do not belong to the State and the teachers appointed to instruct them are merely their parents' representatives and delegates, obliged therefore to respect their views.

The bishops then proceed to distinguish between the two kinds of schools that now exist in France: the free or Christian schools and those that belong to the Government and are called Neutral. In a few trenchant words, they define the one and the other: the Christian school, where religious teaching has its place and is directed by men and women whose lives are in keeping with their principles. These schools have been founded and are kept up at a cost of immense sacrifices on the part of the Catholics; in point of justice they ought to be supported by the Government of a country that is in fact a Catholic country, but they are, as we know, entirely dependent upon private charity. The Government, or neutral schools, are those whence all religious teaching is banished; in reality neutrality does not exist and the Government schools are hot beds of atheism and irreligion. The duty of Christian parents is clear; they are forbidden to send their children to these schools, except in places where no other schools exist; but, in this case, they must carefully watch the teaching that is given to their children and provide them with the means of acquiring elsewhere the Christian education that they do not receive at school. Their duty in this respect obliges them, says the document issued by the hierarchy, "under pain of sin," and those who fail to observe it "are thereby unworthy to approach the Sacraments of the Church."

The bishops then proceed to denounce a certain class of books, where history is tampered with to suit the anti-clerical spirit of the men in power and they give a list of fourteen books, treating chiefly of the history of France and of "civic morality," which are distinctly condemned by them as "full of pernicious errors. These works either deny or present as uncertain the essential truths of religion; the existence of God, immortality of the soul, future life, original sin, and they deny all that belongs to the supernatural world."

When we remember that these books are in every day use in the Government schools throughout France, we are able to realize the deadly work that is being carried on among the rising generation of French children! The free schools, being entirely supported by private contributions, are comparatively few and it is in the Government schools that thousands of ignorant souls are trained to Atheism and its attendant evils.

The bishops fully realize the difficulty of the duty that they demand from the Christian parents, to whom their solemn words are addressed and in circumstances so grave, where earthly interests are at every turn in conflict with the duty demanded by God, they remind their readers of the words of the Apostle: "It is better to obey God rather than men." To many French fathers, those who are employed by the Government, for instance, obedience to the Church in this matter, generally means the loss of their places and consequently of the daily bread of their families. The victims of the Atheistical French Government at the present moment are not only those whose sufferings are visible: the religious, for example, who are robbed and sent adrift; they are also the poor and obscure fonctionnaire, whose conscience draws him in one direction, while the crude necessities of life drag him in another, whose religious practice is a matter of endless, petty vexations and of a haunting fear of beggary.

At the end of their letter, the bishops remind their readers of the words of Jeanne d'Arc, who, in the course of this year, 1909, is ever before the minds of her countrymen: "The men of war will fight and God will give victory"—words that teach a double lesson of strenuous personal effort and total reliance upon God's providence.

A useful and practical step, long wanted by those whose experiences bring them into touch with the young, has been taken by certain French bishops. They have concluded that the Catechisms in use in different dioceses are, in many cases, not suitable for present necessities. Mgr. Delamaire, of Cambrai, has added to the diocesan Catechism a set of questions and answers that meet the difficulties that now encompass the Catholics of France. Mgr. Latty, Archbishop of Avignon, has entirely revised the Catechism in use in his diocese; he advocates simpler questions and answers. The children of the Government schools, who come to Catechism, have little time to spare and yet no children in the world need a strong, clear religious teaching, so much as they do.

The letter of the French bishops has already, it would seem, produced some effect. Its object was to enlighten French parents as to their rights, which they often ignore, and to nerve them to the fulfilment of their parental duty. In the village of Fenouilles, in Vendée, there is but one school and it belongs to the Government. The fathers of the pupils objected to the use of two books, both of which are on the list prohibited by the bishops. The schoolmaster promised to put one aside but declared that he would continue to use the other, whereupon the good peasants forbade their children to answer the schoolmaster when he put questions to them out of the prohibited volume. The children obeyed, declined to answer and were expelled from school, for three days, by the wrathful teachers, but the mayor of the village warmly congratulated them on their firmness; his own son being among the rebels. The peasants are decided not to give in and their children, upheld by this warm approbation, are only too ready to obey.

This is but a small feature of a great conflict, but if, among different surroundings, the French Catholics would imitate the dogged obstinacy of these Vendean peasants, there might be a fair chance of the Government being worsted in the fight. Unfortunately, the French temperament is impulsive rather than tenacious, it is more capable of a generous, but passing effort, than of a long course of patient, silent, obstinate resistance.

AN ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

The Latest "Escaped Nun" Story

Miss Madge Moul, once Dame Maurus, of the Benedictine Convent of East Bergholt in Essex, England, has published the story of her life in a shilling volume, under the title of "The Escaped Nun." The book is selling freely. One sees piles of it on the English railway book-stalls. But those who buy such literature must be disappointed with their purchase. It is a dull story of a discontented woman's worries, and after reading it one realizes that, but for the irregular way in which she quite needlessly left the convent without seeking release from her vows, her departure would have come as a relief for the ladies with whom she had lived. There is not even a hint of the kind of scandals in which the evil minded enemies of convents take a base delight—the kind of thing most of the eager buyers of the book would look for. For a Catholic the last chapter is sad reading. It tells how after quitting her convent, she refused to comply with the easy conditions of release from her vows which her bishop offered her, abandoned her faith, and sold her services to the Protestant Alliance as an anti-Catholic lecturer.

On October 16 the neighborhood of East Bergholt was excited at the news that another nun had escaped from the Benedictine Convent. In the late afternoon she was seen making her way furtively across the fields. On the highroad leading to the village of Stratford St. Mary, she was helped by a chauffeur in the employ of Lord Gorell, who lives in the neighborhood. The chauffeur stated that he was driving his master's motor car along the road when he met the nun, who told him she was afraid of pursuit. He drove with her to the village, stopped at the local grocery, and asked the grocer to hide her in his house, saying he would send a cab for her presently to bring her to his master's house. He did not like taking her there in the car, and he was also anxious to "break the trail" and mislead the pursuit. Later on the cab arrived and the escaped nun was conveyed to Lord Gorell's house.

Of course the escape was the talk of the countryside. The news reached London, and a reporter went down to Essex to obtain further particulars. The kindly grocer of Stratford St. Mary told how the poor nun was so weary that she fainted, and was revived with a glass of brandy, "which she drank eagerly." Then the reporter went to Lord Gorell's house to interview the chauffeur. The young man greeted him "with a curious smile" and then said that he "had better tell him right away" what had really happened.

There was no escaped nun, despite the mass of evidence available to prove the contrary. Lord Gorell's butler, a clean shaved, smooth faced young man, who had often taken part in amateur theatricals, had been reading Miss Moul's book, "The Escaped Nun," and had elaborated a plan for playing a practical joke on his neighbors. He had gone out to a quiet spot in the fields with a bundle containing a black cloak, some linen bands and a veil, and having disguised himself as a nun made his way slowly to the point where the chauffeur was waiting with the car, taking care to be seen on the way by countryfolk returning from their field work. The visit to the grocer's where he got a free drink, and the calling of the cab, were meant to spread the news more widely. When the cab reached the house the chauffeur opened the door, the "escaped nun" entered the house, and once out of the cabman's sight threw off her "habit." It was a "quick change act," for the moment after the butler stepped out and paid and dismissed the cabman.

But for the press investigation there might easily have been a legend of an escaped nun, disappearing at the country house, because she wished to rejoin her friends quietly and shunned publicity. The denial of the East Bergholt nuns that anyone had left the convent would, of course, be treated as a "Popish lie." The villagers, the grocer, the cabman, would all be ready to take oath they had seen and helped the "poor victim" to regain freedom. Happily, a Protestant reporter has pricked the bubble at once.

To his credit be it added that he immediately drove to East Bergholt to see the abbess and tell her of his discovery. "She was inclined," he writes, "to take up an attitude of generous indulgence towards the humorous butler, though she said that naturally she deprecated such practical jokes. 'The departure of Dame Maurus,' she said, 'was of course a great trial to us, but her book caused us even greater pain.' She added that she sincerely hoped that the public would not accept it as a faithful picture of convent life."

Unfortunately the British Protestant public is infinitely gullible, as indeed this exploit of Lord Gorell's "humorous butler" shows. They are so anxious to believe evil that they are ready to swallow any story against a convent. A. H. A.

J. J. Rousseau's Doctrines

In criticism of M. Rodet's book, "Le Contrat Social et les Idées politiques de Jean-Jacques Rousseau," the Revue des Deux Mondes for September 15 has an able article by Emile Faguet, of the French Academy, on Rousseau's political views. As to general sociology, Rousseau is opposed to progress, civilization and statesmanship. He imagines that man is born good and free, and that society has depraved and enslaved him. There is here, as in every error, a grain of truth. While progress and civilization save trouble and fatigue by introducing machinery, it is nevertheless true that, with the complexity of machinery come unrest and shattered nerves. This dominant idea takes practical shape in Rousseau's advocacy of the simple life, his mistrust of everything artificial, his aversion from the theatre, from large cities and populous States, his federalist system intended to secure to the provinces of a great country the political, intellectual and moral advantages enjoyed by small States.

Rousseau in his "Contrat Social" is the most radical of democrats. He lays down as his first principle the absolute supremacy of the "general will," and by this expression he means the will of all the people, setting aside the will of any constituted body, association or league, because all these are social factors tending to aristocracy. As M. Faguet observes, this demonstration is merely a reversal of absolute monarchy, the divine right upside down. The theory of the "divine right" is that the King, holding his power from God, does not need to give any reason to justify his acts. This theory, M. Rodet correctly remarks, is not the time-honored doctrine of the Church. St. Thomas Aquinas taught that power in itself comes from God, but that concrete power, as it exists in any particular country, comes from the people. Bellarmine said that the power is of Divine right, but that this Divine right, not having bestowed this power on any individual, has bestowed it on all. Suarez held that power comes mediately from God but immediately from the people. Bossuet, standing apart from all great Catholic theologians, proclaimed that the king has to render account to God alone for his acts and holds not a power but the power, unlimited in its essence and exercise, against which there is no recourse or appeal except to God. Now it is precisely this doctrine, so aptly styled by Ed. Laboulaye "sanctified servitude," that Protestants adopted, merely applying it to the people. Jurieu, the famous French Protestant controversialist of the seventeenth century, more than a hundred years before Rousseau, had said with astounding outspokenness: "The people is the only sovereign that needs no reason to validate its acts"; and Rousseau in his turn proclaims: "The people is the only sovereign; the people cannot err; the general will is always right." Thus Jean Jacques, following in the footsteps of Jurieu and others, simply strips kings of the Divine right and clothes the people with it. How comes it, then, that Rousseau himself once wrote to d'Ivernois: "You may have noticed that in the 'Contrat Social' I have never approved of democratic government"? To this objection M. Faguet gives first a general reply, viz., that Rousseau often contradicts himself; but his special reply, which follows, is more interesting. The only pure democracy known in his time was that of Athens, where sovereignty and government were one, where the people not only made the laws but also administered them. Now Rousseau drew a sharp line of demarcation between sovereignty and government. For him the sovereign was the people, the government was the magistrates named by the people, and he believes that the fusion of the two would lead to confusion between right and fact and ultimately to the rule of might. So he bestows unlimited legislative power upon the people and executive and administrative power upon magistrates named by the people. This is what we understand by democracy, and so from our point of view Rousseau is a thorough democrat; but from his own Athenian point of view he leans toward aristocracy, since he is opposed to direct government by the people.

Socialism clear and definite, in spite of certain seeming contradictions, is taught by Rousseau. For, although in "Emile" he inculcates respect for property, yet he really considers ownership merely an acquired and conventional right. As a partisan of national sovereignty, he recognizes no individual rights, not more the individual right of ownership than the right to personal liberty; and he holds that the sovereign people may confiscate, for the public good, any property on the one condition—in order that the act may not be tyrannical—that all private property be confiscated.

The theocracy of Rousseau is well known and may be summed up in a few lines. Apart from all religions properly so-called, which shall all be tolerated, except Catholicism because it is intolerant and says, "out of the Church no salvation," there must be a civil, national religion, a religion which each one, as a citizen, must believe in. This religion comprises belief in God, in the immortality of the soul and in the rewards and penalties of the next life, and devotion to the social contract which unites and obliges all citizens. Nothing more. He who refuses to profess this religion shall be exiled, since he is not a citizen. He who, having undertaken to profess this religion, lives as if he did not profess it, shall be put to death.

"If," writes M. Faguet, "I am told that a State religion which forces citizens, as citizens, to profess it, which afterwards examines into the conduct of citizens to find out if they do practise it, as Calvin did in Geneva, and which threatens with death those who do not live up to its tenets, can succeed only in forming abominably terrorized hypocrites, Rousseau would probably answer: 'As a religious man and moralist, I deplore this from the bottom of my heart; but it is not as a religious man and a moralist that I institute a civil religion, but as a citizen and a legislator; now from the the civil and civic viewpoint, what matters is not the inward conviction but the practice; what I want is, on the one hand, men who put in practice social morality and, on the other, men who at least do not offend social morality, nor give example of the contrary; virtuous sowers of the good seed and inoffensive bad men, this is my city; my chancellor, whose name, if I mistake not, is M. de Robespierre, will tell you the rest.' Perhaps I am attributing to Rousseau a sophism; it would not be his first. Let all this be said not by way of approval but of explanation. One must understand the soul of a fanatic in order not to become like him." And the critic says ironically: "We may make merry over this enemy of Catholic intolerance who puts into the religion which he founds the tolerant spirit we have just seen."

M. Faguet concludes by a problem which M. Rodet has barely glanced at. "How comes it that Rousseau, with his omnious start in general sociology, winds up in the 'Contrat Social,' and not in anarchism, or, at the very least, in ultra-libertarianism? How comes it that in the 'Contrat Social' he draws a conclusion which is the exact contrary of what all his other works had foreshadowed and even already proclaimed? Man is good, society has depraved him; man is free, society has enslaved him. Conclusion: no more society.—No, says Rousseau; Conclusion: society omnipotent; the individual, nothing; everything for society and nothing for the individual. Anent which I say that I do not understand." And yet M. Faguet ventures very modestly on a tentative solution of this problem which has exercised the ingenuity of many writers. First, let us state facts. In 1750 Rousseau writes his "Descours sur les Lettres et les Arts," in which he maintains that civilization has corrupted mankind. In 1754 he wrote the first draught of the "Contrat Social," which was never printed and is well-known as the Geneva MS. In this sketch he denies the golden age which he had formerly proclaimed and loudly praised as he supposed it to have existed before the invention of arts. In 1755 he published the "Discours sur l'inégalité," in which he reaffirms his theories of 1750 on the baneful influence of civilization. In 1758 his "Lettre à d'Alembert" contains partial and special applications of the same theories. His "Nouvelle Héloïse," published in 1762, by its vivid contrast between Parisian and country life, emphasizes the same general ideas. Finally, that very year, 1762, he takes up again the "Contrat Social," but, perceiving that his rough draught of this work, written twelve years before, contains ideas diametrically opposed to those of all his other works, he simply suppresses these ideas, so as not to be too evidently self-contradictory. The only vestige that remains of these ideas is the first line of the "Contrat Social" as it now stands in print: "Man was born free, and everywhere he is in chains."

Now this contradiction M. Faguet explains in a few sentences which are here condensed. There are two Rousseaus: the one who gives us his own thoughts in the two "Discours," the "Emile," and the "Nouvelle Héloïse," who ought logically to wind up in radical libertarianism, or even in anarchism, if he listened to himself; and the other, who sits down to map out for mankind the general lines of an ideal constitution, and who suddenly becomes a man of order, mistrusts his dream or the consequences of his dream, seeks order in constraint, as all legislators do, and places, as so many others had done before, the constraining force in the hands of the people instead of placing it in the hands of a prince, and is not less constraining and coercive, if indeed he is not more so, than all other legislators except Montesquieu, who was then in all the freshness of his glory, and whom Rousseau, ever a doughty polemist, is determined to contradict and outrival.

Missions and Missionaries in California*

This is not merely an account of missionary labors, as the title would seem to indicate; it is a history of Lower California, the most adequate and accurate that has yet been published. Bryan Clinch had gone over the same ground in his first volume of "California and its Missions," and presented the main outlines in a picturesque and popular form, but he did not profess to be exhaustive or to have consulted original sources. The H. H. Bancroft compilations, though containing an immense amount of valuable material, are rendered ineffective by their bulk and bigotry. Father W. H. Gleason's work is not concerned with the secular history of the missions, and the religious character of the missionaries is beyond the comprehension of Tuthill and Hittell. The operations of Church and State are so inextricably intermingled in Lower California's development that their separate treatment is bound to be inadequate; but as the actual results achieved were mainly the work of the missionaries, the writer who would do justice to the subject must not only have mastered the documentary evidence, but be capable of appreciating the missionaries' motives and viewpoint. For this task Father Engelhardt is exceptionally qualified. The Order to which he belongs had a considerable part in the making of his story, and much of it is told in their annals. His books on the *Missions and Missionaries of California. Vol. I. By Rev. Zephyrin Engelhardt, O.F.M. San Francisco: J. H. Barry Co.

Franciscan missions of Arizona and Upper California had brought him in touch with the Spanish and Mexican State papers, and familiarized him with the entire literature of the subject. All this he has sifted skilfully and conscientiously with the historical temper indicated by the motto of his illustrious brother, Father Palou: "The simple truth is the soul of history."

From the days of Cortez, who discovered California in 1533 but failed in his attempts to colonize it, every effort to effect permanent settlements was unsuccessful for 150 years, due largely to the harshness and evil habits of those who conducted them. The success of three Jesuits, notably of Father Kühn or Kino, who accompanied Otondo's expedition of 1683 and succeeded with the Indians by peaceful persuasion where sterner methods had failed, impelled the government to offer the control of the missions to the Jesuit Order, with an annual grant of $60,000. This offer was refused, but in 1697 the Order undertook the work with funds received as voluntary contributions from the faithful, and Father Salvatierra established the Mission of Loreto.

How the Pious Fund grew and the mission settlements multiplied, and how with marvelous skill and unwearying patience the fathers succeeded in raising the lowest type of Indians to virtuous and thrifty habits and exemplary Christian conduct, and how, after seventy years of heroic self-sacrifice and indefatigable toil, a royal decree, without charge or reason proffered, tore the shepherds from their flocks, confiscated the foundations they had established with moneys they themselves had raised, sealed their lips with an iron hand and turned them adrift upon the world—this is the main story of the rise and fall of the northern Paraguay.

The Franciscans replaced the Jesuits in 1768, but scarcely had Fathers Serra and Palou and their companions become settled in their work when, in 1773, they were transferred by government order to Upper California, and the Dominicans assumed charge of the missions. Through secular interference and other causes the new missionaries were not as successful as their predecessors. Though nominally continued till 1855, their work was practically ended when, in 1825, the Mexican Government entrusted the temporalities to lay commissioners, the first step in the secularization of the Pious Fund, which was formally confiscated in 1833. The same act that robbed the Indians of property and protection enfranchised them on paper, with the result that the majority starved and died and the remnants reverted to barbarism.

This robbery brought retribution, though too late to benefit the Indians. At the instance of the United States Government and the Archbishop of San Francisco, the Hague Tribunal of Arbitration, in 1902, compelled the Mexican Republic to pay to the United States, on February 2 of each year, perpetually, $43,050.90 Mexican, or six per cent. on one-half of the Pious Fund Property. This goes to the Catholic authorities of Upper California.

The other half belongs to the Catholic Church of Lower California, but as this territory belongs to Mexico, which had been adding robbery to robbery in the interim, there is no present prospect of restitution.

One of the many services rendered by our author is his exposure of the methods and animus of the histories of the Pacific States, Mexico and Central America, by H. H. Bancroft. This writer is in no way related, by blood or bent, to George Bancroft, whose "History of the United States," in its first edition, has done some justice to Catholics. Hubert Howe Bancroft wrote only four of the thirty-nine octavo volumes that bear his name; he was a managing editor of a corps of hired craftsmen who were all sceptics like himself. Hence, when describing the missionaries and their motives, "they talk like a blind man about colors, and do not hesitate to distort facts so as to make their work popular."

Father Engelhardt does not distort facts. His work is a history, not an apology nor a panegyric, and yet a story of dramatic interest. He has sifted the vast mass of documents with an eye to historical perspective, and set forth the shortcomings as well as the merits of secular and religious, Indian and Spaniard. His account of the fettering control and nagging interference in religious matters of a government whose "sole desire was to save the souls of the natives" will explain religious decline in more places than Lower California. Levity in Literature

Levity is the absence of gravity. If gravity be due, levity is a vice which discounts it. With a novelist or a story-teller it may not be due, and any degree of lightness is gravity sufficient. We do not quarrel with a feather for floating; but a gold coin should not swim like gilded paper.

By way of mere illustration we shall bring forward an example of literary levity, rather harmless in its nature, and therefore pleasant. The good humor in which the pleasantry may leave us will yield a semblance of fortitude in bearing up with other instances more harmful and less pleasant.

This year, on occasion of Joan of Arc's beatification in St. Peter's basilica there was distributed according to custom a biography of the new Saint. His Holiness, the Pontifical Court, and later on, at more local celebrations, all who took a personal part in honoring the heroine, were gratified with a copy of the biography, specially prepared for the auspicious event. The book was done in Italian by a native, Costaggini; but he expressly says, what he shows in the course of the book, that the Life is but a compendium of the larger work, an illustrated history of Joan of Arc composed in French by Mgr. Debout of Arras. We doubt not but this popular compendium has already been translated into other languages, has been read with interest, and not without profit. Yet, under a literary aspect, it is rather a curiosity. What we are going to remark may be verified by any one for himself.

In the first half of the book, while the Maid of Orleans is on her upward flight of glory, routing with a banner "the most potent army of Europe," the glories of France and of the French name are as conspicuous as her flag. It is all French versus English. It is not unlike the scene at Versailles, where "Aux gloires de la France" greets you in magnificent lettering as you enter; you pass through the splendid halls with their monstrously-sized battle scenes of French victories, from the earliest acts of prowess in the annals of France to the triumphal march of the Corsican's military genius through all the fields of Europe; and you pass out satisfied. Great are the Gesta Dei per Francos! It is true there is something lacking at Versailles; but there is no suggestion that what is lacking was non-existent. Our author has occasion to show more ingenuity in hanging his pictures; for, unlike the hanging committee of a picture gallery, he is under the dire necessity of exhibiting another series of events. This he does in the second part of the book.

The heroine's career turned at a certain point. The French governor of a town which she was defending had the gates closed in her face, while she was fighting for Compiègne outside of its walls. Frenchmen of the opposite party seized her. They would have sold her to the French King whom she had enfranchized and crowned, if the French King, who owed his crown and kingdom to her, had chosen to offer a ransom for her. In those days, it must be admitted, military glory was subordinate to the pocket; and perhaps our days of pure disinterestedness will know how to condone a local frailty of other times. "Je suis d'Alençon!" cried out a duke in one of the Anglo-French battles, as he saw a heavy mace descending on his head. Great people like him, clothed in great coats of mail from head to foot, with face invisible, were not to be stricken in battle; they were captured, paid for, let loose, to become heroes again, and again to be bought off unhurt, every time a mace was too heavy or a horse's legs too weak. D'Alençon's cry came too late; the mace descended; he lost his life, and the other unwittingly had missed his ransom. Joan of Arc's necessity was not too late for the king to honor. She was held in the market long enough for him to bid. The bid never came. The English made theirs. The Burgundian French sold her for cash to the English.

By an ordinary executive writ which was issued in the name of the English King, but in which the author seems to decry a rescript of the English King, the captive heroine was subjected to the processes of ecclesiastical law; and a French bishop, Cauchon, became the leading character in the long story of judicial procedure. The three suffragans of the province, whose dioceses are named, many abbots, the Chapter of Rouen, many doctors in theology and law were consulted by Cauchon. The answers were "for the greatest part most hostile" to the accused. There is no intimation that any of these were other than French. In one great session of the court, Cauchon was supported by thirty-seven assessors; in another by seventy-seven. If one of them had been English we should have heard of it, and seen him pilloried by the author. The great University of Paris made declarations over and over again in a sense hostile to the Maid; and the population of Paris had celebrated her capture with a Te Deum and festive illuminations. In the City of Rouen the Chapter of Canons had a right on the feast of the Ascension to demand the liberation of a prisoner, and the right could not be denied. There were then, says the author, two prisoners, the glorious Maid and a Barabbas. On the feast of the Ascension, the Chapter of Rouen in solemn form demanded and obtained the liberation of—the Barabbas! And the populace applauded.

Besides all this, there is Gallicanism in its glory. The writer takes note of it in connection with the University of Paris. But he avoids the word "Gallicanism." This was a theological system which supplanted the authority of the Papacy by that of a "universal Church," a "militant Church"—terms which recur frequently in the processes, and show the whole campaign against the Maid to be alive with rampant Gallicanism. To dispel the sinister impressions caused by what the Gallicans were doing, the writer adduces an appeal of Joan to the judgment of the Pope; and forthwith remarks: "Behold the liberatrix of France among the precursors of the dogma of pontifical Infallibility—we had almost said, among its martyrs, for this answer will be her death." What the dogma of Infallibility had to do with an appeal of judgment from a lower to a higher court, he does not explain. That he thought it had any connection we cannot believe; because such an error is characteristically Protestant.

Unlike the picture-hangers at Versailles, the author has been forced to string up these pictures while his heart seems to be aching from the exposure. How does he relieve the pain? In the simplest way possible.

While the reader is looking in vain for the name of the author's country in connection with any of his compatriots, who are the actors in the tragedy, he will find another set of names distributed in that very same connection, over chapters, pages and paragraphs. They are "English," "English Court," "Cardinal of Winchester," "Henry VI" of England, sprinkled like pepper and salt over every thing the Frenchmen are doing. Nor has the author been particular how he shook the cruets. Sometimes he seems to have been within reach of a tempting "English" fact; it was too alluring not to seize, yet too elusive baldly to assert. He has taken refuge in a "perhaps," or "it must have been so." The conquered English King and the conquering heroine "must have found themselves face to face," because she was imprisoned in the castle of Rouen; and the Earl of Warwick assaulted her in prison, or "perhaps did so by others."

CORRESPONDENCE

The Ferrer Disturbances

LONDON, OCTOBER 19, 1909.

The cables will have already told you the story of Sunday's riot in London. I shall give you only some impressions of a close spectator and incidentally correct some current misrepresentations and exaggerations. The meeting in Trafalgar Square was called by the militant Socialist groups and would have been insignificant had not a large number of Liberals and a considerable body of anti-Catholic bigots rallied to it. The Spanish embassy is in Grosvenor Gardens, near Victoria Railway Station and the Catholic Cathedral and at the back of Buckingham Palace. In view of possible trouble the embassy was guarded by a few policemen, with a strong reserve close by in the walled garden of the Palace. But strange to say, though the no-Popery cry has been freely raised in the Ferrer agitation, the police left an attack on the cathedral out of their calculations and took no steps to protect it.

Most of the London papers stated that Sunday afternoon's meeting in the Square was chiefly composed of the foreign element of London. This is not true. Englishmen mustered strongly, though a great many of them were mere idle spectators of the proceedings. Red flags were grouped round Nelson's monument, and there was a black bordered banner with the inscription "To Hell with the Murderer Alfonso." The first speaker was Mr. James O'Grady, M.P., a member of the Labor party and a Catholic. He evidently spoke under a complete misapprehension of the facts about Ferrer's career, trial and death. I noticed that when the written resolution was handed to him to put to the meeting he hesitated before reading it. But then he read it without any protest or explanation.

The second paragraph of the resolution protested against the Spanish people being left to the mercy of "torturing Jesuits." To-day Mr. O'Grady has addressed to the press a letter "disassociating himself from the reference to the Jesuits." He explains that he had not seen the terms of the resolution till it was handed to him. Yet they were published in many papers hours before the meeting. He goes on to say:

"I am strongly of opinion that a great mistake is being made in diverting these meetings of protest against Señor Ferrer's execution into anti-clerical demonstrations. As a Catholic, educated under the charge of the Jesuit Fathers, I speak as I know, and that is that their work and lives are wholly pure and good."

He goes on to say that he did not stay to the end of the meeting and was deeply pained at hearing that it led to a demonstration at the cathedral, and ends by saying that, while still protesting against the action of the Spanish Government, he would feel that he was "a traitor to the Faith in which he was cradled and brought up" if he did not make his position clear as against the anti-clerical side of the agitation.

But in Sunday's meeting the anti-clerical, no-Popery and Socialist element dominated the whole proceedings, and more than one speaker, notably that hot-headed young man, Mr. Victor Grayson, M.P., used wild language that was an incitement to disorder and murder. When at five o'clock the resolution was put it was not carried without some protests.

The crowd then formed under the Red Flag to march by Whitehall, Westminster and Victoria to the Spanish Embassy. In Whitehall the police charged the centre of the long column, captured many banners and dispersed the rearward portion of it. But some thousands in front pushed on to the embassy, where the police charged the head of the procession and drove it back, gradually dispersing it. Some reports talk of fighting between police and people. This is an exaggeration. There was some hustling; but the police did not even carry staves, and the mounted men never moved their horses faster than a brisk walk.

The demonstration before the cathedral was not a deliberately arranged affair. It was simply the result of some three hundred of the dispersed processionists drifting into the cathedral precincts as the police forced the crowd out of the neighboring thoroughfare of Victoria street. The authorities at the cathedral had been warned of what might happen, and though no police were at hand for some ten minutes after the mob appeared, an improvised guard of a score of Catholics held the main doorway and showed such an attitude of readiness for action that the Socialists contented themselves with howling at a safe distance until the police arrived—horse and foot—and drove them away. The reports of priests being insulted and the Red Flag carried up the cathedral steps are untrue.

The riots have disgusted all reasonable men with the agitation. This afternoon an attempt to raise the Ferrer question in the House of Commons was a complete failure. Forty members are necessary for the raising of an exceptional debate instead of the order of the day. Only eighteen could be mustered.

A French "Volksverein"

LOUVAIN, OCTOBER 15, 1909.

A visitor at the recent Mechlin Congress might have seen, near the entrance, a book-stand, heralded by certain large posters, and two very energetic priests who hustled about everywhere interesting people in that same book-stand, and its contents. For many this was the first time they had heard of the "Action Populaire" of Rheims; it will not be the last, if we know aright those same two priests, and if their names are in a certain little note-book. Only those who know the intense sociological instinct abroad now in Catholic Europe can understand the rise of such movements as this one; yet it must be of interest to all Americans to know what may be the fruits of that interest as it works in the different nations. Recently the readers of AMERICA have learnt of a similar idea carried out in Spain; they will not be less interested to hear of that of France.

In 1903 M. l'Abbé Le Roy, a priest working among the people, thought he saw a gap in the social work of France that needed to be filled. What was it to be? Certainly a place unoccupied up to then; but one like the famous German Volksverein? Yes, and no. It was to be a Volksverein, but not one copied blindly from beyond the Rhine, rather one applied to the needs of France. The German organization is for Catholics well drilled and solid in their faith. Now in France the population is Catholic only in name, rarely in practice; therefore, he argued, it must differ from the Volksverein somewhat. Again, social works are not lacking in France; anyone going over the list will be astonished at the number; might even be tempted to say there are too many. Where is the trouble, then? Might it not be in the lack of intellectual enlightenment, of moral impulse, in the people themselves? Ah, here it is! he said, my work shall be one of education, of popular education. The country has lost the social instinct, this must be re-formed; not the time yet to talk of associations, labor unions, syndicates, etc.; knowledge comes before action, the mind before the will. How get the people to act when they do not know why they should act, nor what to do, nor how? Again, at a recent German congress it was said, very truly: "In France they have forgotten that the road to power is traced with printers' ink." Socialism, one solution of the great social question, gains the people because it understands and sympathizes with their miseries, while good Catholics look on with arms folded, because they do not know the real sufferings of the people, or if they do know, are powerless to do anything because they do not know how. Here is where M. Le Roy would step in. He did it with the foundation of the "Action Populaire." It was to be an educational effort, one of popular social propaganda; it aimed chiefly at association—not to found, but to help the founders, to second initiative, and especially to give rise to it. The means will be the printer's ink; to write and publish tracts, pamphlets, social books of all kinds, spread them over the country, put them into the hands of the leaders in every city, town and village, force these on to the good work of Catholic social and religious reconstruction in France, this is the aim it has before it, a work of popular social education and information. So much for the idea; what has it produced?

The results are startling. The first tract was published January 26, 1903; since then 210 have seen the light. But the sphere of activity has widened enormously; there are now published, besides the tracts appearing every ten days, four annual books of 350 pages or so, two monthly reviews, a technical agricultural library; a series of social biographies; countless post-cards and pamphlets; several books and a monthly series of social documents,—a daily newspaper is hoped for soon,—in all a library of nearly 400 books; 200,000 sold in 1908 alone, 830,000 since the foundation six years ago! The staff has increased to ten, six priests and four lawyers, one of them an ex-newspaper editor; while in all 200 collaborators contribute their writings to the work. As for the moral results, they are not counted up in numbers; but who can doubt of their vastness? Already hundreds of testimonials are pouring in bearing witness to what is being done, while all the bishops of France have highly praised the undertaking.

Now a glance in detail at all these publications. The first thing to do was to make known the social situation and to form the social instinct. Hence a first category of publications, the "yellow tracts," of thirty-two pages, costing five cents. They are of three classes; inquiries made into social conditions, first of all—and we might say here that these show as keen an appreciation of present-day miseries as any Socialist—and a more exalted sympathy. But this is not enough. To avoid the dangers of mere empiricism, a clear and well-founded social doctrine is indispensable; hence a second class of tracts; a third follows the principle that after enlightenment comes action, that the best motive to action is example, and so sums up in concise biographies what the great workers have done and are doing. As a complement to this five large books of 350 pages have been added, addressed to the young men, the young women, the priests, the women, the peasants, of France—compilations showing what each has done in their state of life. At this point it was shown that in all this, many questions demanding less space were left untouched; to cover this need a monthly review, La Revue de l'action populaire, was founded. There also appears a monthly series of brochures setting forth the latest improvements and legislation concerning social interests. Then, to gather, each year, the results of work done in the whole world, under one comprehensive view, an annual, Le Guide Social, was started. It is a compilation, made from 250 French, and 40 foreign reviews; it also has correspondents in England, Germany, Italy, etc. M. Cetty, of Mulhouse, said of it: "Not even the Volksverein has done anything like it." Besides this, more technical, appears a Practical Social Guide, furnishing minutely all the necessary judicial, legal and practical data for the foundation of associations, etc. These books have been called the "secondary education," and are hence addressed to the average intellect. Primary education is also afforded. An almanac—a popular résumé of the best doctrine on the family, labor, trades, etc.—the "social pamphlets," four-page sheets for distribution, summing up the salient points of sociology in a striking popular way, and an ingenious system of "social post cards" accompanied by a short letter-press in explanation, constitute this branch. There remains the intellectual élite, for whose higher education, a review, the Association Catholique, former organ of the Mun group, has been taken over, enlarged, rejuvenated, and renamed the Mouvement Social; while last of all, since at bottom the social needs of France are religious needs, comes a series—"the second shelf in their library," as they call it—of strictly religious publications, though still aiming at organization. This comprises a guide of religious activity, a complete vade-mecum for the man of action in the modern apostolate; three series of brochures, etc., etc. On the other hand, the "Action Populaire" is a source of information as well as of education. For this end, a bureau of information—the "Intermédiaire Social"—answers gratis all questions on any social matter—two committees, one of lawyers, one of theologians, being formed for this purpose. Thus far inquiries from all parts of France, from Austria, Uruguay, Servia, Japan, etc., have come in. The outlay of work for this alone is enormous, and it is out of this section that grew the résumé spoken of above as "Practical Social Guide." But the "Action Populaire" is not merely staying at home—at this moment a group of men are being formed to run all over France giving conferences.

And at this point, as the reader might well be overcome with admiration at this splendid work, I leave him, conscious that the mere recital of it carries its lessons for America. P.

The Breslau Catholic Congress

The Catholic Congress recently held at Breslau was a splendid spectacle from a national, we might almost say universal, point of view; its numerical strength alone would enable it to be considered as such. The Congress lasted four days and attracted the attention of the entire land. Between 7,000 and 8,000 persons were present at each of the public assemblies, and 25,000 workingmen took part in the great procession.

Even antagonists could not fail to recognize the Congress as an important event. The Social Democrats, under the presidency of Colonel Gaedke, held an opposition meeting, the only result of which was to render the moderation of the Catholics more conspicuous, by contrast. In his closing speech the president of the Congress remarked that though the Social Democrats were numerically the stronger party, they would ultimately be obliged to admit, with Julian the Apostate, that Christ had conquered.

No doubt, the anti-Catholic press would like to have ignored the assembly, but the numbers attending it and the weighty matters dealt with forced it to more or less meagre comment, and those who hold that in the twentieth century religion is a worn-out fad, must have been considerably astonished to see it possess such vitality that, in answer to its call, thousands assembled from every part of the empire to discuss and plan concerted action for the further safe-guarding of its interests. Indeed, one of the most striking features of the Congress was the unity of religious thought and conviction evidenced by all taking part of it,—a unity at once admirable, edifying and consoling and such as the Catholic world alone can show.

The subjects chosen for discussion and the manner of their treatment proved intellectual grasp of present needs and conditions on the part of the speakers, while the unflagging attention of the listeners spoke well for their earnestness and keen interest in the matters presented to their consideration. The speeches in general were of a high order; those of Dr. Alois Löwenstein, a lawyer, and of Amtsgerichtsrat de Witt deserving to be ranked as masterpieces of reasoning and eloquence. Herr Löwenstein chose for his subject the "Foreign Missions," and pointed out the obligation resting upon the Church and its members to push forward missionary endeavor in heathen lands, so as to be first in the field and thus prevent Mahometanism, Buddhism or Confucianism taking hold of the millions to whom the name of Christ is unknown.

Dr. Löwenstein also showed that the present time is favorable to missionary undertaking, owing to the protection afforded to missionaries by the great powers and also owing to the accessibility of the most remote countries by means of modern traveling facilities.

Oberlandsgerichtsrat Marx discussed "Denominational Schools" and emphasized the uncompromising attitude of Catholics towards religious education. Amtsgerichtsrat de Witt spoke on the power of "the Press" and the need of capably-conducted newspapers. Herr Kapitza, a Polish priest, delivered a splendid discourse on the "Evils of Alcohol," and how to combat them. Professor Meyer spoke on "Charity," and Herr Mumbauer on "Literature."

Besides the public sessions, others were held at which subjects of a more intimate nature were discussed, such as the Roman question, the spread of Catholic Literature, the Care of Youth, and Upkeep of the Holy Places in Palestine.

The meeting of the Volksverein is also deserving of special mention; its leading representatives were Fabrikbestizer Brandt and Director Dr. Pieper of München-Gladbach. The former read a satisfactory report for the past year, showing that the membership had increased during that period from 610,000 to 625,000, and that the publications issued by the Verein consisted of 4,000,000 leaflets and 530,000 other books and pamphlets.

The Catholic Congress originated in the general meeting of Catholic societies to discuss their interests and to give an account of their progress; at the recent assembly, Catholic teachers, students, merchants, and anti-alcohol societies were well represented, and we do not hesitate to say that the Breslau Congress of 1909 will serve as a standard by which future assemblies of a similar nature will regulate their constitution and course of action. The Assembly Hall at Breslau has been a pulpit from which Catholic ideals have been fearlessly and uncompromisingly announced to the world. C. S.

The Mother of Jeanne d'Arc

PARIS, OCTOBER 20, 1909.

The French bishops end their important letter on the subject of education by a fervent appeal to the new Beata, who it may be truly said is the saint of the year. Festivities in honor of the national heroine are still taking place throughout the country. In out-of-the-way villages these fêtes sometimes assume a homely guise, and the country maiden who personates Jeanne lacks the dignity that made Mlle. de Baillencourt, the heroine of the pageant of Compiègne, a distinguished and picturesque figure. Nevertheless these manifestations are useful; they bring home to the minds of the people, better than any written account, the touching story of the girl whose personality was singularly attractive and whose mission came from God.

One of these local celebrations stands out from the rest as having not merely a religious, but also an historical interest. It took place on the banks of the Loire, not far from Orleans, in the country most closely connected with Jeanne's brilliant military career, and where, through long centuries of comparative neglect and oblivion, her memory had been kept green by the descendants of those whom she delivered four hundred years ago.

In the little village of Sandillon, near Orleans, the heroine's mother, Isabeau Romée, came to live after her daughter's tragic end, and here she is buried in the village church yard. We know that Isabeau was a devout Catholic and that Jeanne owed her excellent training to her parent's care. The subsequent story of Isabeau Romée is, naturally enough, merged in that of her illustrious daughter, and we may imagine the mingled feelings of admiration, pride and fear with which the simple peasant followed from afar the marvelous career of her Jeannette. Then came the tragedy of the end, the cruel imprisonment, bitter agony and hideous death, which cut Isabeau Romée to the heart. In 1440, nine years later, she came to live at Sandillon, near Orleans, in a country where her daughter's name was still gloriously remembered; her son Pierre had been given a farmhouse, called les Bagneaux, by the canons of Ste. Croix at Orleans, and, when his mother came to live under his roof, the grateful city awarded her a small pension. But Isabeau Romée was destined to come once again out of her retirement, and for a brief moment Jeanne d'Arc's mother appeared in public for the sake of her child. In 1451, the legate of the Holy See, Cardinal d'Estouteville, had taken steps to bring about the revision of the Rouen trial and the justification of "the Maid," and Pope Calixtus III three years later named the ecclesiastical tribunal that was to revise the proceedings of the Rouen magistrates. Isabeau Romée's heart must have beat fast when in June, 1455, the Great Inquisitor came to Orleans and took down her testimony regarding the events of her daughter's girlhood; six months later, more was asked of her, and, accompanied by her sons, Pierre and Jean, and by several notable citizens of Orleans, the old woman set out for Paris. Before the ecclesiastical tribunal, assembled at Notre Dame, she again gave her testimony. The day of justice had at last risen for Jeanne and she who had been falsely condemned in the name of the Church was by this same Church gloriously vindicated. Owing to her great age, Isabeau was allowed to return home before the end of the proceedings; but she was present at Orleans when, on July 27, 1856, two of the Paris judges came to proclaim the innocence and sincerity of the betrayed and calumniated heroine! in the previous month of June, the Paris tribunal had reversed the infamous sentence issued at Rouen.

This was Isabeau Romée's last joy on earth; it went far to comfort her for the anguish she had suffered in the past; but perhaps she was happier still when, in November, 1458, she calmly breathed her last and went to join the daughter whose supernatural call and hideous sufferings, both physical and moral, had alternately puzzled, awed and wrenched her mother's simple soul.

A marble slab, commemorating Isabeau's stay at Sandillon, has been erected within the parish church by the Municipal Council of the place, and only a few days ago Mgr. Touchet, the well-known Bishop of Orleans, presided over the fêtes organized on the occasion.

AN ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

The Braddon Clause

MELBOURNE, OCTOBER 1, 1909.

The outcome of the offer of a Dreadnought to the British Government has fully justified the ex-Prime Minister, Mr. Fisher, and his Labor Cabinet. Mr. Fisher steadily refused to offer the battleship and met with unmeasured condemnation from the Jingoistic portion of the press. Mr. Deakin and his "Fusionist" ministry promptly made the offer and committed themselves to provide the sum of two millions to build the warship. What has been the result? First, England has practically refused the Dreadnought and told Australia to provide a local fleet for the defence of her own shores—just the policy which Mr. Fisher upheld and from which he refused to be driven by clamor. And in the second place, the Federal Treasurer of the present Government announced his financial budget a short time since and confessed to a deficit of two million pounds sterling, the price of a dreadnought. Australians, as a whole, are very well satisfied that the navy craze has had no worse result, and that all parties have apparently reached the bed-rock of common sense.

A Conference of the Premiers of the six Australian States assembled in Melbourne last month to consider the important question of finding a substitute for what is known as the Braddon Clause in the Constitution. This clause declares that for at least ten years the Commonwealth shall pay back to the States three-fourths of the revenue derived from Customs and Excise. Thus, last year the States received £7,927,134, and for the current year it is estimated that the sum will be £7,891,481. After protracted negotiations, the following agreement, signed by the Prime Minister and the Premiers of the States, was come to on the 20th of August, and substitutes for the present arrangement the payment by the Commonwealth to the States of a sum "Calculated at the rate of 25 shillings per annum per head of the population."

The Melbourne Age publishes the following items to show that the States sacrifice over £2,500,000.

The following table shows the effect of the new system of distribution and the losses the States may sustain as compared with the present distribution under the Braddon section of the constitution:

State.	Population as on 31st March 1909.	Receipts 1908-1909 under Braddon clause.	Receipts under new 25/ per head system*.	Decrease or Increase as compared with 1908-1909.

*Excluding Western Australian arrangement.

When interviewed after the Conference, the Prime Minister expressed his satisfaction at having come to a definite settlement of the question. An agreement was reached by mutual sacrifices. The Commonwealth was, so to speak, set free and becomes master of its own revenue and expenditure, while the States, instead of not knowing what they are going to get each year, will now be able to calculate accurately the annual sum that is to be handed over to them.

The agreement, of course, meets with criticism; it is impossible to secure unanimity in a question of such importance. We must be content to leave its wisdom or unwisdom to the decision of time.

Leper Settlement, Kalawadi Molokai

HAWAII, OCTOBER 10, 1909.

On September 23d we received a visit from two officers of the U. S. army and ten surgeons of the navy. One representative of the army was the Right Rev. Monsignor E. R. Chase, chaplain of the Fourteenth Cavalry, now at Jolo, Sulu, Philippines, for which station the monsignor will start in a few weeks. He is at present serving with the Fifth Cavalry, at Schofield Barracks, near Honolulu.

The other army man was Dr. C. F. Morse, captain U. S. Medical Corps. These two were for some time seeking means of getting here, when along came a good part of our Pacific fleet under Rear Admiral Uriel Sebree, Commander-in-chief. There are eight high-class cruisers, cutting all sorts of capers, every kind of drill formation, very severe speed tests and giving thorough trial to all new devices for keeping the peace.

The army does the same with everything that does not float, making forced marches, moving field artillery and wagon trains through the mountain passes, attempting everything that is considered impossible. Our army is all right, so is the navy. There is no nonsense, no loafing. In each service the men are of high class, behave well on land or sea, are well set up, wholesome, not so serious as to have no fun at all, but there is a good natured dignity and a good spirit, a thoroughness in getting everything in order, no screws loose.

Honolulu desired another street parade, but the program gave no place for it. Every hour had its duty. There was one diversion only. The ten surgeons were allowed to visit the leper settlement. One of the cruisers bringing them, and our two army friends came along.

The cruiser fleet did come in close, following the example, as I presumed, of the Atlantic fleet.

The President's Tour

One of New York's great dailies has used the epithet "history making" several times in the elaborate descriptions it has furnished its readers of the extended tour President Taft is now making through the West and South. The ordinary reader may find it difficult to appreciate the reasonableness of the term. The story is so full of the lighter touches which suggest nought but a continued succession of pleasurable experience, that one is apt to overlook the singularly beneficent effects of the trip of Mr. Taft now drawing to its close.

The journey begun in mid-September has meant more to the Executive head of our country than a mere gracious acceptance of the welcome that was prepared for him everywhere. It contains far deeper significance than appears from the superficial recounting of banquets and bunting and music and warm-hearted enthusiasm of mighty crowds at every stopping-place along the President's route. They who go under the mere surface description of Mr. Taft's triumphal progress will understand that far from being a mere pleasure jaunt his trip has been a laborious ordeal accepted because of the opportunity it afforded him to know his people, their needs and conditions; as well as to impress upon them valuable lessons that will work into the common welfare of the entire country. Few among us can estimate the valuable results that accrue from the plain, homely addresses the President has come to be such an adept in delivering. Full of a sane, common-sense appreciation of the general interests of the country, admirably suggestive of that respect for authority and for law and order so necessary among us, happily mindful of a conciliatory regard for the diverse conditions prevailing in the various sections of our cosmopolitan people, the off-hand talks and the set speeches that have marked the journeyings of Mr. Taft are evidence of the better intent which induced him to undertake the journey rather than of a mere junketing trip for pleasure's sake. Unquestionably, too, it is well for the ruler of a nation such as ours to come into direct and close touch with the elements that cluster about its vast and important interests. The present trip of Mr. Taft affords an illustration of this. No doubt the enthusiasm of the mighty builders of the Mississippi Valley had aroused his hearty approval of a new waterway project—the lakes to the Gulf canal. Yet before entering into the practical execution of the plans proposed was it not well that the President should see for himself just how far conditions and circumstances justified the demands of those who favored the movement?

Henry C. Lea, Scholar

Right thinking people have always honored the scholar, though it is not easy to make men nowadays understand why. He has not been a man of action, neither has he been a prophet or a seer. His business has never been to contribute directly either to progress or to gaiety; though the man of the present who knows how can draw from his learning much profit for both. He had the right to live apart from the individual because he was close to the race at large, to close his ears to the babble of the day and his eyes to its glamor because his was the inward ear, the inward eye, that are the "bliss of solitude," to hear what is noblest, to see what is brightest of all time.

Scholarship first of all touches the universal life of man. It is not highest in the intellectual order. Philosophy reaching to the farthest causes of things to find them brought together in the divine intellect and will, has a higher throne. Mathematics and natural science, subordinate to philosophy, are beside it. Hence we speak of the philosopher, the mathematician, the physicist or chemist but not of the philosophical scholar, or the mathematical, or the physical, or the chemical. Language inasmuch as it is the medium of mankind's immortal thought, literature, the thought expressed, and history, the record of its activity, are the scholar's peculiar province. He therefore who is versed in these, the humanities, is for all a scholar.

But scholarship implies completeness and exactness of knowledge. A mere surface acquaintance is not enough. It is not sufficient to know about books and the course of man's action: the scholar knows the things themselves. Because this kind of knowledge is going out of fashion in the world, smothered, so to speak, by practical methods, men, retaining the word, and not knowing how rare the reality has always been, bestow the title of scholar with undue profusion, and those who least know the nature of scholarship, newspaper writers, are most liberal in granting certificates of it to such as have found favor in their eyes.

One has just passed away whom wrong thinking men would impose upon the world as a scholar. Few people know more about certain matters in Church History than did the late Henry C. Lea. During a long life he gathered together from every conceivable source every kind of information, trustworthy or untrustworthy, concerning those things that interested him. The results of his labors are a row of large volumes, imposing to the vulgar eye, disappointing to the thoughtful mind. Mr. Lea was not a scholar. The mere gathering of documents, though it may impress the unlearned, could no more make him one than can the collecting of authorities make one a great lawyer. Such work is merely material and among lawyers bears the significant name, devilling. The scholar interprets his documents in the sense of their author: Mr. Lea did not always grasp this sense. The scholar approaches his documents in the spirit of the age in which they were written, to win from them a fuller knowledge of that age: Mr. Lea approaches his as a Protestant of the nineteenth century seeking from the Church itself arms to use against it. He has his theory and a false one at that, and the facts of the past must be accommodated to it. The scholar who approaches historical problems with a false theory, soon changes it or ceases to be a scholar. This was not Mr. Lea's idea, and so no one knew better than he how to hide manipulated facts under the cloak of impartiality. The scholar's attitude is humble. He is always a learner, ready to change or to abandon preconceived ideas if necessary: Mr. Lea was from the beginning a teacher, ready to teach those who knew far better than he the subjects he was investigating, and day by day grew so wedded to his own conceits that it became impossible to separate him from them.

The Presbyterian Religious Movement

The Presbyterians have made up their minds to make their church a force in the world's life. They have a Department of Church and Labor whose success in grappling with the problems of the hour has suggested to the Home Missions Council a plan for similar work that will bring before the churches of all Protestant denominations the vital economic questions of the day. The Home Mission Council represents practically all the Protestant denominations of the country. The Home Mission people announce that they are going to concern themselves with the questions "social, racial, economic, and religious" right at our doors. The idea is to present to churches and people, by means of newspaper, magazine and billboard advertising and the distribution of literature, such topics as the labor question, the immigration problem, the negro problem, the conditions of life in the city, the village and the town. This movement would be worthy of encouragement, if its leaders were men imbued with right ethical standards and sound economic, religious and social principles. But while the members of their own churches claim so frothy an allegiance to the various creeds known as Protestantism, it is hoping against hope to look for any long step on the part of Protestant ministers or preachers toward fellowship with the "unchurched millions" about us. In the light of what the Home Missions Council proposes in order to prepare the material and set the facts before the public, the letter of our Belgian correspondent given in another column of this Review will suggest that Protestants here are alive to the activity in this field of Catholics abroad. The circulation of what might be called campaign literature is an old story with our Catholic brethren in Germany. The results have been remarkable. In France, too, and in Belgium, like methods are being attended with like successes. Catholics in the United States, strong in the unity of their Faith, are called upon to emulate their brethren in countries where hostility to their Church has threatened to overwhelm them and at the same time to make an organized effort to instruct, first of all, the workingmen of their own Church, and if possible, to reach out to the millions who have no church affiliations whatever.

Observing readers will have noticed in the books of Morel and others on the alleged Congo atrocities, how the injury to British trade by the Belgian monopoly continually makes its appearance, and may have been led to suspect that this had much to do with the agitation on behalf of the natives fostered by the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce. They will, therefore, not be very much surprised if, now that the monopoly is to be removed, nothing more be heard of the wrongs of the rubber-gatherers. The New York Sun expresses, it would seem unconsciously, the probable mind of Morel, Doyle and the African merchant, Holt: "The Congo will be opened, whatever becomes of the blacks."

Encore "The Independent"

The Independent, Oct. 21, has a lame reply to Bishop McFaul's rebuke of its undignified attack in the previous issue. It had taken umbrage because the bishop's denunciation of irreligious and immoral teachings in secular universities was vigorously phrased. This organ professes itself opposed to irreligious education also, but when there is question of "our universities," you must speak with bated breath and compose with "The Polite Letter-writer's Manual" at your elbow. The bishop repeats the question put to the president of Columbia University by AMERICA, October 13:

"Why does he not categorically deny that the list of religious negations we have enumerated is taught in American Universities? He cannot."

Why does not the Independent, which "knows that the prevailing influence in our universities is overwhelmingly Christian," secure such authoritative denial? It cannot. It is itself tarred with the same brush. In this very article it declares that "men who see mythical elements in Genesis" and believe that the laws of morals and marriage do not rest on divine command but are merely a social development, "may be devout Christians after all." That kind of devout Christian who picks flaws in the Old Testament and repudiates the laws of Christ cannot be expected to champion Christianity. The Independent's sneer at an eminent prelate for "having turned from an honest mechanical trade" is, to say the least, un-American. It is not true. Even if it were, there is a distinguished precedent "for turning from a mechanical trade," even in the Founder of Christianity. What special animus has the Independent's excardinate writer against the Bishop of Trenton?

The Football Holocaust

The growing death-rate of the football season suggests that our college students need elementary lessons in regard for human life. It may be inconsistent to expect it from them, so long as they are permitted to engage in a game which, as it is now played, develops a brutality which too often ends in death. It may be asking too much from the college presidents who preach reform for society with so much facility, to be brave enough to take a stand against football brutality among the students they are supposed to influence and control. They may, however, take courage from the action of the authorities at West Point in forbidding the game for the rest of the season. If it is considered too brutal for young men who are trained to face hardship and death as a vocation, perhaps it may come to be so regarded for the aspirants to the humane professions. West Point, it is true, does not need a crack football team to draw students; but then, parents might be induced to patronize institutions which provide normal protection for the lives of their sons. The game should be at no stage a contest of brute strength, but sport clean through.

The French Schools

By its opposition to the free-thinking policy of the public schools, the French episcopate has developed in France a situation which will be watched with intense interest throughout the Catholic world. Archbishop Germain, of Toulouse, in his zeal to arouse Catholic voters to rally at the coming general elections of next year to the support of candidates committed to the defence of Catholic interests, has formed an association whose object is thus described: "We demand the re-establishment of religious peace, first, by a direct entente between the sovereign and the Pontiff or by new legislation acceptable to the latter and assuring full liberty to the Church; and, second, the re-establishment of complete liberty of education." Meantime M. Doumergue, Minister of Education, had issued a circular to school teachers instructing them to disregard the demand of the clergy and Catholic parents for the withdrawal of the text books placed under the ban by the episcopate. The "Education League," too, an association formed years ago to further the interests of purely state schools with no religious instruction, is organizing against Catholic associations which exist already or which may be formed hereafter in obedience to the clergy. It is probable that the whole question will be the occasion of heated debate in the forthcoming Parliamentary session.

A certain Pietro Bianchini, styling himself "beneficed clergyman of St. Mary Major's and ecclesiastical agent" has sent out circulars from Rome, offering his services to the Reverend clergy for the despatch of matters brought before the Sacred Congregations. Inquiries made in Rome bring the information that the person does not belong to the chapter of St. Mary Major's and is not a recognized ecclesiastical agent.

One of the remarkable features of the development of Western Canada is the influx of Americans. An irrigated tract of nearly 1,000,000 acres near Calgary, was sold lately by the Canadian Pacific Railway to an American syndicate, and another is said to have acquired 54,000 acres in the Cowichan Valley from the Esquimalt and Nansemo Railway. It will be interesting to watch the development of this movement and see whether its result will be the Anglicizing of the settlers or the Americanizing of this part of the Dominion.

The hurricane which wrought general havoc in Key West, Fla., Oct. 13, was particularly severe on the Catholic church and schools. St. Mary, Star of the Sea, the only Catholic church in the city, was but recently built under great difficulties, owing to the exceptional cost of materials on the island and the parishioners' lack of resources. The storm raging at 80 miles an hour destroyed or seriously damaged everything except the concrete walls and practically ruined the high school and the residence of the pastors, Rev. L. Schuler, S.J., and Rev. James Moore, S.J. The colored Catholic school, a large frame building, was also wrecked, while the convent and Academy of the Holy Name Sisters and the parochial school buildings require complete rehabilitation.

One wonders on reading the cabled Spanish news if the Spain of the American newspaper is the land ruled by Alfonso XIII or the fanciful "Spanish Realm" of George William Curtis and his poor old Titbottom. The cabled American newspaper reports in the latter part of September, of an "attack on a Church procession in the south of Spain, with two dead and fifty-six injured," is a pure invention. It must be classed with the disastrous Barcelona earthquake and tidal wave published so broadcast in the United States in the end of January. Just as then there was absolutely no earthquake or tidal wave in Spain so now there has been no attack on a church procession in the south of Spain. These untruthful reports are either written in the United States, or are sent by those who wish to place Spain in a false light before the world.

LITERATURE

A NEW WAY OF INTERPRETING.

Hitherto Catholics have been pretty much at one in teaching that there is in Sacred Scripture only one literal meaning and always one literal meaning, which is the word of God; nor will Catholic exegetes allow that the words of Holy Writ have any other meaning inspired by the Author of all Scripture, the Holy Ghost. There is, at times, the inspired typical meaning, but this is a meaning not of the words but of the persons and deeds and things of the Scriptures.

Now a new way of interpretation has been put forward. The author does not give his name to it, nor has it even an imprimatur. It is contained in the anonymous brochure, "La vraie Science des Ecritures" (Imprimerie de Montligeon). The anonymous author of this ambitious little book is also the writer of "La Clef de David." According to his new method of interpretation, the scholastics have made a great mistake by looking for a literal sense of Scripture. There is no inspired literal meaning to the Sacred Books. In both his brochures, this writer strives to make good the contention that, in all Scripture, inspiration has for its object only a supernatural truth, of which the literal sense is only a symbol. This symbol may be an error either of natural science or of historical fact, since inspiration does not protect the symbol but only the supernatural truth from error. There is in every statement of Scripture, a God-intended supernatural meaning. The work of the exegete is to ferret that hidden meaning out. Take an instance or two.

The Holy Spirit in no way interposes his authority in favor of the historicity of the story of Samson's slaughter of the Philistines with no other weapon than the jaw-bone of an ass. No, this story is only an allegorical setting for the inspired truth. The word of God in this story, be it fact or fancy—no matter which—is the truth that the Word Incarnate has no need of powers on earth to put down his enemies and to open up the sources of living waters for the refreshing of those that combat for his cause. The dog of Tobias, whose wagging tail was an occasion of error even to Newman, now may be relegated to the realm of fancy. Newman thought the literal meaning of this story a fact-narrative too unimportant to be deemed the object of inspiration—merely an obiter dictum of the sacred writer. Leo XIII condemned this opinion in his encyclical "Providentissimus Deus." We must teach that inspiration extends to every complete thought in the Bible. No thought is so unimportant as not to be the object of the authorship of the Holy Spirit. What, then, is the inspired thought in this story of the dog of Tobias? According to our new method of interpretation, it is only this and nothing more—that beasts without intelligence are made by God for the service of man.

This new method of interpretation is only another effort of Modernism to attack the fact-truths of the Bible, and to substitute for them what dogmatic truths the Modernist may deem fit to admit. No Catholic will take it seriously. God is not the author of the Bible if he do not interpose His authority for its statements. If the Bible is only a collection of types, whose meaning is what you will, then the Councils of Trent and Vatican erred in declaring it to be the word of God—i. e. to have God for its author and for the author of all its parts.

To accept this new method of interpretation would be to give up the fact-narratives of the power to absolve sins, the power to consecrate, the power to bind and to loose, the power to merit grace and glory, and all that which is clearly taught in Scripture as the faith of Christ.

Walter Drum, S.J.

The Mystery of Naples, by EDWARD P. GRAHAM. St. Louis: Herder, 1909. $1.50.

This is not a romance, but a gathering together of whatever bears upon the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius. Though the style is sometimes rough and even obscure, and the wish to put an appropriate text at the head of each chapter has led to an extraordinary accommodation of Job iii. 22, the greatest stickler for scientific criticism could not complain of the spirit in which the whole question is discussed. The author avoids no difficulty. He goes into the legends of the life, death and translations of the saint. He investigates the date of the first liquefaction, which he places in the eleventh century, and the connection between the saint and Vesuvius, with as much zeal as he rebukes the ignorance or malice of the calumniators of the clergy and people of Naples. He dwells upon the physical characteristics of the liquefaction, especially the increase of volume and variation of weight, and discusses the various explanations attempted by the opponents of the miracle. He looks into the other cases of liquefaction and the stain on the stone in the church at Solfatara. His conclusions are, of course, in favor of the miracle, and we heartily recommend his book to all who wish to be well informed concerning the wonderful fact, inexplicable by natural laws, which recurs several times each year at Naples in the fullest publicity.

Dictionnaire Apologétique de la Foi Catholique. Quatrième Edition Entièrement Refondue. Sous la Direction de A. D'ALÈS, Professeur à L'Institut Catholique de Paris. Fascicules I et II. Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne & Cie. Prix 5 fr. (Franco, 5.25 fr.).

The first two numbers of this important work have been issued during the current year. They contain subjects treated down to Concordats in the letter "C." As the title indicates the dictionary has gone into its fourth edition, and has been thoroughly recast and brought up to date.

Although the apologetical dictionary is familiar to students, it is regrettable that it is not familiar to the rank and file of English speaking Catholics. For this reason an English translation is most desirable, and we hope some day to see the need supplied.

For those who are not acquainted with the work it may be proper to state that the dictionary presents a full and accurate treatment of all those topics which are common subjects of modern discussion and concerning which the Church's attitude has most frequently been misread and made the object of calumny by prejudice and hostility. Each article is from the pen of a specialist. The matter is arranged methodically with the divisions conspicuously printed so that one need but glance down the page to discover the information he is in quest of. After the positive side of the subject has been treated, the more prominent difficulties urged against the Catholic position, if such exist, are stated and answered. And at the end of the article a full bibliography is appended.

Thus under "Art," Abbé A. D. Sertillanges divides his subject as follows: (1) The esthetic value of the religious sentiment. (2) The supremacy of Catholicism in art values. (3) Objections stated and answered. (4) The present condition of religious art and its future prospects.

Among the subjects similarly treated may be mentioned "Agnosticism," by M. Chossat, S.J.; "Animism," by P. Bugnicourt; "Apostles," by Mgr. P. Battifol; "Roman Catacombs," by P. Allard; "Councils," by Canon J. Forget. The article on "Apologetics," by X. Le Bachelet, S.J., covers the entire field from the early Church to our own times, and a chapter is inserted on modern Protestant apologetics. The bibliography at the end of each section, or chapter, is most valuable and includes the most important apologetic works—Catholic and non-Catholic—not only in Latin but in the principal modern vernaculars.

Behold Your Mother! The Blessed Virgin's Goodness and Greatness. By MATTHEW RUSSELL, S.J. New York: Benziger Brothers.

This is another of the books by Father Russell in which the reader will have one more opportunity of trying to discover the rare secret of wedding devotional thought and feeling with the literary flavor. Literature is worldly; devotion, unworldly. The union of such opposites seems antecedently impossible. But all things are possible to charity, and Father Russell's strong affection for the Spouse of his Master, the Catholic Church, is doubtless the sole combining medium in such an antithesis. At her feet he lays in reverent and child-like simplicity and love flowers that have been gathered in literary nooks and corners near and afar.

In his latest book Father Russell is especially happy. This is only to be expected, since it deals with devotion to Our Lady. There are twenty short essays—if the word can be used for bright little papers that approach the character of religious meditations in their devoutness—dealing with the Catholic devotion to the Mother of God in certain of its aspects that have appealed especially to the author in the course of his long life. Naturally, therefore, they will have also a like attractiveness for the reader who will find here the expression of thoughts and feelings that may have haunted him since the day of his first "Hail Mary."

We were glad to find an entire essay devoted to a consideration of that beautiful prayer, the "Memorare." Another paper that pleased us was that entitled, "Three Hail Marys." The one called "Thoughts on the Assumption" explains the Catholic tradition and argument in favor of that ancient and widespread belief in the Church, and incidentally discloses the rich poetry of Christian dogma.

The Moving of the Waters (The John McBride Company, New York), is one of the novels that have drifted into us from the autumnal flood of fiction. It is a very pleasant story, plentifully sprinkled with incident and dialogue, and yet possessed of much sweet simplicity. The plot and its development center in the fortunes of the heroine, who in her babyhood comes as a waif to a fisherman and his wife and is brought up by them in their house-boat on the upper Mississippi. The scene shifts from the river life to St. Louis, where the young girl comes into her own. The author, who writes under the pen name of "Jay Cady," introduces Catholics among his conspicuous characters, but is not altogether successful in his touches of Catholic life. "Father Gordon" is far from convincing; his sudden departure from his parish without consulting his ecclesiastical superiors to take up work, as a free-lance, in the hospitals of another diocese, remaining at the same time in good standing with his Church, is a very artless performance on the part of the writer. "Jay Cady" also uses the phrase "Jesuit fanaticism," whatever that means.

Gianella, by MRS. HUGH FRASER (B. Herder, St. Louis), is a Catholic novel in every sense of the word. It is a deliciously quaint tale of Italian life. It is the Harland Italy Mrs. Fraser introduces us into, not the Crawford Italy. And we confess our preferences for the former, and our conviction that of the two it is the truer to realities for all its air of exquisite romance. In this novel, also, the heroine is a waif, when we first meet her. But her nurse, who is a strong-minded and most delightful soul, steers her cleverly through the dark eclipse of her fortunes into wealth and marriage. Mrs. Fraser has a surer touch than the writer of "The Moving of the Waters." Her characters are distinctly drawn, and move and speak naturally. The cardinal is splendid; whilst the villain is not such a bad fellow after all—which is as it should be.

What Think You of Christ? (B. Herder, St. Louis), is the latest of the low-priced popular treatises on religion by Bernard J. Otten, S.J., Professor of Dogmatic Theology in St. Louis University. Father Otten has been unusually successful in grasping the modern difficulties in regard to faith, and in offering for them clear and satisfactory solutions. "To the believing Christian," the author says in his preface, "the Divinity of Christ may be proved much more effectively by emphasizing the supernatural element in His career; but, as that element is summarily set aside by the adversaries with whom we have to deal, it has lost much of its value as a weapon of defense in the present controversy. Hence, as the reader will notice, in the following pages little or nothing is said about miracles or other supernatural manifestations; but the whole argumentation turns about certain points of history, which Modernists and Rationalists alike deem of prime importance in deciding the point at issue." This passage indicates the nature of the little book, which is to prove the Divinity and historicity of Christ, having in view the latest errors of the times. The tone throughout is far from controversial; the author confines himself to plain statements and proofs.

The Centenary of Catholicity in Kentucky (Charles A. Rogers, Louisville), is a work that appeared twenty-five years ago. It is well-known to Catholic students of history; but it has never received the popular approval which it deserves. We have been asked to call attention to it in these columns, and we do so with alacrity, since it is, in its own class, a monument of historical research. The author, Benjamin J. Webb, was himself a Kentuckian by birth and descent, and added to a wide personal knowledge of his subject the advantages of a wise judgment and the skill of a practised historian. The volume before us is a large octavo of some six hundred pages, well-indexed, and containing engraved portraits of some of the pioneer Catholics of the State. We think the present title is unfortunate: it should be: "The History of the Catholic Church in Kentucky." The title, as it stands, is misleading, as liable to suggest some slight booklet issued to commemorate a centennial celebration; whereas it is a serious work, the result of seven years' hard toil by an able man. There ought to be a similar volume for Catholicity in every State in the union; and Mr. Webb's history could serve as an admirable model.

The Making of Mortlake. By the REVEREND J. E. COPUS, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros.

The youngster who fails to enjoy the reading of "The Making of Mortlake" is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils. In the breast of its writer there beats the heart of a boy, which will account, perhaps, for the Reverend author's setting such store by the military life. While the story will do good to every youth who reads at all, it will be of special value to him who is, if one may so put it, at the parting of the ways. There is a crisis in the life of every adolescent; and this crisis is precisely the subject matter of Father Copus' fine story. In it is shown how Frank Mortlake rises on his dead self to higher things.

Beyond doubt this story, steeped in the Catholic instinct, rich in variety, sun-lit with quiet humor, will cause many a hesitating youth to take heart of grace and choose the better way. F. J. F.

A Chapel in Every Home, by JOSEPH R. WILSON, LL.B., Philadelphia.

This is an Episcopalian's earnest plea for a place of prayer for common and private use, in every family. The author, who has the matter close to his heart, deserves all the encouragement that can be given him. Prayer is what the world needs to bring it back to God. We therefore wish him God-speed in his efforts to make this known in his own denomination, and pray God to reward him with abundant graces for his zeal.

The Holy Man of Santa Clara, or The Life, Virtues and Miracles of Fr. Magin Catalá, O.F.M., by FR. ZEPHYRIN ENGELHARDT, O.F.M. San Francisco, Cal.: James H. Barry Co. Price, 75 cents.

Here we have an account of the life, of which, apparently very little is known, and of the virtues of one of the Franciscan missionaries in California, who labored in the neighborhood of Santa Clara and San Jose during the first three decades of the nineteenth century. Its interest lies in this that the attempt is being made to introduce the cause of his beatification.

The Candle, as a Symbol and Sacramental in the Catholic Church. From the German of REV. HENRY THEILER, S.O. Cist., by REV. J. F. LANG. New York and Cincinnati: Fr. Pustet & Co.

A book full of information that should be most agreeable to Catholics. Moreover, it will enable its readers to answer fully the questions that Protestants often put. The author appears somewhat strict in his unqualified assertion that to all under episcopal degree only two candles are allowed at a low Mass. If he had said: "a strictly private Mass," he would have been right, but we think that some exception is made for low Masses that may be reckoned quasi-parochial, e. g. convent Masses and Masses of general Communion. What is to be said of the practice sufficiently common of lighting a good many candles, not in honor of the person of the celebrant, but of the occasion or the solemnity, as, for instance, at a low nuptial Mass, or at the altar of some saint on his feast, especially when these will burn in his honor throughout the day? In this last case, may they be lit only after the Masses are finished? The translation is not altogether idiomatic; but this is comparatively unimportant in a book of this kind.

Reviews and Magazines

The Mountaineer of Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md., gives us in its October number a sympathetic sketch of the saintly Franciscan lay brother, Venerable Fray Pedro de Gante, apostle and defender of the natives of New Spain. This zealous religious, related in some way to us unknown, to Charles V., spent half a century in the City of Mexico, in whole-hearted devotedness to the Indians. In 1527, he started a manual training school, in which, besides the common trades, boys could learn music, painting and sculpture. Their aptness in mastering the three R's and the catechism gave the greatest consolation to their teacher and guide. His zeal in caring for the sick, in teaching the ignorant, and in championing the cause of the oppressed so endeared him to the natives that his death in 1572 was bewailed as a national misfortune and loss.

The latest number of La Civiltà Cattolica contains a deep study of the correction of juvenile delinquents. Finding the chief cause of modern decay of morals in the preponderance of public life over private life, of society over the individual, of the State over the family, of the street corner over the domestic hearth, the writer sees the evil seeping through the various social strata from the ruling class to the peasants of the Marches. The principles of liberalism and socialism have done a great deal of harm by taking from the family its sacred character but especially by monopolizing instruction in a way to render family training wellnigh impossible. To stem this torrent of evil, the State, which has done the mischief, ought to favor those private undertakings which try to correct young offenders by restoring as far as possible the family principle in their institutions. Statistics show that the great majority of wayward children were deprived of parental care either by death or by the evil ways of father or mother or both. If then, before they are hardened in crime, they are placed in surroundings and conditions which are a studied reproduction of what the family should be, they may be saved to society. The Germans, so fruitful in good works of practical turn, have an organization built up along the lines indicated, in which public officials, priests and ministers work together, for the religious rights of the young are safeguarded and the religious principles of the organizers are treated with respect. Less State and more home is the kernel of the argument. A government bureau of animal industry will do for cattle; but something like a home with a parent's kindly and affectionate interest is needed to make of a child more than a trained beast. As the article is unsigned, we cannot do more than congratulate the magazine on having so able a contributor. "Catholic action among the women of Italy" seems odd and novel, for they have not been famous for organized effort along religious lines. Certes, the field is there, the work is there. We trust that the hopeful and sympathetic treatment of their organization and its aims by another anonymous writer may be an earnest of the success of their endeavors.

The Month as usual is both interesting and instructive. In "The Economy of Religious Orders" Father Rickaby discusses cheerfully and hopefully the relations between the teaching and nursing orders and their competitors. He sees no reason why these should not be governed by the laws of supply and demand and therefore points out the way to make our teaching and nursing, necessarily the least expensive, first in quality. He recognizes that we have to choose between competing with the state and serving it. The former is ideally preferable: the latter practically is what we shall have to accept. He shows therefore, that it also has its good side. Father Pollen reviews Father Venturi's book on the religious life of Italy in the last half of the sixteenth century and shows that in this as in most other matters generalization is inexact. In history we have to be forever distinguishing; we might say even more so than in any philosophy. The reason is because in history we are always dealing with concrete acts of individuals either men or communities, in which freewill no less than local conditions, is always stepping in to modify general laws. Father Keating crushes the apostate McCabe in reviewing his book "The Decay of the Church of Rome." Father Thurston continues to show up Mr. Percy Dearmer. P. gives a second paper on the clergy and social work, and "Flotsam and Jetsam" and a couple of lighter articles complete the number.

EDUCATION

The report of the Forty-sixth Annual Convocation of the University of the State of New York, held October 22-24, 1908, has recently appeared. Its most prominent features are undoubtedly the address of President J. G. Schurman on the adaptation of University work to the common life of the people; the able paper by Regent William Nottingham: "How far are school Authorities justified in Assuming Responsibility for the Health and Physical condition of Pupils?"; the thoughtful essay: "The Present Status of Public Education" by E. J. Goodwin.

President Schurman emphasizes the necessity of adapting the courses of study to practical life, and deplores with the late Professor Paulsen that the ancient learned faculties have been separated from the modern scientific faculties. He gives a fair exposition of the inter-relation of the imperium, sacerdotium and studium in the Middle Ages. We wonder whether the following sentences give the speaker's full conviction: "There are just three things about which education revolves—God and man, and this material universe in which we live and move, and have our being. The science of theology deals with the first of these. So far as the other two are concerned, no man is educated who is ignorant of either" (p. 21).

We should naturally expect that every person claiming to be educated should not be ignorant of any one of the three, especially not of the first, of God. But this first important object is simply dismissed by stating that it belongs to theology. We remember how beautifully and convincingly Cardinal Newman, with whom Dr. Schurman is well acquainted, assigns the study of the Infinite Being, as the underlying and never-to-be-neglected substratum of all research, learning and investigation, to the essential function of any institution of learning. Instead of this noble and absolutely necessary and final aim, President Schurman advocates as the aim of education "the great goal of democracy, a universally intelligent public opinion."

There were three papers on "The Need of More Attention and Health in the Public Schools"; William H. Burnham, of Clark University, Worcester, Mass., sums up his interesting paper as follows:

"As the ability of children to do the work of the school depends on their physical condition and the integrity and development of their sense organs, it is only common sense to make a general physical examination and special tests at frequent intervals of sight, hearing, and nasal and dental conditions" (p. 34).

That this theory is open to manifold objections was clearly explained by William Nottingham, Regent of the University of the State of New York, who in his admirable paper goes back to the right of the parents, and opposes strongly the doctrine that makes the citizen the ward of the State; that destroys individual initiative. "Never more than under our system," he says, "has every one the right to know by what authority, under what pretext, and for what purpose does the State invade the private domain of the citizen. It is now intimated that we . . . have the school children examined for non-contagious defects and subject them to treatment for the alleged reason that their strength and efficiency will thereby be promoted and the general good conserved. . . . When did I surrender my prerogatives to the school authorities and at whose behest do I divide my control in this behalf with them? The parents naturally would like to know when they send their child off to school in the morning, how much of him they may fairly anticipate will return at night, and by what authority the missing parts have been subtracted. . . . If the duty of looking after the health and physical condition of the child is taken from the parent and his chosen physician, and delegated to the school, it is not likely to be so well performed." Besides, Dr. Nottingham urges that those medical practitioners who are appointed under any political regime to the charitable work of the State, are not apt to be the most experienced or skilled physicians or surgeons, but rather the new recruits to the profession who are looking for business."

In the lively and interesting discussion in which Mr. Edward L. Stevens, Associate City Superintendent of New York City, simply takes for granted that the children are the wards of the State, and in the other remarks, the original warning given by Dr. Nottingham is by no means weakened. The parental right ought to be sacredly, scrupulously safeguarded if we do not want to sacrifice individual right and unconsciously promote State-Socialism.

"The Present Status of Public Education" is treated exhaustively in the lengthy paper of Edward J. Goodwin, of the Packer Collegiate Institute, Brooklyn, and supplemented in the discussion by remarks of Frank Rollins, Second Assistant Commissioner of Education of New York, and by Professor De Garmo. Professor Goodwin laments that so many children do not get to the end of the elementary school, that "not more than one-third ever finish the elementary school, and that less than one-half of them go beyond the fifth and sixth grades. For a rich and progressive State like New York, that expends $47,000,000 annually upon its elementary schools, this conclusion is alarming, if not disgraceful. It indicates, as the Commissioner of Education of the State of New York says, that the lives of our children are being wasted. Until it shall have been demonstrated that these conditions are irremediable, we should cease to boast of "our splendid system of free schools."

It may be observed with justice that any considerable amount of time spent by a child in a well-managed school, especially if the heart is not neglected, must bear its fruit. Therefore, not all children who fail to finish the elementary schools are failures.

Non-promotion of pupils and their consequent retention in lower grades, overburdening the memory with uninteresting and useless material, mismanagement of schools, are given as causes for this lamentable condition. The chief remedy proposed is to consist in reducing the elementary to seven years or even to six years, and to adjust the other higher grades. In New York State, the Department of Education, as stated by Dr. Draper, is preparing such a plan.

Another remedy is found to lie in greater centralizing power of the State in education. This is advocated somewhat hesitatingly by Mr. Goodwin, alluding to individual freedom and civil equality as platforms of the democratic State. Nevertheless democracy, although it may not wisely establish a socialistic despotism and inhibit individual initiative, should not omit the duty of organized effort to protect itself against ignorance, industrial paralysis, and economic failure, with all the evils and unhappiness that follow in their train. Our democratic State enacts pure food laws, abates the injustice and arrogance of corporations, protects women and children from the greed of factory and sweat-shop, founds public libraries, builds museums and compels every parent to send his child to the elementary school. For like reasons it may tax its citizens to support every kind and grade of school needful to promote agriculture, manufactures and commerce, as well as the traditional education, or to prepare them to pursue the studies of the learned professions.

Those who are versed in sound doctrine of political economy and especially in principles of just and fair taxation, will have to pick many a flaw in the above statements. According to sound economics the State should not attempt to do the work for the people if the families or groups of families can accomplish the same by private enterprise. It is to be lamented that the education of the child which is in the first place the right and duty of the parent should have gone over so largely to the State. The responsibility of the parents is thus more and more relinquished. Thus it has come to pass that it is only the truly independent father and mother who guard their rights of educating their children. In America proper scope should be given to individual enterprise. It is not in keeping with the spirit of American enterprise, and American self-help to hand the all-important matter of education over to the State and State officials. In the demand of taxes for all and every kind of higher education, a sound principle of taxation is violated. The injustice of this taxation consists in the fact that such institutions are patronized not by the children of the poor, for whose sake alone they might have a right to exist, but by the children of the well-to-do classes, who are able to educate their own offspring; while, on the other hand, the poor have to bear their share of the burden of taxation.

A review of the principal questions treated in the Convocation of the Regents of the State of New York leads the intelligent man to think profoundly and seriously over the present tendency in education. The movement of centralization of education needs the careful study of all citizens interested in the welfare of the country. The rights of the parents must be protected, and education must not lose sight of the first and foremost duty of every human being, viz., to serve his Creator.

F. HEIERMAN, S. J.

The Governing Body of the National University of Ireland has submitted some forty names to the Statutory Commission for Professorships and Lectureships in Dublin. The nominations include three or four non-Catholics and eight priests. Rev. T. A. Finlay, S.J., is named for the chair of Political Economy, Dr. Douglas Hyde for Modern Irish Language and Literature and Mr. Thos. Kettle, M. P., for National Economics of Ireland. There were two ladies on the list, Miss Mary Hayden, M. A., for Modern Irish Literature, and Agnes O'Farrelly, M.A., for a Lectureship in Irish. Miss Hayden was accepted.

The general scheme for scholarships, signed by Dr. D. J. Coffey, President of Dublin University College, assigns 60 annual scholarships of from $250 to $75 each to the faculties of Arts and Sciences; 24 of $125 to $75 each, to the faculty of Medicine, and leaves the awards in Law, Engineering and Commerce undetermined. The students' fees in the various faculties are from $50 to $70 annually.

The leaders of the Gaelic League laid down the principle: "No essential Gaelic, no Money," and the County Councils, on which the University's finances will largely depend, passed resolutions to that effect. The same leaders have accepted salaried positions from the University though it has not yet announced its position on "Essential Irish." The demand is being made that should the University not make Gaelic essential, these professors should resign. The provisional appointments made by the University to chairs and lectureship in all subjects give satisfaction.

SCIENCE

An article with regard to women in medicine appears in the latest number of The International Clinic by one of the collaborating editors of that quarterly, Dr. James J. Walsh, of Fordham University, which is startling for those who think that it is only in the present generation that women are receiving opportunities for education for the first time. The ordinary impression seems to be that at last we have reached the stage of evolution in which even women are considered worthy of all the opportunities for intellectual development accorded to men. Dr. Walsh tells the story of the first medical school of modern times, that at Salerno in Italy, where the department of the diseases of women was under the charge of women physicians. A number of distinguished professors whose works are still extant, taught in this department and women were allowed to practice at least in certain specialties and probably in the whole field of medicine, for licenses for women physicians in Naples are still preserved in the Government archives.

In the same paper attention is called to the fact that at Bologna in the early days of the University women studied law. The daughter of Irnerius, the professor and founder of the law school which became the nucleus of the University, studied and reached distinction in this department. One of the assistants of the well-known Mondino the first who made regular public demonstration in anatomy was a young woman named Alessandra Giliani. According to the old chronicler she invented the method of injecting blood vessels and varnishing tissues so as to protect them from the air, by which anatomical specimens can be preserved for years and the need for the deterrent work of dissection is greatly lessened. Curiously enough it was another woman teacher at an Italian university, Madame Manzolini, who invented the method of making wax models of portion of the human body painted so as to resemble human tissues which also permitted teaching apart from dissection and has proved extremely useful for anatomical demonstrations.

The traditions as to feminine education thus established in the Italian universities of the Middle Ages continued down to our own times so that in every century since the twelfth we have the record of one or several distinguished women professors at the Italian universities. What was true in Italy in the Middle Ages was to a certain extent true also among the northern nations though education was not so developed among them. In Germany there is the story of the Abbess Hildegard whose works were published in 1882 in Migne's "Patrology." She is also known as St. Hildegard and her writings were mainly on medical subjects, intended for the instruction of religious, who were engaged in nursing in the convents of her time. Dr. Melanie Lipinska, who in 1900 took as the thesis for her doctorate in medicine at the University of Paris the "History of Women Physicians" summed up the prevalent opinion of the value of Hildegard's work as follows: "Various passages contain in germ some modern discoveries and teach useful lessons. . . . In general her work seems to be the fruit of a very practical mind thoroughly familiar with the practice of medicine." She made a specialty of prescriptions for the poor and suggested that simple drugs should be used for them, leaving complicated prescriptions for those who could pay for them.

In a word, the olden times saw a very striking development of education for women wherever and whenever they developed intellectual interests that demanded such educational opportunities.

The Observatory of the Ebro, Tortosa, Spain, has recently issued Report No. 4, La Sección Eléctrica by the Rev. Juan García Molla, S.J., and published by G. Gili, Barcelona. (Memorias del Observatorio del Ebro No. 4, La Sección Eléctrica por el P. Juan García Molla, S.J.). In a neatly bound and well-printed folio of one hundred and fifty pages, with thirty-two cuts and six large plates are explained in a clear and orderly manner the apparatus and methods in use in the Electrical Sections of the Observatory. The author descends to a multitude of practical details which will be appreciated by those familiar with observatory work and which will serve as a useful guide for those who may wish to begin this class of observations.

In a brief introduction the author gives a general idea of the Electrical Section and explains the scope and plan of the Report, which is divided into two parts. The first part, "Atmospherical Electricity," has three chapters and treats respectively of "Ionization of the Atmosphere," "Electrical Potential of the Atmosphere" and "Atmospherical Hertzian Waves." The second part of the report deals with "Earth Currents." The methods and apparatus of Elster-Geitel and of Gerdien used in the Observatory are also clearly explained. In an appendix of twenty-five pages Father García gives a scholarly summary of our present knowledge of Ions and Electrons, together with useful references to important publications.

This latest publication of the Observatory of the Ebro gives additional evidence of the high value of the scientific work being carried on under the direction of Rev. Richard Cirera, S.J.

About the middle of December the Navy Department will inaugurate a series of experiments in long distance wireless telegraphy. Brent Rock, Mass., has been selected as the land station and the scout cruisers Salem and Birmingham will flash the signals from the sea. These cruisers will be fitted with apparatus capable of sending messages over 1,000 and of receiving over 3,000 miles. In case this experimentation proves satisfactory, it is the intention of the navy to equip all of its vessels with more powerful instruments than those now in service. Washington or a station in the immediate neighborhood will be made the centre for all communications.

Official reports of the Department of Ordnance, U. S. A., would seem to indicate that the Maxim "silencer" has fallen short of expectations in many respects. The verdict of experts is reported to be that while the silencer may prove of advantage under certain conditions experimentation hardly warrants its introduction into general service.

An international competition has been announced by the observatory of Trep-ton for the best photographs of the Leonid meteors which are expected to face during the November showers. The condition placed is that these photos be taken from the car of a balloon. This condition marks a new departure in the field of astronomy.

The obliteration of the markings on the surface of the planet Mars by a gloomy yellow veil is heralded by astronomers as an unparalleled phenomenon in the history of this planet. It has been suggested that the abnormal electrical conditions of the sun, which, according to Sir Oliver Lodge, occasioned the recent magnetic disturbances on the earth, more seriously effect- ed Mars.

Rev. Walter Sidgreaves, S. J., of the Stonyhurst Observatory has contributed to Nature a short but very interesting account of the great magnetic storm of September last. It suggests that, whatever be the cause of the magnetic storm, it must be something arriving in our neighborhood, whether directly from the sun or circulating around it, of which a part travels quicker and has less effects than the slower moving particles which produce the greater oscillations. The nature of these particles he leaves an open question.

SOCIOLOGY

The recent meeting of the Ohio Federation of Labor at Toledo, beginning October 12, brought Labor Federation to a critical stage. A storm had long been brewing, and the party spirit and discontent which marked the opening of the convention, showed that it was fast developing. The crisis was reached in a motion carried by the prominent Socialist editor and agitator, Max Hayes, to seat in the convention the members of the Brotherhood of Electrical Workers who had been outlawed by the Council of the American Federation of Labor. What will be the end of the controversy we have still to learn. Max Hayes has since hinted at the formation of a new national organization in opposition to the American Federation. "There are enough labor organizations now at odds with the American Federation of Labor," he says, "to make a more than respectable showing should the national organization's officials persist in their coercive policy." The intention is to carry the matter into the Toronto convention, which is to meet during November. In the meantime we will sketch the history of the dispute and point out an important principle likely to be involved in such conflicts, and not to be ignored by Catholic workingmen and those who direct them.

The present difficulty originated more than a year ago, with the Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. In a special convention, held at St. Louis, the officers of the organization were deposed and new elections took place. The rejected officers appealed to the American Federation of Labor and were sustained. In consequence all State and city central bodies were ordered to expel every electrical worker adhering to the newly elected officials. This decree was openly violated by many of those organizations on account of alleged illegality. The American Federation then took the stringent measure of withdrawing the charter from the Cleveland United Trades and Labor Council and granted it to a new Federation of Labor. "Its officers have issued edicts that would do credit to a Russian Czar!" exclaimed Max Hayes. Hence came his motion to seat the outlawed members, which, after a violent discussion lasting two days, was carried by a vote of 194 to 154. The party loyal to the American Federation of Labor then left the convention, while the victorious revolutionary faction hastily despatched an official to Cleveland to secrete the corporation funds. It is worth noting that all the Cleveland representatives, except the delegates of the Bartenders, Waiters and Cooks, are said to have adhered to the outlawed party.

The friends of the American Federation of Labor lost no time in laying the blame for the split in their convention upon the Socialists. It is true that Socialism had not entered into the controversy; it is true likewise that many who sided with the rebellious faction may not have been influenced by even the least bias towards the Socialist cause; yet there is something in this entire situation which one must not overlook. No one acquainted with existing Socialism can have the slightest doubt as to its attitude towards the American Federation of Labor. It is one of intense hostility. Mr. Hayes denies most emphatically that the quarrel was between Socialists and their opponents, yet Mr. Hayes himself was the leader of discontent riding in the whirlwind and directing the storm. He is editor of the Citizen, a strongly Socialistic organ, and assistant editor of the International Socialist Review, and these facts make it clear where his own sympathies must lie and where the sympathies of those opposed to him.

No compromise, no concession can ever appease the Socialist party. It seeks nothing short of the absolute control of the labor unions of our country. It will not rest so long as this remains unattained. While many of the unions have already submitted, the American Federation of Labor has hitherto rejected every overture. Ever since the New Orleans convention, when the Socialists were foiled in the attempt to win it over, although not so thoroughly as to leave no reason for fear, it has become the target for their attacks.

It is plain then that whatever may be the right or the wrong in the present case, Socialists will never cease in their efforts to destroy any federation of which they cannot obtain the control. Whatever will not yield must break, is their motto. What renders their assaults most formidable is that they will shrink from no means to succeed. The triumph of the cause is, in their own words, the one and only measure of morality. The great organization into which Max Hayes, and those of his persuasion, would weld all the other unions is, perhaps, to reproduce more or less the Industrial Workers of the World, dyed red in the grain. "It may be that the outcome of the controversy will be the organization of another national body," Max Hayes is reported to have said. "There are several important branches of labor at odds with the American Federation of Labor, including such organizations as the Western Federation of Miners, the glass workers and others." The Western Federation of Miners is rampantly Socialistic; the Socialistic program has been endorsed by the Flint Glass Workers and the Amalgamated Glass Workers. Such organizations would form the nucleus of a federation, in the Socialistic sense.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

At the recent regular conference of the Chilean episcopate in Santiago, some measures of more than local interest were adopted for the advancement of religion and morals. Pastors are charged to look diligently after the purity of the wine and flour for altar use, which they are to obtain preferably from religious institutes or from seculars of known reliability. That the faithful may not be detained too long in church, the Holy Communion is not to be administered during Mass on holy days of obligation.

By permission of the Holy See, the anniversary of Chilean independence, September 18, is to be celebrated every year with a solemn votive Mass of Our Lady of Mount Carmel with Gloria and Credo, and papal benediction with plenary indulgence.

The faithful are exhorted to remember the Catholic University of Santiago in their wills, as well as to support Catholic education during their lives. The importance of Catholic books, papers and libraries is impressed upon them and they are urged to keep up and extend the good work. Reading rooms and assembly halls for workmen's societies and student organizations are strongly recommended.

As the year 1910 will mark the centenary of Chilean independence, the bishops will offer four prizes in a national competition. The first will be for a popular religious handbook which shall contain a defense of the Faith and a refutation of the prevailing local errors. The second will be awarded to the best historical work on the cooperation of the Church in the national development during the century of independence. The third will be given to the best legal article on enforcing the laws on Sunday rest and against intemperance. A scientific subject yet to be assigned will receive the fourth prize. The rector and the deans of the faculties of the Catholic University of Santiago are constituted a committee to arrange the details of the national competition.

Finally the bishops contemplate a Catholic Educational Congress of the republic for the improvement of schools and colleges.

Few ever think of Catholicism in connection with Wales yet it has a most interesting history. On October 14, the Rev. Dr. Hartwell Jones, the Protestant rector of Nutfield Surrey, England, and a well-known Welsh historian and antiquarian, lectured before the Cardel-marthen Cymrodorion Society, on "Footsteps of the Welsh in Italy." Incidentally he mentioned these points of special Catholic interest:

Columbanus, the Irishman, placed his monastery at Bobbio under the protection of the Pope, and the two witnesses to the document were Welshmen (Gwrgan and Cynog). Giraldu Cambrensis had made frequent visits to Rome in connection with the affair of the See of St. Davids. Pilgrimages to the tombs of the Apostles were common, and he quoted some Welsh poetry written in the time of James I. dealing with the expected return of a Welshman who had gone on a pilgrimage long after the "Reformation"! Several Welsh Catholics went abroad after the "Reformation." Griffith Roberts, chaplain to the Bishop of Milan, published a Welsh grammar and a Welsh religious manual at Bologna. John David Rees had also published a Welsh grammar in Italy. Lewis Owen, a Fellow of New College, Oxford, who went abroad rather than profess the Protestant religion, desired to found a Welsh College at Rome. He was granted a hospice by the Pope, and conducted the College for some time. Complaints of partiality shown towards the Welsh and oppression of the English led to the College changing hands, but every 14th October they celebrated their founder, Lewis Owen, at the English College in Rome.

A meeting was held on October 27 in the St. Regis Convent this city under the auspices of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine to inaugurate a series of Home Conferences for women, on subjects connected with the Faith; as Scripture, Sacred Dogma, the Liturgy etc. The Rev. Father McCahill of the Annunciation church, president of the Confraternity, in opening the meeting explained its nature and scope. He alluded also to the Holy Father's earnest desire for the thorough study of their faith by all Catholics. Rev. Dr. Delany who has consented to conduct the Course in Sacred Dogma spoke on the importance of a thorough and intelligent understanding of the principles of our holy Faith. The meeting closed with the understanding that the exact dates of the prospective Conferences, would be arranged later. Rev. Thomas B. Kelly is to take the course in Scripture.

A week's Mission beginning November 7, will be given to deaf mutes by the Redemptorist Fathers at the church of St. Alphonsus, New York.

In a special collection ordered recently in the churches of Boston by Archbishop O'Connell for the benefit of the local charitable institutions the sum of $23,313 was realized.

Directing that a branch of the Holy Name Society be formed in every parish of his diocese Bishop Canevin of Pittsburg writes:—

"There is no better or more thoroughly religious organization for men than the Holy Name Society. It is a blessing to the parish in which it is established."

PRESS, PULPIT, PLATFORM.

At the dedication of a new church at Cambridge, Mass., on October 24, archbishop O'Connell declared he would not have his priests and parishes spend all their lives and energies in paying the mortgages on costly churches. He believed in small churches easy of access to the people that will enable their pastors to give more time to their flocks and guard them from the social and moral evils of the day. "We have other work besides piling stone upon stone," he said,

"The time is here for churches that will not be a burden on the people. That is the meaning of this church. What matter whether its walls are decorated by great artists or not. However simple if God is willing to abide here what difference does it make to us provided we can throw off the influences around us and can learn the truth here—learn the sacredness of your holiest ties? That is the mission of this church."

The numerous papers that wept and wailed over the sad fate of Ferrer, the Spanish Anarchist, took care to inform their readers that he provided generously in his will for the wife and children whom he had abandoned to poverty and neglect. It now transpires that Ferrer in his will specially disowns and disinherits his daughters by his lawful wife, and divides his considerable property between Portet, an Anarchist associate, and a woman "who has been variously referred to as his second wife and his 'friend'."

This revelation of character is not surprising in an anarchist who respects no law, human or divine, but it is surprising that editors, who live in a country where law and the fundamental relations of life are respected, should champion such a man. A New York Sun editorial of October 17 should give Ferrer's American panegyrists some food for thought. It said:

"It would be interesting to learn whether the late Señor Ferrer was an anarchist or a socialist. Philosophically the two are the poles apart; when it comes to disorder, to upsetting everything in sight, the militants among them adopt the same methods. Ferrer, like Mazzini, was a man of intelligence; like him, he apparently objected to Governments of every kind, even those he advocated, when they were once in power.

"That his pupils in Barcelona should have celebrated his execution by exploding bombs at random was fitting and natural; Luccheni demonstrated that the guiltlessness of the victim was immaterial in an anarchist killing. Why Signor Nathan, however, socialist Mayor of Rome, or M. Jaurès, the French socialist party leader, should wish to identify themselves with the party of action is a mystery, unless they wish to make socialism represent revolution at all costs. Why should the violence of the mobs be turned first against church edifices? Is the Paris Commune again their joint ideal, and shall the bourgeois get ready to be slaughtered?"

Though Catholics form a majority of Church members in many of the States of the Union, it is remarkable how few United States Senators are Catholics. Commenting on this fact, the Borinquen of Porto Rico thinks that this goes to show that Catholic citizens display no religious prejudice in the exercise of the right of suffrage. It adds that were Porto Ricans allowed representation in the Congress it is safe to say no religious test would be attempted, although the Church members in the Island are nearly all Catholics. Justly and from a sense of self protection they might decline to give their votes to "candidates who seek to stifle the voice of conscience or to play the rôle of high priest in a new cult," with no other end in view than personal notoriety and the restriction of the rights and privileges of Catholics.

"In the development of the political life of Porto Rico," says the writer, "under whatever precise form of government the Island may assume in the future, the Catholics will do well to look to the example of their fellow religionists in the United States, who have always eschewed religion in politics, but who have at the same time never hesitated to make their public and avowed enemies understand the value of votes at election time.

He concludes: While it is un-Catholic to be partisan and an abuse of civic rights to vote merely for religious prejudices, it is a duty in the highest sense that our votes be not given in favor of those who publicly assail the rights of conscience."

At the Swansea Church Congress (Anglican) Lord Halsbury, late Lord Chancellor, speaking of preaching, suggested that in the first place clergymen be taught to read, and in the second place that they should give some thought to their subject before they get into the pulpit. He added that laymen on hearing a sermon often feel that they would like to say a word or two on the other side

Bishop Heylen will visit Montreal in January in connection with the details of the next Eucharistic Congress which will be held there next year.

The Earl of Cavan, who is not a Catholic and several members of his family, went from Ireland to Belgium three weeks ago to be present at the reception into one of the strictest convents there of his sister Lady Maud Barrett widow of Henry J. Barrett who died in 1901.

Many have heard of the Hospice of Mount St. Bernard but few know even the name of the man who presided over its mission of helping the wayfarers during more than half a century. A bronze plate recently placed upon the walls of the Hospice bears the name of the Abbé Chanoix Rector of the Hospice during close on sixty years, a botanist of distinction, discoverer of many Alpine botanical novelties. In the wilderness of the Alps thanks to his constant vigilance the tourist can see in the yard of the Monastery rare specimens of Alpine plants. Abbé Chanoix deserves to be called the "pilot of the Pass" of the little St. Bernard for no one knows better than he the movements of the glaciers, and when the dreaded avalanche might launch forth on its dreadful descent.

OBITUARY

Judge Walter J. Gibbons, for the last quarter of a century prominent in Catholic temperance work in Illinois, died, in Chicago, on October 22d, aged fifty years.

Hon. Charles Kloebe, one of the leading public men of Ohio, died of ptomaine poisoning, at Celina, on October 25, aged fifty years. His family were among the pioneer German Catholics of that section of his native state.

The late Mgr. M. G. Proulx, who died in Rome on October 7, was born in Nicolet, Quebec, September 27, 1835. He was the son of George Proulx, member of the Legislative Council and at twelve years of age entered the College of that town, and there he spent his long and useful life. He was ordained priest September 29, 1859. In 1872 he was appointed procurator of the Seminary, a charge he retained to the end, and was, moreover, many times its superior. It is impossible to express the honor and love in which he was held by the clergy who during a period of more than sixty years came under his influence as seminarians. He was a great authority on Canadian Genealogy, having drawn up in his leisure hours the complete lines of descent of all the families in the neighborhood of Nicolet. Though seventy-four years of age, he undertook last August a pilgrimage to Rome, to celebrate the jubilee of his priesthood at the tomb of the Apostles. This act of piety accomplished, he fell ill, and passed away on October 7. He was a Vicar-General of his native diocese.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

"Herod," Lyric Theatre.—A note-worthy production of Stephen Phillips' dramatic poem "Herod." Mr. William Faversham deserves great commendation in this his first essay in romantic tragedy, introducing to the American public one of the most notable of modern poetic dramas. The subject of the play is the story of Herod the Great's downfall and death. Aristobolus, the brother of Mariamne the queen, has at her request been made high priest, despite his youth, by Herod. Already a favorite of the people he ingratiates himself still further with the populace and so far arouses Herod's jealousy, who above all things has a lust for power, that he contrives the murder of Aristobolus. Mariamne's love for Herod is in consequence changed into hatred, and she resists all attempts on the king's part to win back her affection. Stung to rage by his failure Herod is led to believe by lying courtiers that Mariamne has attempted to poison him and in a moment of insane fury commands her to be put to death. The conflict of passion between his lust of power and his love of Mariamne is the theme of the tragedy, ending in the madness and death of the king, when Mariamne's dead body is brought before him. Mr. Faversham's delineation of Herod was on the whole successful although with some notable defects. In depicting the furious rage and insane passion of the king, especially in the final scene over the bier of the dead Mariamne, he achieved a high and remarkable level, but in the subtler shadings of the parts he fell below the stature of Phillips' Herod. The royal dignity and habit of power, which should set easily on kingly shoulders was lacking in Mr. Faversham's portrayal. He seemed to ignore the minor elements in Herod's character in order to emphasize the fiercer and rougher moods of the maddened man. In the latter he was as eminently successful, as in the former he was wanting. His support on the whole was capable and intelligent; the stage setting was worthy of high praise, being both sumptuous and magnificent. On the whole the production showed high purpose and laughable endeavor and deserves the utmost support of the public.

"The Harvest Moon," Garrick Theatre. A play with a purpose. Mr. Thomas has evidently taken note of the criticism abroad last season against the inferior quality of plays that have been holding the American stage. He plainly preaches in "The Harvest Moon" that the drama should be an elevating influence. His protagonist, M. Vavin is a celebrated French playwright, who declares that his chief regret is that any words in any of his plays should have made any one less kind or less just. His concluding speech, as the curtain goes down, addressed to a budding playwright, who is to be his son-in-law, is to the effect that their plays henceforth will make "the people look up—look up." This admirable preaching is however incidental. The main theme of "The Harvest Moon" is a brief against the reiterated suggestion, unfortunately too common, that some people have an inherited propensity to a certain kind of evil with the result that the imagination becomes obsessed with the notion that fate has destined the victim for wrongdoing. Mr. Thomas works out his thesis with interest and skill marred a bit by wordiness in developing the situation. His color scheme in the second act—Charcot's theory as to the effect of colors on people's moods—is somewhat far-fetched. Notwithstanding these shortcomings, "The Harvest Moon" is well worth-the-while, points a good moral, and leaves one the better for seeing it.

"Israel," Criterion Theatre.—A mephitic play, improbable and artificial; a production of the laboratory compounding anti-Semitism with a boulevardier's idea of social life amongst the French nobility of the present day. A young French nobleman becomes an ardent anti-Semite and leads a movement against the Jews in France. As a part of his policy he insults a rich Jewish banker, whom he conceives to be the head and front of the Jewish opposition, and challenges him to a duel, only to learn from his own mother, after much tortuous and agonizing probing, that he is the illegitimate son of the man whose life he is seeking. In the play as originally presented on the Paris stage—for "Israel" is a French importation—he kills himself in a fit of profound chagrin. In the American version, he fights the duel, scratches his opponent, his father, with his rapier, becomes reconciled to the situation and marries a young woman who has also been injected into the anglicized play to give it the sentimental denouement.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

AMERICA IN B. E. AFRICA.

SEPTEMBER 16th, 1909.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I do not know to whom I am indebted for the regular copies sent me of AMERICA for I have not, nor can I, pay the subscription price, but, I assure you, it is a joy to me and may well prove a blessing to the others to whom I pass it on. The few Catholic laymen who are here, white men I refer to, value it and even ask for it, as it is just the sort of Catholic paper which would attract the attention of the class of educated non-Catholics.

My opinion of your paper is of little worth I know, but at least I can tell you that every well deserved comment I read, finds a ready response in my heart and I echo all that others have said in praise of AMERICA, its tone and its dress. It is truly a Catholic paper to be justly proud of! All success to it. I pray that whoever sends it to me may continue so great a kindness and charity.

America is very much at home in British East Africa, since the advent of Col. Roosevelt and his party. The speech Col. Roosevelt made in Nairobi, made an excellent impression. At a subsequent meeting it was proposed to have 2,000 copies of it printed so that each member of the house of Lords and Commons and the leading newspapers of England might receive a copy. The money for this however was not voted.

I read in AMERICA under the date of July 31st, 1909, ("A Catholic Empire Maker") that Sir Henry Percy Girouard is a Catholic. This will indeed be a change for British East Africa. Unless there be an amalgamation of British East Africa with the Protectorate of Uganda, we shall not come under the Governor Generalship of Sir Percy Girouard, as thus far, these two are not under one administration. There have been rumors of such amalgamation, but it has never been confirmed.

Sir Henry Hesketh Bell has governed Uganda Protectorate for two years or over. On his route to England he visited Pope Pius X. and gave His Holiness excellent reports of the work done here by the Fathers. This must indeed have been gratifying to His Holiness. Sir Henry Hesketh Bell has just been appointed to Nigeria and now we wonder who his successor in Uganda will be.

There are few places in the world where AMERICA can do so much good, as here in Africa. I humbly beg that someone may keep my name on the list so that we may continue to receive it regularly. With many thanks—oft repeated and cordial congratulations, MOTHER MARY PAUL, O. S. F.

Franciscan Convent, Nsambya Mission, Uganda, B. E. Africa.

OUR DUTY TO MISSIONS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There can no longer be any doubt that the help of Catholic America is needed in the foreign field. France is too much in confusion now to maintain her glorious standard of old with regard to foreign missionary work. What possibilities rest on our people, and consequently what responsibilities. Our Protestant brethren are on the alert. During the past few days the Disciples of Christ were celebrating their centennial at Pittsburg. I was more than surprised to read what they are doing for foreign missions. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions alone disposed of $230,640, of which sum $75,000 are for the erection of a missionary training school at Indianapolis.

One of the delegates, Ernest J. Sias, of Frankfort, Mich., said: "The greatest obligation which ever rested on the shoulders of a people is the debt of the English-speaking people to the missions. It is not an arbitrary tax levied on a nation of unfortunate and unwilling subjects. It is a debt of honor which we, the most prosperous race, owe to the millions of sorrowing and dying who need our civilization and our religion." (The Pittsburg Dispatch). Some Catholics may make light of Protestant missions. I used to do the same. But I see we are mistaken seriously in doing so. Protestants contribute four or five times more than we do towards the support of foreign missions. They have already more workers in the field than we have, women and native workers included; they have more schools in the foreign field—18,921 with 967,400 pupils against 17,834 with 790,880 in ours. I know their work does not in any way equal ours. We count 30,414 stations as against 3,790 of Protestants. The danger, however, is imminent and great. Japan and China especially, with more than 500,000,000 people will be lost to our Faith if America does not wake to its duty.

I beg of you, therefore, to support this cause of arousing our people for foreign missionary work. No home cause will suffer by widening our charity. Men and means are needed. Propagation of our Holy Faith among all nations is the most congenial work of Holy Mother Church, the fulfilment of Christ's last will.

PETER T. JANSER, S.V.D.
Techy, Ill., October 19, 1909.

NEEDS OF THE SOUTH.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

What is wanted down in this section, and badly, are missions to the country-folk who know "nothing of the teachings of the Catholic Church. I can say positively that there is many a Catholic family in some districts in the South that rarely ever sees a Catholic priest. Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Texas, etc., need missions, good faithful priests, plenty of Catholic magazines, pamphlets, literature, to lessen the ignorance, bigotry, etc. I can truthfully say that it is wonderful, the change that has taken place in the last few years. A few years ago, down in the South, a young man was afraid to admit that he was a Catholic, that is, in business circles. That day is gone. He can hold up his head now, and be proud to say he is a Catholic; in fact, I can notice the jealousy on the other side. I can see signs of them giving in. I have lived in a number of non-Catholic boarding-houses and can see the wonderful change at all times. I am convinced that Mississippi is so narrow-minded because the people know so little about the Catholic Church—all they know is slander.

AMERICA should have a grand circulation in this country and should be in every Catholic home, college, school, asylum, etc.

Plenty of Catholic papers distributed means a great mission in itself, and brings many converts and stray ones back in the Church.

A KNIGHT OF COLUMBUS.
(New Orleans Council).

BOYCOTT THE N. Y. TIMES.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The attitude of The New York Times toward the Faith is exceedingly offensive and anti-Catholic writers are continually taking advantage of its intolerance. No other paper in the city would permit the publication of letters signed "ex-Roman Catholic," obviously written by a bigot who never was a Catholic and of a letter stating that the bad ventilation in Catholic churches was the repeated cause of attacks of heart disease. It seems that these people will go to any extreme to satisfy their animosity. Saturday last the ridiculous statement that the Jesuits controlled the railroads and steamship lines of Northern Spain was proclaimed. Today we have the exceedingly offensive reference to the members of the Scow Trimmers' Association and the Host at the Cathedral, signed by the obviously again assumed name of "McCormick." Occasionally letters of retraction are published but the poison nevertheless has been spread. I have answered briefly one or two of these but have failed to see the letters printed.

We can perhaps understand the attitude of The Independent toward us, but why a daily paper of general circulation should give offense to an undoubtedly large number of its readers, is difficult to comprehend. The editor will, I am sure, plead as an excuse that he did not see through the letters, but a person with such a lack of intelligence should not hold a responsible position. Perhaps the owner, Adolph S. Ochs, is not aware of the situation, but apparently the man responsible values his position for I have failed as yet to see an offensive remark regarding the Jews published in The Times. The Knights of Columbus might well give attention to this and similar cases.

W. J. D., NEW YORK, OCTOBER 27.

RETREATS FOR WOMEN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

One would scarcely go to James Anthony Froude for an approbation of strictly ascetical Catholic practices; yet in his "Sea Studies" he actually compares the charm and isolation of a sea voyage to the peace and tranquillity of a temporary severance from the giddy bustle of the world. "We wake on ship-board with the certainty that we are beyond the reach of the postman. We are shut off as in a Catholic Retreat from the worries and anxieties of the world." Even Father Plater did not offer a more telling inducement in his plea for these retreats in the Hibbert Journal for October, 1908. H. G. Wells is another Englishman whom nobody accuses of hyperdulia for the Catholic Faith, or for her methods to perfect the spiritual life of her children, and yet in the occult socialism of his sect, he advocates the Samurai, a voluntary withdrawal from all contact with the world for at least seven mystical days of every year.

Nothing is more wholesome as a sign of Catholic progress than the popularity and prosperity of men's week-end Retreats. With the proposed House of Retreats for the exclusive use of Catholic men, success is sure. The Catholic woman has already several such houses. The nuns of the Cenacle have three Houses of the Retreat in the United States: St. Regis House, New York, founded in 1893, by Mother Grimaldi; the Convent of the Cenacle, Newport, R. I., begun in 1906; and the Charleston, S. C., Cenacle, opened in 1908 by Bishop Northrup at his special request. The Cenacle nuns are the only religious whose exclusive work is the giving of Retreats to the laity. Their convents are open at all times for private Retreats, and at stated intervals public Retreats under the guidance of skilful preachers and directors of souls are given. The Summer Retreats at the Newport Cenacle have been edifying and encouraging.

Thanks to these Houses of Retreat conducted by the Cenacle nuns, the shortening and simplifying of the exercises into a few days' compass, the nominal price for housing and feeding have placed the privilege of a Retreat within the power of even the humblest of our wage-earners. God grant that the days are not too distant when every one of our own well-conducted, opulent, devout city parishes will organize some plan for permitting a majority of its members to share in the immense spiritual advantages of the Cenacle Retreats.

E. L. VIRGIN,
Providence, R. I., Sept. 16, 1909.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I enclose to you herewith check for $30 to pay for subscriptions to as many people as are unable to pay for themselves, but who are in need of a Catholic paper in their homes, and whom you may know throughout the various provinces of your influence and information. AMERICA is to be sent to these subscribers by yourself.

The duty of supporting the Catholic press must be clear to all after the Holy Father's solemn charge to the bishops. Events and conditions to-day prove the urgent and growing necessity for the wide diffusion of truly Catholic ideas.

I have my own projects for the diocesan organ which needs all the influence and support I can give it, but I am acting under the principle for the general good implied in the Holy Father's command to us and in compliance with the great duty that nothing local impede the progress of the general good. In the light of this principle and my duty as I understand it, the success of the general good always brings abundant blessings on local endeavors.

WILLIAM H. O'CONNELL,
Archbishop of Boston.

Boston, October 25, 1909.

AMERICA seems to have made a fine impression in England and Ireland, judging from the many words of praise I heard, wishing it continued success.—Rev. W. McKean, Flemington, N. J.

CHRONICLE

The President in the South.—The noteworthy feature of these latter days of Mr. Taft's tour is the manner in which he took his audiences into his intimate confidence in the addresses made during his journey through the South. In Columbus, Miss., he congratulated the girl pupils of the Industrial School on the fact that they were learning to earn their living so that they may not feel compelled to marry whether they love or not. Declaring that he would be the last one "to take a position against the old doctrine of the common law that there ought to be nothing to interfere with matrimony," Mr. Taft affirmed that he would have the matter so arranged that women, when they come to decide should have a full and free choice, and not feel compelled to marry if they do not wish. He expressed himself, too, as glad that he shall not have any property to leave to his sons, but "only good character and a pride in themselves and a good education." This the President deemed the best legacy that can be left to a young man. The necessity of hard work is an advantage few appreciate when going through the process, but in later success it is realized to have been an advantage far outweighing that which inherited fortune might have given. In Alabama Mr. Taft told his hearers that he had come not to appeal for votes but for support of the present administration. "It is not that we want to make you Republicans, or that we want to become Democrats, but it is that we shall bring you, and that you shall come to believe that you are, as near to the heart of the central government as now administered, as any other people in the Union." There is no doubt that this statement, aided by the President's repeated declaration that he would not have the South give up one of her noble traditions, nor abate in any degree the pride she feels in those who represented her in the Civil War, has caused Mr. Taft's welcome in the South to be the most genuinely cordial he has received in any section of the country. In Birmingham, Ala., the President spoke of seven "growing and thriving" cities he had picked out during his journey across the continent and back—Birmingham, Atlanta, Pittsburg, Chicago, Minneapolis, Seattle and Los Angeles. "These," he said, "are types of a growing, prosperous and business development that one who swings around the country as I have done feels the greatest national pride in dwelling upon."—In his Macon speech Mr. Taft went a step farther in his confidence, and gave the public to understand his wish that it be recognized just where responsibility will lie if measures he recommends should fail. "As I intend to recommend a good many measures at the next meeting of Congress, I have taken this method of intimating to you where the responsibility will be if those measures do not pass." He affirmed that the President has not nearly the power the people think he has, because of the limitations and restrictions of the constitution to which he is subject. Nevertheless, Mr. Taft significantly added, "our forefathers builded well," and it is not for "the Executive himself to ignore the statutes and follow a law unto himself because it is supposed to be opposed to the law of higher morality." The President's welcome and entertainment in Savannah and Charleston were singularly enthusiastic.

Sunday and Monday were spent in Augusta, Ga., which he has come to regard as his Southern home, since his residence there last winter.

President Taft in New Orleans.—When the presidential party reached New Orleans, behind schedule time, October 31, the public procession was countermanded to allow the President to keep an appointment he had made previously to lunch with Archbishop Blenk. The other guests included Messrs. Dickinson, Hitchcock and Nagel of the cabinet; Governor Sanders, of Louisiana; Mayor Behrman, of New Orleans; Father Reaney, Chaplain of the Mississippi; Mr. Randsdell, the district congressman; General Behan, Postmaster, and Captain Butt, the President's aide. The archbishop in an informal talk paid tribute to the President's devotion to justice in handling difficult problems in Porto Rico and elsewhere. The party, accompanied by Rev. P. J. Kennedy, S.J., motored to the Jesuit College, where they were received by the Rector, Rev. E. Mattern, S.J., and faculty, and for each Mr. Taft had a word of greeting. Over 1,000 students and alumni, assembled in the college court, greeted the President with the college yell when he appeared. He said: "My boys, I am very glad to greet you. I have visited institutions of learning conducted by the Jesuit Fathers in other cities, and one while I was acting in a governmental capacity 10,000 miles from here. If the educational training is as thorough here, which I doubt not, as it was in the others, I am sure you are in the right place." Having attended the Waterways Convention and several public functions, Mr. Taft left the following farewell message: "Tell the good people of your delightful city that I carry away with me the memory of the most pleasant, instructive and noteworthy trip since I have been President, and I look forward to a return to New Orleans in the future and then I shall have Mrs. Taft to share your hospitality with me." Speaking of his entire trip through the South, Mr. Taft said he had been "charmed with the friendliness and hospitality of the people," but made special mention of the "heartfelt greetings of New Orleans," and "the tolerant and broad freedom of Louisiana which might well be imitated by other States."

The Waterways Convention.—President Taft, four members of his cabinet, 23 Governors of States, over 100 Congressmen and 5000 delegates from 36 States and Territories attended the New Orleans Convention in the interest of waterway development and particularly the deepening of the Mississippi to not less than fourteen feet from the Lakes to the Gulf. A committee of 500 delegates was appointed to go to Washington and press upon Congress the enactment of the following resolution: "We the delegates in this convention assembled, representing more than half the people and three-fourths of the productive energy of the United States. . . . demand and direct that a definite policy of waterway improvement beginning with the Lakes-to-the-Gulf Deep Waterway, be adopted and put in operation by the national government without delay." The delegates, moreover, after the manner of the Declaration of Independence, pledged their "personal honor" to support no candidate for public office who will not indorse their policy. Mr. Barrett of the Bureau of American Republics thought the scheme was imperative in order to secure the full benefit of the Panama Canal; President Taft and Speaker Cannon would go slow because of engineering and other difficulties, and Secretary of War Dickinson was not sure that the present traffic on the river justified the great expense. He was told that it was justified by the absence of traffic owing to insufficient depth, and that his argument would also condemn the Panama Canal. The Convention adjourned indefinitely November 2, after three days' session.

Events at Home.—Sitting in Guthrie, Oklahoma, United States District Judge Cotterall reaffirmed his decision that State officials cannot interfere with inter-state commerce shipments, thus restraining the State enforcement officers from selling shipments of liquor before they have been delivered to the consignees.—An unfortunate accident marred the trial run of the latest addition to the country's battleships. As the North Dakota, the greatest Dreadnought of the world, was completing her four-hour endurance run off the New England coast a seven-inch tube burst in her boiler room and sixteen men were scalded four being seriously injured. Despite the mishap the big battleship exceeded her contract requirement of 21 knots an hour.—In Washington Secretary of State Knox gave official welcome to the Japanese delegation now touring the country to study industrial and commercial problems. He spoke of the friendship existing between the two nations, praised the spirit and work of the Japanese people, and extended his sympathy in the death of Prince Ito, recently assassinated in Corea.

The Gompers Verdict.—The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia gave the right to boycott a serious blow when it affirmed the decree of the Supreme Court of the District declaring Samuel Gompers, John Mitchell and Frank Morrison, respectively president, vice-president and secretary of the American Federation of Labor guilty of contempt of court in the Bucks Stove and Range case. As will be remembered the company began its prosecution of the three labor officials in August, 1907. The occasion was the introduction of non-union labor into the Bucks Company's shops after a strike had been called by certain iron-workers, apparently in contravention of an agreement in existence for fourteen years. The American Federation of Labor ordered the inclusion of the Bucks Company in the "We don't patronize" column of one of its journals. The original action was a test case to enjoin the "We don't patronize" lists in the Federation's fight against firms and individuals. A temporary injunction, afterwards made permanent, was issued by Justice Gould of the District of Columbia, forbidding the mention of the Bucks Company in such lists. Following its issuance President Gompers affirmed, in an editorial published in the Federationist, his intention not to obey the court's order, claiming that it was an abuse of the power of the courts and an interference with the rights of organized labor. Because of this editorial Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison, as executive heads of the Federation were held for contempt, and in December, 1908, Justice Wright of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia sentenced them to jail. The Federation officials appealed, and the Court of Appeals affirmed the sentence, two justices rejecting the appeal, the Chief-Justice dissenting. It is said that further appeal will be made to the United States Supreme Court.

The Cook-Peary Controversy.—Following the report of its subcommittee of scientists who had examined Commander Peary's records and proofs and found them to be corroborative of his claims that he had reached the pole, the board of managers of the National Geographical Society accepted unanimously the finding and voted a special gold medal for Commander Robert F. Peary as discoverer of the North Pole. From another resolution passed at the society's meeting in Washington referring the question whether or not any explorer reached the pole prior to 1909 to a sub-committee with authority to make full investigation, it is clear that the society proposes as soon as possible to pass upon the records of Dr. Frederick A. Cook. Meantime the Consistory of the Copenhagen University has refused to accede to the request of the Geographical Society in Washington to be present at the official investigation of Dr. Cook's papers in Copenhagen except at Dr. Cook's desire and upon his personal request. A correspondent to the New York Times claims that although the Danes continue to profess confidence in Dr. Cook, it is evident that they are growing uneasy, particularly since Dr. Cook's unsatisfactory reply to Prof. Torp's query as to when his observations would be ready for inspection has been received. Fearing that compliance with the request would constitute official recognition of Commander Peary as against Dr. Cook in the North Pole controversy, the State Department declined to cable American Minister Egan at Copenhagen to ask of the university of that city permission to examine the records of Dr. Cook when they are submitted to that institution. The request was made by a delegation from the National Geographic Society.

Mgr. Sbarretti's Generosity.—Before returning to their homes the Fathers of the First Plenary Council of Canada presented to their president, the Apostolic Delegate, a purse of one thousand dollars. Mgr. Sbarretti immediately handed over this sum to Mgr. Langevin, the Archbishop of St. Boniface, for the Ruthenian missions. The question of supplying the spiritual needs of one hundred thousand Catholic Ruthenians in the Canadian Northwest is a vital issue for the Catholics of that region and was taken up very earnestly and practically by the Council. It is understood that the Canadian bishops have pledged themselves to contribute ten thousand dollars a year for ten years, 1910-1920, for this purpose. Hence this generous donation from the Apostolic Delegate was most opportune.

Archbishop Begin's Anniversary.—Just four days before the close of the Canadian Plenary Council, the first Vice-President thereof, the Most Rev. L. N. Bégin, Archbishop of Quebec, received from all parts of the world messages of congratulation on the twenty-first anniversary of his consecration. The members of the Council joined very heartily in offering to his Grace their homage and gratitude for all that had been done to make their stay pleasant in the metropolitan city of Quebec.

A Canadian Bishop Stricken.—The Right Rev. A. A. Blais, Bishop of Rimouski, one of the ablest and saintliest members of the Canadian hierarchy, was stricken with partial paralysis on the 2d inst., the day after the solemn closing of the Plenary Council. The paralysis was preceded by cerebral hemorrhage. Mgr. Blais was taken to the Hotel Dieu, Quebec, where the physicians say there are fair hopes of recovery after a few weeks' rest. He is in the sixty-eighth year of his age and the twentieth of his episcopate.

Great Britain.—Mr. Wise, of the Protestant Reform Church, Liverpool, whose Bible Class Parades, directed against Catholics, have been causing much trouble, having refused to promise to abstain from them, was sent to prison for four months for inciting to riot. A procession of Protestant and Orange associations said to have numbered 60,000 men escorted him to the prison. A parade was held next day near his church, to the great annoyance of Catholics. The police were in attendance. On approaching the church they were attacked with stones. Two Catholic women were arrested for fighting. The Protestant Alliance has petitioned the Home Secretary to pardon Mr. Wise. A bill empowering the Commission appointed to inquire into the religious disturbances in Liverpool, to take testimony under oath, has been brought into Parliament.—Despite the assurance of Unionist leaders to the contrary, Mr. Ure, Lord Advocate for Scotland, has been asserting in public meetings that if a Unionist government comes in it will abolish the old age pensions. Mr. Balfour thought it necessary to denounce the assertion as a "frigid and calculated lie." Mr. Ure attempted to explain the matter away both on the platform and in the House. Amidst great disturbance in the latter place Mr. Balfour refused to withdraw the charge.—The Budget passed the Commons on Thursday by 379 to 149. It seems certain that the House of Lords will directly or indirectly reject it and that a general election is close at hand.—Encouraged by the Bermondsey election to believe that a very large part of the working classes are with them, the Unionists are bringing out Labor-Unionist candidates to do away with the idea that a workingman has no political chance except with extreme Radicals or Socialists.—The women of the Female Suffrage Party seem to have beaten the government. Five of them, imprisoned for rioting during Mr. Churchill's meeting at Dundee, undertook the hunger-strike. No attempt was made to force food upon them, and after four days, having reduced themselves to extreme weakness, they were set free by order of the Secretary for Scotland.

Irish Notes.—The Land Bill which the Lords returned to the Commons was practically worthless, being loaded with hampering and nullifying clauses. Mr. Birrell moved the rejection of the amendments en bloc and the return of the bill as originally passed. The motion was carried by 229 to 56. It is thought that the Lords will now pass the bill with what slight modifications Mr. Birrell may concede. The machinery of the bill is needed by the Irish landlords who have sold their lands but have not been paid by the treasury. For the sake of the provisions facilitating payment, they will hesitate to kill the measure in spite of the compulsory clause and other features that favor the tenants.—The abstention of Irish members from the final vote on the Finance Bill was due to the fact that while they consider its general bearings satisfactory, the licensing clauses discriminate against Ireland. Mr. Healy, believing that the land and death duties were equally injurious tried to induce the party to vote against the Government.—The Royal University ended October 29 to make way for the new and more comprehensive institution, which has taken over the Catholic University buildings, and the Jesuits have opened their university schools elsewhere. "Chanel," writing in the Leader, pays a high tribute to the efficiency of University College and such educationists as Fathers Delany, Finlay, Brown and Darlington who, taking it over when it was moribund, made it the most brilliant school in Ireland, and trained the men who will now control the National University.

Germany.—The success attained by the Socialists in the municipal elections in Berlin marks a notable detail in the recent unlooked-for victorious advance of that party in city and district elections. The significance grows on one not so much from a comparison of the seats won—they captured fourteen of the sixteen contested seats, as against eleven seats won at the last election—as from a comparison of the total votes. In the present election they polled 44,100 votes, a gain of 17,200, whilst the united poll of all their opponents fell off 8,000 votes.—Late tidings from Berlin go to show that there is a possibility of an Anglo-German undertaking. The failure to arrive at such an understanding at the late meeting between King Edward and Emperor William is charged to the method adopted by Under Secretary of the British Foreign office in charge of the negotiation. The plan is under consideration to have Germany make new proposals. It is felt that something must be done to silence the mischievous agitation regarding the naval preparations being made in the two countries.—The dirigible balloon manoeuvres in the neighborhood of Cologne were brought to a spectacular close when representative balloons of the Zeppelin and other systems which had taken part in the exercises formed in line and sailed, circling in splendid order over the great Cathedral of the city. The success of the final manoeuvre, say the newspapers, made an indescribable impression on the hosts of on-lookers below.—German officials in Bremen harbor, are extending hospitable welcome to a commissioner from Chile, headed by Admiral Pirez, sent to Germany by the home government to make a thorough study of modern methods in shipbuilding and harbor and dockage construction.

More Persecution in France.—Arthur Loth, the veteran Catholic writer, sketches, in a leading article of the Univers of October 28, the new plans of the French parliamentary bloc against Catholic education. Since the reopening of parliament the chief question is the resumption of anti-clerical projects. Fresh blows are to be struck at the bishops and the clergy; there is talk of abolishing freedom in education, of establishing a State monopoly of schools, so as to impose atheism upon all the younger generation and to ruin for ever Catholic Faith among the people. This question will take precedence of all social and financial reforms. The French public are once more to be hoodwinked into believing that the most urgent of all measures is that which will destroy, once for all, clerical education. They will be told that clericalism is always the great danger for the Republic, and that, as clericalism is rooted in the school, the clerical school must be made impossible. There must be no longer any schools where pupils are taught to fear and serve God, to observe His commandments and so to live on earth as to be able one day to enter heaven. "Such is the plan of the 'bloc,'" writes M. Loth. "Alarming though it is, it ought still more to stimulate us. It is our last stand, the fight for freedom in education. This requires a supreme and unanimous effort. Let us prepare for it in view of the forthcoming elections."

Venezuela.—President Gómez has frustrated a well planned scheme to reinstate Cipriano Castro in the presidential chair. The plot was revealed to the authorities by an official whose support the conspirators tried to win by bribery. The administration of President Gómez has been signalized by the liberation of many prisoners who had been jailed by Castro for political or personal reasons and for much needed reform in government finances. The Archbishop of Carácas has memorialized the President for a mitigation of certain harsh laws bearing on baptism, marriage, and other Church matters.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Socialism and the American Federation of Labor

At a time when so many of the labor unions of our country have already endorsed the program of Socialism; when local unions have not merely extended their sympathy but often even their financial aid towards the support of the Socialist cause; when nearly all the union magazines and papers, contrary to their former exclusiveness, will freely admit into their columns the incendiary articles of Socialist agitators; and finally, when not merely local unions but entire state federations like those of Wisconsin, Iowa, Colorado, Minnesota, have openly declared for the great Socialist tenet of "collective ownership and operation of the means of production and distribution," it will be well to consider what the attitude of the vast national organization of labor is likely to be on the Socialist issue of our day. Here, certainly, is a subject of vital interest to us as Catholics. Ours is above all the Church of the workingman, and to judge by the number of her adherents who belong to the trade-unions of our country, we may call it likewise the Church of the union laborer. It will be well, therefore, to cast a few search-light flashes on the situation of our national Federation, and reveal, though but in momentary glimpses, the Socialist activity within the labor camp.

We begin with a quotation from the International Social Review for July, 1900. The article is written by Max Hayes, who was mentioned in a preceding number of AMERICA, and who is the foremost Socialist authority upon the Labor Question. After maintaining that, in the convention of the December preceding, the American Federation of Labor had practically placed itself in a position to endorse the collective ownership of the means of production, the open door to Socialism, the author continues: "The writer is firmly of opinion that the Federation and many national unions would have declared in favor of Socialism some years ago if certain fanatical leaders, so called, had not kept up a running fire against trade unions, and made loud boasts and bluffs of disrupting the 'pure and simple' organization. Ten years ago one 'leader' made the ridiculous assertion in the convention in the same city that 'we will cram Socialism down your throats!' That ill-advised and nonsensical threat has proven costly . . . had there been some little diplomacy used, had an honest and persistent and tolerant effort been made to educate the workers, the American labor movement would now undoubtedly be abreast of the European movement."

The author is hinting, in the last lines, at the taunt cast by European Socialists at their comrades in England and in the United States. Throughout many parts of Europe, we are told, the labor movement is practically identical with Socialism. To explain, therefore, the sad contrast which our own country affords in comparison with the progressiveness of Russian, French or German unionism, is the constant effort of the Socialist propagandists. American laborers, they assure us, are still so uneducated in the great revolutionary truths, American unions so hopelessly effete, American Federation of Labor officials possessed of such "mildewed and moss-covered ideas," that nothing better could hitherto have been expected. Give our Socialists but the time, have patience for a little while, and they will soon teach our workers to know "red" when they see it.

The twentieth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor again proved a disappointment to the sanguine hopes of the Socialists; yet various resolutions were proposed by them, and they could rest satisfied that they had left no efforts untried. Like the giant in the fable, they were ever gaining new strength by each fall, for they were learning to know their mistakes and to correct them. So at each successive annual convention Socialist delegates were much in evidence, ever on the firing line, ever proposing resolutions tending towards collective ownership in the means of production. Finally, when in 1905 this Socialist resolution was put to the vote before the American Federation of Labor convention, it was accepted by representatives of about 214,000 members, while the opposition represented a membership of 1,128,000. This would indicate that even at that period one-fifth of the trade unionists were Socialists, at least in their tenets; whence it has been pointed out that Socialism has made much more headway among trade unions than elsewhere, since the vote at the national election is far from showing any such proportion in their favor.

Here, however, we must bear two things in mind. The first is that men may be strongly infected with Socialistic doctrines, and yet cast their traditional Democratic or Republican vote. The second is that Socialists at the present are little concerned with their political preponderance. Their whole effort, to put it in their own words, is to "educate" the workingman, to beget in him by slow degrees "an intelligent discontent," to make him "class-conscious," class-militant, prepared for the great class-struggle which it is their whole effort to precipitate—in brief, to make of him a revolutionist, their own pet expression. Bloody or not, a revolution in the present order must come about. Let this idea once be firmly grasped by the intelligence of the laborer and all else will take care of itself—witness France, Germany, Russia, Italy, the late manifestations in Spain, where the red banner of Socialism is riding over every scene of mob rule and turbulence. It is not the number, but the trained leadership of these men that is to be reckoned with. Given a thousand idle hands, and one Socialist can find work for all. Nothing, it is true, does the Socialist resent more than to be confused with the Anarchist. Yet have we not in these very days often enough seen them shoulder to shoulder and jowl to jowl, shouting the same bloody Marseillaise of the new Revolution? Is not the French Commune the Socialist's ambition by day and his dream by night, which he hopes may be realized once more, not in one country only, but over all the earth?

Another consideration of great importance is the fact that unionists will naturally feel inclined to accept "an industrial system in which the entire economic output will be shared among the workers." It seems so feasible in theory. The silver lining of the dark cloud of Socialism can alone be seen at first by those who view it at a distance. The confusion of right and wrong which is in a moment to enwrap them, the darkness of immorality and irreligion which is soon to obliterate the brightness of the day, the fearful aftermath that is finally to follow, here and hereafter, are never thought of. We need not wonder, then, that Socialism has already made great and terrible inroads, and has strongly entrenched itself in the unionism of the West. We need not wonder that it was able, even four years ago, to win over to its side one-fifth of the American Federation itself. Since then it has not been idle, and we may see it put forth still greater strength in years to come.

What, then, in fine, is its present attitude towards the American Federation of Labor? Socialism, as such, has no affiliation with it. Socialism is in direct opposition to all its methods and principles as thus far enunciated and put in practice. Socialism has not one word of approval or sympathy for the men who represent it now or have been its leaders in the past. To give the entire situation in a Socialist phrasing, the American Federation of Labor has been conservative; Socialism is ever revolutionary or else ceases to be at all. What, then, have Socialists to do with the American Federation? As a Federation, it is nothing to them. As representing a vast numerical strength of workers, it is everything to them. Here they find the material to work upon. Daniel Lynch had said almost a decade ago, referring to labor unions: "What is there outside that we can hope for? Nothing. Trade unionism may be so far behind as to make us despair sometimes, but it does represent all that is best in the working class . . . The methods and procedure of trade unionism are old fashioned and will be impotent in the gigantic conflict between the forces of reactionism and the forces of progress that must be fought to a finish ere the first quarter of the new century passes away. No force can hope to cope with entrenched capitalism and destroy it root and branch, except the mighty force of Socialism organized along class lines, having for its aim the glorious commonwealth of the future." Only here, the laborer is told, can "the grand idea of peace and harmony and fraternity be realized on earth."

For Socialism, therefore, to affiliate itself with Trade unionism would be to put itself upon the scrap-heap, as the editor of the International Socialist Review tells us in the April number of the present year. "What we need to do for the present," he continues, "is, so far as we are able, to make intelligent revolutionists out of our members and all other working people, organized or unorganized, whom we can reach."

There has been great confusion in American Federation of Labor circles, and of course the poor maligned Socialists have had no part in it. To quote a Socialist organ on the subject: "When Sam Gompers went to Europe to inform the foreigners that we are the greatest thing that ever happened . . . he appears to have instructed Morrison and the office cat to run the Federation headquarters at their own sweet will." First came the difficulty of the flint-glass workers. When this had been satisfactorily settled the electric workers' controversy arose. "The consequence is that the local labor movements throughout the country have been thrown into a turmoil. A number of state federations and many city central bodies have defied the ultimatum (i. e., to expel those who refused to acknowledge the McNulty régime, approved by the American Federation of Labor, as against the Reidites, representing the outlawed officials acknowledged by the Socialists), and had their charters revoked; and the revolt is spreading all over the land. The feeling against the American Federation of Labor cabinet is becoming intense and it is likely that this ruling will precipitate a bitter contest at Toledo." It is a congenial situation in which Socialists will find themselves at home.

We have no wish to champion or oppose the American Federation of Labor in these articles, but are merely advancing a few facts relative to the present situation. We deeply regret to see that the Ferrer Resolution, drawn up by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, is but another weak concession to mob demands, another voice in the fanatic hue and cry that is making the rounds of the earth. Even the Socialist press can find it in its conscience—so delicate in Federation matters—fully to approve of this document. It is reprinted in its entirety in the Socialist daily of New York under the significant heading: "American Federation of Labor Falls Into Line."

Trade-Marks in Latin America

In our Southern sister republics, as well as in most other foreign countries, the United States manufacturer introducing a proprietary article will find a theory and practice radically different from our own as regards the registration of his trade-mark. In this country, of course, a trade-mark is the property of its producer. The word or design is held to acquire a real value through use and exploitation, and this value accrues to the person who has produced it and made it known by the expenditure of his efforts and his capital. The peculiar nature of a trade-mark renders it especially liable to be unjustly appropriated or imitated, and these offenses are difficult to prevent and punish under ordinary property laws, owing to its somewhat intangible and indefinite value, although it certainly represents a real asset and sometimes one of very great worth. Hence we have the United States Patent Office, in which the owner may register his trade-mark, thereby obtaining special protection. The Patent Office, however, has no control of the ownership. The mark belongs to the producer by virtue of use and exploitation, and the Government can no more justly take it from him without cause than it could his factory. Registration, then, merely gives to the owner the protection of a law especially directed against imitators and infringers. Under this theory the registration of a trade-mark by one not the owner or the lawful successor to his rights, is ipso facto void.

In most Latin-American countries the theory is essentially different. There the right to grant a trade-mark is vested in the State, as is the case with a public service franchise in this country. Before registration a trademark does not legally exist and cannot, therefore, be the subject of a property right. A specified fee is fixed, on payment of which anyone may register any trade-mark, usually for any number of articles, provided only that it has not previously been registered in the country and does not infringe upon one which has. Publication in an official Bulletin is generally required, to allow opposition by any who may regard it as an infringement. Registration of a foreign mark in the country of its origin is not recognized. The stand is taken that the foreign manufacturer is defrauding the Government of the amount of the registration fee if he has not registered his mark, and is, therefore, not entitled to protection, doing business at his own risk. The consequences, from our manufacturers' point of view, are disastrous. If he makes an article of international reputation, he may find his mark registered in several countries by speculators, agents, and even by competitors, if he has neglected that important requisite himself at the beginning; and he is generally entirely without legal redress.

Among South American countries the Argentine Republic is now the trade-mark pirates' principal field, this iniquitous business having grown to be a national disgrace. This is due simply to the fact that her importation is immensely larger than that of the other Latin republics. Moreover, her laws protecting the proprietor of a duly registered mark are full and severe, thoroughly safeguarding either the owner or the successful pirate as the case may be.

In Chile, registration gives little protection, for the laws against infringement and imitation are very lax. Notable exceptions are the smaller states of Ecuador and Uruguay, which have passed admirable laws, preventing the valid registration of a trade-mark by any but the actual owner. An International Pan-American Congress has been arranged to take place in Buenos Aires next spring, which, it is hoped, will not adjourn without taking steps to remedy effectually a condition so deplorable and discreditable to every American.

C. LOUIS COFFIN.

Causes of Depression of Ireland's Finances

During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the greater part of the total receipts of the Irish Government was the hereditary revenue of the English Crown and out of the control of the Irish Parliament. Under the reign of Anne it obtained some control over Irish finances but continued to pay the heavy charges of Crown and establishment with additional and ever-increasing annuities to the King.

The Irish Revenue was practically leased out as one would lease a piece of property, and those who leased it made enormous profits taxing the people heavily while they paid nothing into the Treasury but the yearly sums stipulated. The Revolution demoralized the country, but when Ireland recovered from the war her industries flourished and her revenue increased. The customs and excises yielded £458,158 in 1700, but the Irish Government found itself constantly in financial difficulties because of the actual inability of the country to pay the enormous expenses which were laid upon it. Archbishop King says: "Great arrears are due to the Establishment, about £300,000, and new funds are expected but where they will be got, God knows, except we fleece the people and sell their skins."

By grinding the people and exercising the strictest economy, the debt was paid off in 1754; but Ireland was not long free from debt, for her revenues were not equal to the demands made by England to cover the expenses of the Seven Years' War. At the Peace of Paris, the Irish debt was £520,000 and it continued to increase until in 1753 it had amounted to £1,750,000, because the Irish revenue remained at a standstill while that of England was increasing enormously, and Irish moneys were largely expended for abuses such as pensions to the king's favorites, which degraded the country and perverted the morals of those in authority. Under an English Act of Parliament Ireland was paying £12,000 a year to staff officers, while England was only paying £11,000. In times of peace England kept about 14,000 men while Ireland had to keep 12,000, three times its right proportion. The English king granted pensions aggregating £16,000 which he made a permanent charge on Ireland in 1701, and the pensions on the Civil List, exclusive of the French, amounted to nearly £25,000 between 1700 and 1720. Mr. Addison, for example, held an office not worth £10 a year to the people at a salary of £500, which he sold later to a party living in England, thus making it a permanent charge on the Irish Establishment. Between 1760 and 1775 the Civil Establishment had increased from £54,000 to £85,000, George III scattering pensions right and left among his favorites in England, Germany and Denmark, which were taxed on the Irish Government; and all the offices which carried substantial salaries in the Church, Army or Civil Establishment went to Englishmen who scarcely ever set foot in Ireland.

Swift writes: "Lord Berkeley was Master of the Rolls, Lord Palmerston, First Remembrancer, with a salary of £2,000; Doddington was Clerk of the Pells with £2,500; Lord Burlington, Hereditary High Treasurer with £10,000, while Mr. Arden received a salary of £9,000, as Under Treasurer, and not one of these people ever came to Ireland or rendered any service whatever for the moneys which they received." Archbishop King adds: "For the year 1766 there had been £17,000 per annum given to English Gentlemen and not £500 to Irish Gentlemen." Even in the Church, that is the Protestant Church in Ireland, matters were no better, for the Lord Primate was an Englishman and the most lucrative sees were given to Englishmen, as a matter of course; we find that out of eighteen Archbishops of Dublin and Cashel ten were Englishmen.

Business methods seem to have been unknown in the administration of affairs. In 1778 it cost Ireland 17½ per cent. to collect the revenue and England but 7½ per cent., and this state of things continued down to 1783, when Flood and Grattan tried to force reform. Grattan fought with all his earnestness and finally forced a bill through Parliament excluding from seats in the House officers, placemen and pensioners. The Place Bill passed but it did not have the effect intended, because the members were not elected by popular vote, and the great majority of the boroughs were controlled by the ministry. Hence, the Government could change members and House without dissolving Parliament. The war with France begun in 1793 changed the financial condition at once. A bill was passed raising the military from 15,000 to 23,000 men and enrolling a militia force of 16,000 for four years. Though Ireland became prosperous and manufactures sprang up giving birth to a new life, the expenses of the war and of a large standing army began to tell heavily on the resources of the country, and the financial difficulties which his policy had created, were seized upon by Lord Castlereagh to force the Act of Union. Much of the deficit was spent in bribes to members of the Irish Parliament for voting in favor of the Union. Eighty boroughs returning 160 members cost £260,000. Even the votes controlled by the Church of England were purchased.

Under the Act of Union each country was to defray the interest for the reduction of its own National Debt prior to the Union; and for twenty years thereafter the expenses of the United Kingdom in peace or war, were to be as 15 to 2; that is, Great Britain was to pay 15/17 or 88.24 per cent. and Ireland 2/17, or 11.76 per cent. of the whole expenditure, and at the end of twenty years, unless Parliament had decided otherwise, both countries were to be indiscriminately taxed, the respective proportions to be adjusted according to the resources. The Irish revenues were to constitute a fund for the payment of Ireland's debt before the Union, and her share of the joint expenditure. The taxes in each country were to be raised on such commodities as Parliament might think fit, but no article in Ireland was to be taxed at a heavier rate than in England. If, however, Ireland had defrayed the charge for her Pre-Union Debt and proportionate expenditure, her surplus revenue was to be disposed of in remission of taxes for local purposes and incidental deficiencies. All debt incurred by Parliament for the United Kingdom was to be borne by the two countries pro rata.

These financial provisions were unfavorable to Ireland and, commercially speaking, she had all to lose and nothing to gain from the Union. Numerous kinds of Irish manufactures were affected by the section of the Commercial agreement forbidding import duties higher than 10 per cent. ad valorem. The Act of Union shows no preference to linens or other Irish goods over foreign. Even the opening of the British markets to Ireland was of little benefit, because for nearly all their commodities Great Britain had an import tax.

During the first twenty years subsequent to the Act of Union the British National Debt about doubled while Ireland's quadrupled, jumping from about thirty-two and one-half million pounds to nearly one hundred and thirteen million pounds, while the English debt increased from about four hundred and eighty millions to seven hundred and thirty millions. In 1812 the entire revenue raised in Ireland amounted to about £6,000,000. At this time a committee appointed by the House of Commons reported that Ireland's contribution should be two to twelve and one-half or a larger proportion for Ireland than she was paying, but they also recommended that the debts and expenditures of the two countries should be consolidated.

British Imperial Taxation in 1850 had dropped 70 per cent. while Ireland's remained stationary, and the great fiscal reforms of the early nineteenth century brought her little benefit.

As soon as the Corn Laws were repealed prosperity came to England, but Ireland, having passed through the awful famine, rapidly declined. Wheat growing fell away and Ireland's industries were killed in competition with England. The new system which was begun by Mr. Gladstone when Chancellor of the Exchequer, recommended the extension of the Income Tax to Ireland, arguing that it could not hurt the country as it would fall only on the richer classes. As a set-off to this he cancelled the Irish debt, called the Consolidated Annuities, that had been incurred for poor relief during the famine, which was equivalent to about £240,000 per year, but the new income tax in Ireland yielded nearly £500,000 the first year. In 1842 when five and one-half million pounds had been imposed on Great Britain by reason of the Income Tax there was granted a relief of twelve millions by the removal of the Corn Duties and other taxes while Ireland's compensations were negligible in comparison. The Consolidated Annuities would have been paid off in a short time, that is in a certain number of years, while the income tax is a permanent form of taxation, and while the additional moneys received from the income tax enabled Mr. Gladstone to carry out many reforms which advanced English industries, they were of little benefit to Ireland because most of her people were agricultural.

Mr. Gladstone's next step was to assimilate the spirit duties in Ireland and England; and thus between 1853 and 1860 Ireland's taxes were increased by two and one-fourth million pounds per annum, while in Great Britain there was a decrease. The total net Irish taxation increased to nine millions in 1904, one-eighth of Great Britain's.

The vital question to-day with Irish finance is the decline of population. The revenues have not increased since 1860; and when an increase was made in taxation, there was a corresponding decrease in population. The striking feature of the whole question is the heavy expenses of the Irish Establishment compared with the English. Continued increase is partly due to the fact that the country is garrisoned always with British troops and the expense charged up against the Irish revenue, while the Royal Irish Constabulary is in reality a standing army and the most expensive in the world. Ireland has one policeman for every 257 persons while Scotland has but one per thousand, and at one-third the cost per head.

There were some committees appointed, by the House of Commons, to consider Irish finances, but the question was never dealt with either frankly or intelligently. The Committee of 1896, however, reported that the taxable capacity of Ireland to that of Great Britain should be as 1 to 20; but recent figures show that Ireland is really bearing 1/12 part of the expenditure of the United Kingdom, while according to her taxable capacity it should only be 1/21, leaving the conclusion that she is over taxed 2¾ million pounds per annum.

France of To-Day

On the morrow of the Franco-German war the Republican régime was established in France only as a sort of compromise between the groups that met together in the National Assembly. Had the Bourbons been less honest or the Orleanists bolder the Monarchical Restoration which miscarried in 1871 would have been realized in 1874. Indeed, the Republic had been accepted merely as an expedient, a provisional political experiment, "presided" over by a Royalist, Marshal Mac Mahon.

Since that period the French Republic has gone through terrible crises: the Boulangist Movement, the Panama Affair, the Dreyfus Affair, and quite recently the revolt of Catholic consciences. And yet, the Republican régime has lasted for almost forty years. Will it last much longer?

This régime, as we know, originated with the Revolution of 1789, itself derived from the Encyclopedists of the eighteenth century and especially from Rousseau. The latter, in his Contrat Social, presents a political conception according to which Society and State are merely expressions of the general will to which men, previously equal and free, submit their individual will. In so doing they remain free, since they have freely chosen and accepted the authority of the State. But in reality, the State becomes an absolute sovereign with the right to intervene in every detail, to subject to its yoke every conscience. It is the State-King which tends to become the State-God. Every voluntary organization, in the family, in the provinces, must bow down in the dust before it. It centralizes because it is itself the centre of all things. It can tolerate no rival power, it stands out against whatever might create between individuals the spiritual bond of a faith or an idea.

But, strong as it is, having within it all the substance of the Nation, powerfully centralized as it may be, the State thus conceived lacks real stability. While supposed to be the expression of the general will, it is, in truth, but the reflex of opinion and, like it, uncertain and changeable. The "general will," the sovereignty of the people—these are abstractions. Concrete reality shows us stronger groupings, led by more attractive or more energetic individuals, majorities, in short, which incarnate the State, take its place and reign in its name. And thus it is that a party, a political sect, may come to absorb the State. This is what is actually taking place in France where the Radical party has, in a way, taken charge of the Republic and become master of the Government.

The very definition of the word itself shows that a party is not unanimity of opinion, and if a régime is concentrated in one party it exposes itself to fall with it when the party is no longer sufficiently powerful. Now, in the France of to-day, a number of thinkers consider this downfall not only desirable but also possible and imminent.

These opposition forces may be divided into two groups: first, those who reproach the present Republic with not being a complete Revolution, with having lagged behind, with not having fully realized the principle of popular sovereignty. We rank among the Opposition the Nationalist Republicans, the Plebiscitists, and lastly the Bonapartists. As to the other adversaries of the Republic their reproach is not that it fails to be a complete Revolution, but on the contrary, that it contains in itself and extols the most dangerous principles of the Revolution.

The first group will advocate Force; the second, Authority and Tradition. Among all these Opposition parties chance alliances are possible and have in fact existed in the course of the history of these last years. Thus it is that we have seen, during the Dreyfus Affair, the Republican patriots, the partisans of the Bonapartes, and the Royalists, form a coalition against the governmental "Bloc." The same thing happened at the time of the separation of Church and State, when the latter attempted to bring its full weight to bear on Catholic consciences. But in spite of this accidental fellowship these two kinds of opposition are too clearly at variance in their principles and action not to require special consideration of each case.

The partisans of the sovereignty of the people, whether they call themselves Nationalists, Plebiscitists or Bonapartists, look upon the present régime as an incomplete and artificial expression of the wishes of the democracy. They aspire to a government whose chief, president or emperor, would be the immediate choice of the entire nation. In this conception, the function of Parliament would be reduced to very little, whilst in the present régime it is predominant. In fact, we know that at the present time in France the chief of the Executive Power is appointed by the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate assembled in Congress. Thus he is but indirectly chosen by the nation. As a rule it is understood among the members of both houses that they will appoint a man honorably known but whose personality, or rather lack of personality, disturbs no one. They think to remove the danger of dictatorship by choosing a man to whom the ambition to act for his own private interests is forbidden. The Plebiscitary Republicans cannot become resigned to this impersonal régime, lacking both in authority and prestige, and in which the President plays only the part of an honorary Chief of State who is not obliged to act or even to think.

M. Déroulède is the principal leader of this faction. Personally he is a perfectly honest man and a sincere patriot, but an extremist, whose generous feelings combined with lack of poise have caused him to be compared more than once to a kind of Don Quixote who has strayed into our epoch. The optimistic faith in democracy, which such a doctrine implies, alienates the sober-minded who have learnt, on the contrary, to mistrust this blind Force called Demos. It is too evident that such a régime would mean the organization of disorders and anarchy. Whenever a dictator died, or whenever a dictator ceased to please, there would be another upheaval throughout the country, and for fomenters of riots an ever present opportunity. It would be a permanent pronunciamiento, the volcanic policy of certain small South American Republics.

Besides, the powerlessness of the Plebiscitary policy was sufficiently proven twenty years ago by the checking of the Boulangist movement. General Boulanger, upheld by this very M. Déroulède and his friends, had hoped to establish, for his own advantage, a Plebiscitary dictatorship. Now, this man who had been so near success revealed himself to be incapable and ordinary, not even able to make the most of an immense popularity. This shows how little to be trusted are the inspirations of democracy. What constitutes the fundamental weakness of such a doctrine is the absence of a leading idea. It rests only upon obscure sentiments and instincts. It is at once the survival of the Jacobin principle of popular infallibility and the sentimental prolongation of the Napoleonic legend.

As to the Bonapartist Party, which we have placed in the same category as the preceding, it is also derived from revolutionary ideas. Indeed, what is characteristic in this doctrine is the glorifying of an individual for his personal qualities and in virtue of the prestige he exercises over the people. In such a political system it is only artificially that one can establish the dynastic principle. The genius of Napoleon I is the only justification that his descendants can offer to establish their family on the throne. Now, this genius of the first emperor does not seem to have been transmitted to the pretenders of to-day. Prince Louis Napoleon and Prince Victor seem mainly anxious to keep up a prudent reserve, and their most determined partisans must admit that they scarcely know them at all. One of their adversaries, a Royalist, has wittily taunted the Bonapartes of to-day with having replaced the Eagle, the former Imperial emblem, by the Mole!

However that may be, in all likelihood never will either of these two parties succeed in establishing a majority. Or, to speak more correctly, if a dictator succeeded in imposing himself it would be because the country was the prey of a cataclysm, of a decimating war, or else because, on the contrary, intoxicated by a few victories, it surrendered to some fortunate soldier through enthusiasm or gratitude. Now, the condemnation of this régime lies in this very fact, that it can appear only in abnormal circumstances.

But can we not claim that, from the standpoint of order and religion, the circumstances are abnormal? Undoubtedly. And yet, neither order nor religion can be saved by the régime of Force. Some one has remarked that the Empire suppresses anarchy but does not suppress the causes of anarchy. These causes, the Jacobin principles, the errors and the sophisms of Rousseau, subsisted, latent and redoubtable, all through the period of the first Empire, and they manifested themselves later all the more violently because they had been harshly kept under by the sovereign hand of the great emperor.

As to public opinion, it associates too closely the memory of the Napoleonic domination with that of the military misfortunes of France to wish for the return of a Bonaparte. The partisans of the Empire are partisans only in a purely ideal and platonic fashion. One of them, a journalist of great talent, M. de Cassagnac, editor of L'Autorité, the most important of the Bonapartist organs, wrote in his journal a few years ago: "It would give me great pleasure to see the King ascend the throne, and I would not hesitate, if I could, to help him thereto with all my heart." This is the effect of twenty-five years of discord and of the death of the Prince Imperial on the old fidelity of the Bonapartist party. L. C.

Newspapers denounce French criminal court procedure without denouncing France. They were less considerate with Spain for the Ferrer trial. France heeds them as much as Spain.

The Supreme Court in Italy and the Religious Orders

In the highest Italian Court of Cassation, or Supreme Court, a most important decision has been rendered (March 23, 1908), involving an indefinite series of consequences to the prejudice of religious, whether men or women. "The court took cognizance of the religious vows, and of their conscientious effects upon the members of religious voluntary associations. Such associations or, in other words, religious communities, are acknowledged to be perfectly legitimate, as existing among citizens for a legitimate purpose which is the exercise of the religious life. Yet the decision, or "sentence," deprives such citizens of property rights otherwise granted by law, and heretofore acknowledged in numerous cases which have been settled in court since the foundation of the present kingdom of Italy. As not a few of the religious communities in the United States have substantial interests invested in the Eternal City or in other parts of the Italian peninsula, and all have their sympathies engaged, we consider that a statement and explanation of the recent case will find a proper place in this review. And we doubt not but the case will be found interesting to the legal mind in America. We shall first state the issue, then explain the decision, and finally note its genesis and consequences.

In 1896, a Benedictine monk, Pietro La Via, at that time a canon in Sicily, disposed by testament of certain property bequeathed to him by a nephew, Vincent. Part of it La Via devised to the Archbishop of Monreale, Mgr. Lancia di Brolo, and to Hildebrand d'Hemptynne, Primatial Abbot of the Benedictine monastery Sant' Anselmo on the Aventine, Rome. We infer from casual statements that the archbishop himself was a Benedictine. La Via's relatives contested the provisions made in favor of these two devisees, pleading that the real beneficiary intended was the monastery, and these nominal heirs were only confidential trustees (persons interposed, third parties); that the Benedictines were an Order suppressed, having no legal capacity to receive; and that the disposal of the property by this indirect way to the benefit of the monastery was in fraudem legis, a contravention of the Civil Code. Other points being relegated to a secondary place, counsel for the Benedictine devisees disputed the legality of pleading the interposition of third parties in the case; they held that the capacity or incapacity of the monastery to receive could not be brought into the question, for the pretended subject was not recognized in law; that, as no cognizance could be taken of the monastery which was non-existent in the eye of the law, so there were no other parties in the case except individuals who happened to belong to this voluntary association; and that each of the said individuals had a full legal right to receive and dispose of whatever came, just like any other citizens.

Against this line of argument, one court of appeal in Palermo admitted the plea of third parties having been interposed for the benefit of an association incapable of succeeding. The higher Court of Cassation in Palermo remanded the case for a re-hearing to another section of appeal; which latter agreed with the first decision rendered. The case was carried to the highest Court of Cassation in Rome which, in full session, gave a decision in conformity with that rendered twice in the Palermo Court of Appeal. As the essential reasons for this decision are drawn from the inner constitution of the religious life, and from nothing less than the vows, the case covers every contingency in which a religious institution is intended to receive either by "donation or bequest" from any person whatsoever, who may wish to make the individuals of such an institute his legal beneficiaries. There are other consequences which we shall advert to later.

The statute law in the case is as follows: The Civil Code of the new kingdom of Italy, article 773, states that testamentary devises made in favor of persons having no capacity to succeed are null, whether made in the form of an onerous contract, or in the name of third parties; and it mentions persons who are presumed to be such fiduciary trustees: "The father, mother, offspring and spouse of the person incapable." Article 829 rules out all pleading of third parties being interposed, unless the alleged interposition be in favor of those legally incapable. Other articles, 764, 724, specify persons incapable of succession, mentioning children conceived or not conceived, and the still-born. Later than the Civil Code, a law was passed, July 19, 1873, concerning the city of Rome, which had now been occupied by Victor Emmanuel. Article 28 of this law enacted that devises or acts in contravention of the law affecting ecclesiastical bodies (Enti Ecclesiastici), even though covered by the forms of onerous contract, or done through the intervention of third parties, are null. The ecclesiastical bodies or corporate interests in question were those not suppressed by law, to wit, certain benefices (canonries, etc.) or chaplaincies. These were the statutory elements involved in the recent decision.

On the other hand, the legal condition of religious orders, congregations, communities, etc., is as follows: In 1866, all of them were disfranchised and suppressed, in the regular evolution of Cavour's policy; and, as the kingdom of Italy extended, it carried disfranchisement and suppression with it throughout the country. The property of religious was all confiscated, and the character of mortmain which affected it was done away with by law for ever. There subsisted only the individual members of the suppressed orders or congregations. In these members the law expressly recognized the right to associate freely as in the members of any other voluntary unincorporated associations; to acquire and possess as they chose; and to dispose of their property as other citizens do. This full and unlimited juridical capacity which was restored to religious of either sex was entirely in the spirit of the policy pursued. The object had been ostensibly the legal destruction of the institutes, and of mortmain which had made their property permanently their own; but really it comprised, no doubt, the further purpose of gradually dissolving the moral bonds or vows, which were ignored by civil law, which derived their force only from conscience and the canon law, and which would now, it was hoped, be thrown off by members, as soon as these found themselves civilly able to be, to act, to acquire and possess as independent citizens. Without our adverting to it again, it will be noted that the recent decision advances one step farther on this line of policy by assailing the very means of subsistence, if in spite of all provisions members do still choose to live and be together under the sanction of religious vows.

After all this, after the abolition of religious mortmain, after the confiscation of all property held by religious persons, the continued existence of communities, as an existence in fact without legal recognition or rights, was but the simplest and barest expression of the universal right of association, protected and favored by law in individual citizens. So the Advocate General, L. Mortara, stated in his pleading: "Thus far no one calls this in question, that the laws of suppression touching the monastic corporations have maintained in its integrity the principle, that it is lawful for men, if only they are capable of consenting validly, to unite for religious purposes in common life." And the Court affirms in its decision: "Individuals, it is true, can acquire and transmit; let the associations be even for a religious purpose, they are not prohibited by the laws in force."

During nearly fifty years, the condition of religious life in Italy has corresponded to the tenor of these statements; and it has agreed very exactly with the condition of religious affairs in the United States, when John Carroll, Prefect Apostolic, wrote to Cardinal Antonelli, Prefect of the Propaganda (1786). Religious and charitable property has been acquired and passed on for community purposes, by continued conveyances from one person to another as often as death caused the hands to change; just as the old Jesuit property acquired in Maryland was preserved and transmitted from hand to hand till the time of Carroll, who very rightly characterized this system as the antithesis of holding in mortmain. In fact, the members of religious communities in Italy have been subject to all the burdens of citizenship, to military conscription, to every species of tax, family, communal, provincial, fiscal, including the exorbitant dues on succession, as individuals followed one another in the tenure of community property. The only category of taxables into which they have not been allowed admittance is that of corporate bodies having a legal assurance for their property; and the only category into which they have had no aspiration to enter is that of the land-barons, financiers, and managers of high finance, who manage the taxes and fix the taxables.

The abrupt turn, by which the position of religious as citizens has just been flanked, was executed in this wise. It is true, argued the advocate general, that religious congregations are juridically non-entities, that legally they are non-existent. But it does not follow that legally they are not cognizable. For they exist in fact; and an existence in fact has a juridical value. Again, the policy of the law which suppressed them was, in the minds of its promoters, simply to do away with them. It is not to be admitted, he maintained, that only a legally existing subject is disqualified by the law of succession, as if a legal incapacity connoted reciprocally a radical capacity of some kind, which only things existing can have. For beyond such a relative incapacity there is that which is absolute, and this is inherent in things non-existent. And the court refers to the fact that the non-conceived and the still-born are contemplated in the Code as incapable. Seeing that religious communities derive advantages from donations or bequests, they, though non-existent, "should not be excluded but included" in the disqualification to receive.

The total want of juridical existence and of legal means to succeed in the premises, does not imply that the communities are not subject to the article of disqualification, "in presence of a benefit in fact which is received, and which the law does not permit." With fine irony the court rebuts the charge that the right of voluntary association is hereby prejudiced; the bench, it says, "has limited itself only to the consideration that the conventual religious orders, transformed by the effect of the laws of suppression, in the condition in which they live, are incapable of succeeding, or receiving; not denying thereby that the single individuals composing them can receive, and that voluntary associations can exist." And again: "The single individuals, it is true, can acquire and transmit; let the associations be even for a religious purpose, they are not prohibited by the laws in force; but, when these acquire and transmit to give existence to a body which cannot, and ought not to exist, when the association in its essence is nothing else than the religious corporation suppressed, it is clear that it encounters, and ought to encounter, the prohibition of the law." To the objection that the article cited from the Code (829) speaks only of succession by inheritance, and determines the incapacity with respect to that, the court answers that there is no practical difference under this aspect "between donation and testament," and either means of transmission had "only one finality" in the case, that of benefit accruing "to the community of Benedictines." The advocate general had posed the main question in this comprehensive form: Whether a religious institute "can rely, notwithstanding the laws of suppression, on preserving unaltered in substance, with a slight modification in form, the economical basis of its own existence and its own prosperity."

This discrimination against one class of voluntary associations had to be based on some definition or description which would leave every other class out of the case. The civil law did not furnish such a discriminating definition, for the Code, drawn up like a coroner's inquest præsentē cadavere, had no occasion to contemplate religious associations except as defunct, and took no more account of their essence or religious vows than it did of canon law concerning them, for all of which alike there was to be no resurrection. Whence then could a discriminating definition be had? From their essence, the religious vows, and canon law! "The confidential trustee," says the Court, "being enabled to give execution to the will of the testator—and he does so forthwith, especially when he belongs to the corporation suppressed, when by his quality he is bound to the observance of the canons of the Church—procures those advantages which the law has forbidden to be procured." And the Israelite advocate general enlarged on this with respect to the two trustees in the case, closing a passage on the vow of poverty with the purely canonical principle: Quidquid adquiret Monachus acquiritur Monasterio ("Whatever the monk acquires is acquired for the monastery"). He recalled "the solemn vows which bind them to the congregation whereof they form part." And, in the interest of public morality, he denounced as a fraud against the law that identical process which Carroll had described to Antonelli as a private understanding outside of the law: "a perpetual fidei commissum," said Mortara, "one of a new type, not any longer that of a family or by descent, but corporative and social."

Italian lawyers have taken exception to many points here; and some inferior courts have rebelled against the precedent. Existence in fact has a judicial value in its own order of fact, not in another order where it is not recognized. A fact which gives no right imposes no duties correlative with a right; and to recognize it for the purpose exclusively of smiting it with disabilities, belonging to an order to which itself does not belong, is a fraud against the spirit and the letter of every law. So, when Waldeck-Rousseau intended to strike only religious associations, and used similar premises, Lhopiteau, one of his own party, retorted: "If an act is null in one sense, you cannot, in all truth and equity, make it produce its effect in some other sense." As to the non-existence of subjects like the non-conceived or still-born, they have a legal existence given them by the very fiction juris which contemplates them; whereas neither by a fiction of law, nor by construction, does the Code give juridical existence to a religious congregation. If the intention of legislators was, not merely to suppress the religious orders but to obstruct the possibility of their existing, still the intentions of individuals who promote a law do not constitute either the letter or the spirit of a statute: ratio juris non facit jus. Finally, the judiciary has usurped the attributions of the legislature. This brings us to the genesis of the decision. And we merely point to a parallel fact in English history; that it was only the judiciary which made out a universal doctrine of "superstitious uses" against the Catholic religion and its worship.

Political Currents in Belgium

LOUVAIN, BELGIUM, OCTOBER 25, 1909.

Recent events have given an interesting turn to the political situation in Belgium, especially interesting to foreigners as giving an insight into the tendencies and currents that underlie politics in this country. First of all, M. Charles Woeste published an article in a magazine, on "Young Right and Old Right." A violent controversy has been raging around it ever since. As is well known, the title of his article is the name by which many people, entirely unofficially, have resumed the two opposite tendencies that seem to exist in the present Catholic party. M. Woeste's article was a severe arraignment of the Young Right, the section composed of the younger members of the party, with strongly marked democratic tendencies, and claiming, rightly without a doubt, to represent the aspirations of a large portion of the country, especially the workmen. M. Woeste and his following are more aristocratic. Among other things he accused the Young Right of giving in to the Left on three questions especially, under pretext of being now in a period of transition and evolution. The three questions are advocacy of obligatory education, of the general military service, and universal suffrage, certainly three points strongly pushed by the opposition. Whether they are essential to their policy is another question. In the controversy, the division has been more marked than ever,—just the opposite of the effect intended by Woeste, whose aim was the maintenance of unity. Most of the papers have, however, been unanimous in this, that the appearance of the article was inopportune, coming as it did just before the elections, but differ strongly on the issues raised. On these it is not for me to pass judgment, my duty being merely to chronicle the facts.

On the other hand, interesting developments have shown themselves lately in the Liberal camp. There have of late been many steps taken towards an entente cordiale with the Socialists. The reason thereof is plain; the elections are approaching. It is, "destroy the Catholics first and look to your political principles afterward." There is no doubt that without the formation of the bloc, or the cartel, as it is called in Belgium, there is no hope whatever of either Liberals or Socialists getting into power; together, they have a common aim, and in pursuance of that, radically different political principles are held in abeyance. This may also explain the frenzy of some of the Liberal organs and their somewhat melodramatic utterances with regard to Ferrer, a revolutionary with whom they have naturally nothing in common. The probability of a Catholic victory in the elections of next May is by no means so strong as many of your readers may think who imagine with a recent writer in a Catholic magazine that there are only 40,000 non-Catholics in Belgium. A very conservative estimate places them at more than 2,500,000. However, the Catholics are fortunate in this, that the districts voting are still good, and a recent canvass shows that an unforeseen upheaval will be necessary to destroy the present Catholic majority of eight, provided always that the Catholics stick together. An indication of whether they will or will not, will be afforded by the impending debate on the military question, on which it is generally admitted depends the existence of the Ministry and may-be of the Government.

M. Renkin, Minister of Colonies, has returned from his visit to the Congo where he stayed some months examining conditions. He is expected to make public his report soon. Meanwhile he has expressed himself very forcibly with regard to the accusations made against the new colony, denouncing as simple lies the statements concerning "atrocities" committed since the Government took over the Congo a year ago. Advices from the Congo itself are full of praise for the admirable Christian conduct of both Prince Albert and the Minister during their stay in African soil. Both of them gave an excellent, and needed, example to the Europeans of all nationalities, by their show of friendship to the missionaries, their regular assistance at Mass and reception of the Sacraments. M. Renkin is understood to have drawn up a complete scheme of reform, which will shortly be placed before the country. In the meantime, public opinion has once more been aroused against England's action in the matter. A few days ago Sir Francis Grey, in answer to the anti-Congo agitators, well known to represent English commercial interests, declared that the English Government will not recognize the taking over of the colony from the King by Belgium, until the latter give a formal pledge of the abolition of forced labor and the introduction of free trade. It is interesting to note that anti-Congo agitation has recently begun in Germany also.

On Wednesday, October 20, a special edition of the Peuple, the Socialist organ, called on all loyal Socialists to express their horror of the recent "murder" of Ferrer. Manifestations followed in Brussels, Louvain, etc. In the former place a thousand people marched the streets in a pouring rain, stoned the store of a Spanish jeweller who had a picture of Alfonso XIII in his window, and then, to show that it was, after all, the Church they hated, and not Spain, marched off to the Papal Nunciature, broke a few windows, and marched away with cries of triumph. If in the other cities the manifestations were not as violent as in other countries of Europe, it was not owing to any lack of hatred of the Church, but to the prompt measures of repression taken beforehand by the Government.

On Sunday, October 24, at Brussels, a banquet was given in honor of Fr. Van den Gheyn, S.J., lately named Curator-in-Chief of the Royal Library of Brussels. The banquet was attended by such distinguished men as MM. Beernaert, former Prime Minister, Vandenhauvel, Schollaert, and de Lantsheere, ministers of state. J. W. P.

Liberalism in Central America

SAN SALVADOR, OCTOBER 18, 1909.

Few places can boast of having had an education as solidly Christian as Central America, where there still remains the lasting memory of the Dominicans, Franciscans, Mercedarians and Jesuits who evangelized the country. They laid deep foundations in the material order, too, for many branches of public business, like the post office in Guatemala City, are now housed in what were once the convents of religious.

But, on the other hand, in few other countries has evil made more headway; perhaps in no other part of the world have Liberalism and Freemasonry wrought more havoc. The public press is in the hands of enemies of religion, the instruction imparted in the State schools is hostile to the Faith, and the laws are based on liberalistic principles. In a word, a short stay here suffices to make us realize that public sentiment is tinctured with misbelief.

The most regrettable of these features is that writers for the press are followers and admirers of Voltaire, Garibaldi and Castelar and others of that kidney. We lack a Catholic press to teach the truth to the people, to open their eyes, to show them who are their friends, who are their enemies, to form public opinion, and to enable them to judge understandingly of the events of the day. Instead of this or anything like it, they are regaled daily with twaddle about the "grand conquests of civilization, and of the 'obscurantism' of the friars"; they are charged to shed, if need be, the last drop of their blood in defense of free thought, and it is dinned into their ears that their only happiness is found in defending as a precious heritage the teachings of the French Revolution.

Bishop Cagliero of Dom Bosco's Salesian Congregation has come as Delegate Apostolic to the Central American republics with residence in Costa Rica. There, as well as in Honduras and Nicaragua, he was solemnly received as the representative of the Pope; but owing to the activity of the enemies of the Church Guatemala and Salvador did not give him any official sign of civility and respect, and this in spite of all that could be done by Bishop Antonio Adolfo Pérez y Aguilar of San Salvador, by his clergy and by private citizens.

We have some Catholic monthlies and weeklies but most of them are poor affairs which are kept in existence by private generosity or by religious associations. The most deserving of mention for its firmness, energy and courage in combating masked or open enemies of religion is La Buena Prensa, edited by Canon Juan Antonio Dueñas, D.D., an alumnus of the Latin-American College in Rome, and financed by a society of Catholic ladies. A monthly called Razon Católica also merits praise. It is edited by the Rev. Vincente Martínez Lemus and counts among its contributors the ablest of the Salvadorean clergy. Lastly, thanks to the untiring energy of the ordinary, we now have a Catholic daily, El Heraldo del Salvador, under the efficient management of a Spanish priest, the Rev. Doctor Eduardo Martínez Balsalobre. It is a recent venture, being barely a month old, but the support that it has received bids fair to make of it a power for good in the cause of the Faith.

In further communications, I trust I shall be able to give your readers some interesting items about the Central American republics which are so little known.

OMICRON.

PIETERMARITZBURG, OCTOBER 2, 1909.

Some changes and alterations have taken place in several of our vicariates. Basutoland has been erected into a vicariate, and Father Cenez appointed bishop and vicar apostolic. A new prefecture apostolic has been formed out of the German Colony taken from the vicariate of Bishop Simon, who in return has received from the vicariate of Kimberley, the district called Gordonia. Three districts of the Vicariate of the Cape of Good Hope were added to Bishop Simon's vicariate on the 28th of June, namely, Kenhardt, Van Ryn's Dorp and Fraserburg.

In the Vicariate of Kimberley the clergy have been increased by two secular priests. The Benedictines have left the Transvaal. A new convent and school have been founded by the Dominican Sisters, who are five or six in number. The Trappists in Natal have ceased going by that name, and are called Marianite Missionaries (O.M.M.). A new native mission has been founded by the Oblates in Natal, and another by these Marianite Missionaries.

IN MISSION FIELDS

Catholicism in Norway

A most interesting résumé of the Catholic situation in that marvelous Scandinavian country, Norway, is contributed by the Abbé J. Lemmens to the Gazette de Liège of October 31.

Since 1891, he tells us, Catholic missions have developed slowly but surely, in Norway. There are now fourteen mission stations, served by about thirty priests. They extend as far as Lapland in the arctic regions, where the sun never rises during the long winter, and never sets for two or three months of summer. Among these priests are several natives. Mgr. Fallize has established twelve Catholic hospitals, the most important being those of Christiania, Bergen, Drammen and Stavanger, and almost as many Catholic schools. Hospitals and schools are confided to the care of the Sisters of St. Joseph of Chambéry, the Grey Sisters of St. Elizabeth and the Sisters of St. Francis Xavier of Bergen. Mgr. Fallize himself founded this last congregation, which is already very prosperous, for the special needs of the west of Norway.

This mission has a printing establishment which publishes a semi-monthly paper after the style of our parish bulletins, and which, after four centuries of heresy, has also produced a whole library of pious books, classics, and apologetics of Catholic literature in the Norwegian language. There are two institutions attached to the mission for the religious education of Catholic children, who are dispersed over an enormous territory of 318,000 square kilometres. It is unnecessary to say that such extensive works entail much expense, of which the greater part weighs heavily upon the shoulders of the bishop, who visits the missions once a year. Before the arrival of Mgr. Fallize in Norway the Catholics numbered from six to seven hundred. To-day the missions care for from 2,500 to 3,000 souls. The causes of the slow progress in spite of the widespread generous devotion are chiefly the enormous extent of Norway cut in two by gigantic mountains of snow on the one hand, and on the other by innumerable fiords and labyrinths of islands, scattered along the interminable coastline, the climate, damp and cold, the long winter season, all these things render life and apostolic work very burdensome and difficult. It requires the true vocation of a missionary to endure being condemned to live at his post, hundreds of kilometres from his nearest neighbor, in the midst a long winter night and tempests of snow. The following letter from a missionary in these regions to his bishop will give some idea of this:

"MONSIGNOR:

"I am sad,—very sad, and I have no one to whom to open my heart. I have not even the sun to raise my courage [The sun had disappeared for a month at the date on which this letter was written], but I have a father, and I know that he will understand the troubles and woes of his son. This Father,—it is you, Monsignor. I am going to tell you what grieves my poor soul, and only to think that you will listen to me is a ray of light in the shadows which envelop me. Your Highness knows that God has largely blessed my efforts in this new district. It has been given to me to gather into the bosom of the Church a large number of Protestants who are my glory and happiness. A young missionary, of whom they are my first spiritual children, I am as proud of them as a mother of her children. Have I been punished for this pride, for behold, they have almost all gone! They were poor and were obliged to leave the country to find elsewhere the bread which was no longer to be found here. [The financial crisis which afflicted Norway from 1900 to 1907 forced numbers of Norwegians to emigrate, principally to America, and among these emigrants were numbered thousands of Catholic converts.] They will remain faithful, so they promise me, but I, I remain alone in the midst of our separated brethren. They are good, yes, and I hope that the day will come when they will call me their pastor, but while waiting, I am a father almost without children. Pardon me, Monsignor, that I say, while speaking to you, that I am myself but a great child, who knows not how to make a sacrifice. Patience: I will learn when I am more accustomed to bear isolation in the midst of these snows and this interminable arctic night, and when I have better learned the necessity of sacrifice for the salvation of souls."

The second cause is the expense necessary for the work of evangelization, and the absolute lack of resources in the missions, and the emigration during these later years of numbers of poor converts to America.

Mgr. Fallize gives another cause which has arisen quite recently in the irruption into the country of German rationalism, which menaces the ruin of the character and spirit to which Protestantism has no strength to oppose sufficient bulwarks, and against which Catholicism, scarcely born, cannot alone fight with sufficient force. "With our few dozen missionaries in a country as large as Italy," he says, "what can we do? We are doing the impossible and orthodox Lutherans, scarcely knowing us, feel that the Catholic Church alone is capable of enlightening efficaciously this rationalism, but in the greater part of the country we Catholics do not exist. Considering the poverty of the mission, it is impossible to extend the force of our action,—above all, since Catholic France, which was our mother, has to fight against difficulties greater than our own."

It is a question of morals and of interest, which, for the greater number, are insurmountable obstacles to conversion. Courage is necessary for the abandonment of a lax and easy principle, and to embrace a religion which imposes and exacts the performance of fixed and stern laws. It requires no less courage to make submission of spirit and renounce a religion which permits the holding of any creed, according to one's taste, and embrace a religion which imposes an inviolable and immutable creed; it also needs courage to renounce lucrative positions, an honored rank, a brilliant future, to come and take a place among the poor and humble of the Catholic Church. Those who wish to know more of Norway and the progress and hopes of the Catholic Church there, will find published by Mgr. Fallize: "Une Tournée Pastorale en Norvège." (Bureau de Mission Catholique, Lyon, Rue de la Charité, 14. 1896), and "Promenades en Norvège" (Lyon, X. Jevain, 18 Rue François Dauphin. 1901).

The best thing on the Ferrer case appeared in the New York Evening Post, Saturday, November 6. The Paris correspondent raises the significant question, what power animates and, on occasions like this, unifies the hostility of freemasons, anti-clericals, socialists and anarchists against the Catholic Church? The letter throws light on all similar situations. Discords disappear when there is hope of injuring Catholicity.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

November's Roman Rumors

As the Roman congregations reconvene early in November, we must expect the usual crop of newspaper surmise about consistories, selections of Cardinals, especially for the United States, redistricting of dioceses and appointment of bishops. Each surmise comes from some one in an exalted position, or from a person who is qualified to know, or from a well-informed official at the Vatican. Needless to say all is surmise and nothing more. Never before in the history of the Church has the law of secrecy been so strictly applied in matters of this nature. Never perhaps was it so easily applicable; in some places, as in France, for instance, bishops are now nominated and consecrated without the interposition of the Government, and therefore without the consequent publicity. In this country there never was any justification for revealing the names of candidates for bishoprics. Though no political power could intervene, certain influences, lay as well as ecclesiastical, might too readily assume competence in the matter of naming bishops and dividing dioceses, if the candidates were submitted for canvass or consideration. Now that the congregations have been thoroughly organized under their new constitution, they will act more promptly than of old, though they may require some time to obtain in some quarters the strict observance of the canonical forms on which their action depends.

Increase of Divorce

The great increase in divorce during the past forty years attracts the attention of sociologists. Dr. Samuel W. Dike gives figures in the Independent that show the tremendous proportion it has reached. As yet France and the German empire are the only European countries that have passed the 10,000 mark in the number of divorces per year, but other countries show a very great increase. In this country we passed the 10,000 mark about 1870, and are now nearing the 100,000 mark, the exact number for 1906 being 72,062. What is the cause of this terrible state of affairs? Some say luxury; others, irreligion; others again, emancipation of women, or rather their invasion of what was once held to be the exclusive field of men. These all have something to do with it, but there is another reason assigned by few. None cares to touch the hidden sore, when to do so will make him wince. As children have decreased divorces have multiplied. Marriages more or less barren of children are fruitful in divorces; a union, it cannot be called a marriage, in which children are deliberately and with malice aforethought excluded, is of its nature temporary, and the divorce court is its almost necessary end.

Catholics and the Crown in England

Comfort may be drawn from every worldly affliction. Turk and Jew might enter Bandon: even the Atheist was welcome: only the Papist was shut out. Bandon was not exactly Paradise, and the excluded Catholic could console himself by seeing that in associating themselves with every kind of unbeliever against him, its Protestants acknowledged implicitly the contradictory origins of their religion and his. The declaration against Popery imposed by the English on their king is Bandon's famous inscription under another form and is a virtual confession that the faith of Rome is the faith of Christ against which the world is always in arms. The opposition to its removal confirms this. It would be hard outside of Exeter Hall or the office of the Church Times to find one ready to identify England of to-day with the Kingdom of Christ. The orators of the one and the writers of the other, removed from the influence of place, must find this cocksureness slip away from them. In its own way England persecutes the Church almost as the Government does in France. From all which the English Catholic justly concludes that he alone of Englishmen belongs to the little flock that must be persecuted to the end of time.

It is quite clear that the nation at large clings to the declaration. On glancing over the list of those who voted against Mr. Redmond's Catholic Disabilities Bill last May one can not but be struck with the quality of their names. Its disgraceful origin was pointed out by Father Thurston in a lecture delivered about that time. In the last Dublin Review he has developed this thesis, discussed the feelings stirred up in good men by the declaration when it first appeared, shown how consistent its abolition would be, and made clear how illogically Liberals oppose this. The dignity of the crown is wounded by putting into the mouth of the sovereign the words of the vilest wretch ever seen in English public life. Englishmen would not do this to an unwilling king. One may on this side of the Atlantic just hint at a suspicion. Are the high personages personally interested in the matter really anxious for a modification of the declaration? This question is akin to another: Who was really, not officially, responsible for the stopping of the procession at the Eucharistic Congress? And this leads to a third: Has not a certain favor shown before the Congress by a high personage to Catholics been since withdrawn?

If the King or the Prince of Wales should let it be known clearly that they earnestly wish to satisfy their Catholic subjects on this matter without infringing upon the Act of Settlement, the matter would soon be arranged. But we strongly suspect that George V will make the declaration as it now stands.

Cardinal Fischer and the Volksverein

AMERICA has, on several occasions, been impelled to express a word of appreciation of the immense good wrought in Germany by the Volksverein, an association of Catholics whose purpose it is to use every practical means to further the social development of the people and to safeguard them against the specious pleadings of the strong Socialistic body in the fatherland. Lately Cardinal Fischer, Archbishop of Cologne, happening to be in München-Gladbach, was invited by the authorities of the Verein in that district to visit the Verein building which His Eminence had dedicated three years ago and which in the interval had been notably improved by additions making possible a wide development of the association's work among the people. The president of the Verein, in an address of welcome to the Cardinal, commented in a summary way on the Catholic activity of the body, emphasizing especially its dominant purpose to pursue its aims in closest union with the Church and obedience to the Church authorities. The Cardinal, in his reply, congratulated the members of the association on the success of their active efficiency in the cause of the Church, made clear his desire for the fullest possible spread of the Verein not merely in his own diocese but throughout the empire and insisted upon the note emphasized by the president. He referred briefly to certain anonymous attacks upon the Verein impugning its loyalty to the bishops of the land and bluntly characterized them as slanderous and false. "The Volksverein is not Catholic in name only," His Eminence declared, "it is Catholic in deed and truth." Touching upon the fact that Pius X had recently presented to the Verein a beautiful portrait of himself with his Apostolic blessing, he assured his hearers of the continuing affection and confidence of the Holy Father. "Let us rejoice," concluded the Cardinal, "that through God's grace this unity of purpose and harmony of action prevail among us. In it we shall find an enduring bulwark, forever safeguarding the interests of our people, our country and our Church." The Cardinal's endorsement was given in good time to silence some enemies of the Volksverein.

Mr. Fairbanks and the Filipinos

On September 21, the Quill Club of Manila gave a banquet in honor of Mr. Fairbanks of Indiana, our former vice-president. Thanks to the warm reception or to the tropical climate, the distinguished guest thawed out in a speech which was far from being well received by the Filipinos. Addressing himself to the Americans, he expressed his surprise at the depth and width and solidity of the foundations that they had laid in Manila. "You have come in obedience to your consciences; you have planted here the two mighty pillars of our civilization, church and school." Whereupon, Libertas of Manila rises to make a few editorial remarks which may be recommended to the careful consideration of those who drink in four centuries of history from a picture book or a Fourth of July address.

Before Dewey steamed into the harbor of Manila, the Church was not only established but flourishing, for zealous missionaries had transformed into a profoundly religious people of advanced civilization the tribes of Malay nomads who had formed its shifting population. President Taft recognized their work as the only successful attempt in converting Malays. Sixteen natives of the islands had worn the mitre while the ranks of parish priests and religious of both sexes had been recruited from the same source. Eight millions of Malays had professed the Faith and had given practical proofs that its lessons had struck deep roots into their lives. Common schools, high schools for both sexes, and colleges led the way to the crowning educational glory of the archipelago, the University of St. Thomas at Manila.

The Churches that came to the islands after Dewey have not converted heathen tribes and have not won over the educated classes. The "noblest" result of their efforts is that they have developed religious indifference, a thing almost unknown before they came. The Filipino members of the supreme court, of the legislature, and of the legal, medical and literary professions, the Filipino business men and manufacturers, are not of American formation. Their studies and preparatory work antedate the arrival of Dewey. The very widespread misunderstanding about the Philippines is due, the editor tells us, to Spain, to the Filipinos and to Americans. Spain shares the blame because she withheld certain civil and political privileges from the natives on the plea that their civilization was too immature. The Filipinos, when denouncing from the housetops the "slavery and ignorance" in which they had been held by the mother country, were taken too seriously by hearers or readers who accepted political buncombe as sober fact. And the Americans, as jubilant as a boy in his first smalls, saw in the Igorrotes from distant mountains and deep tropical forests fair samples of the people whom they were called to civilize and Americanize. As justly might New Yorkers consider some wandering Wild West show a faithful portrayal of what awaits the gallant "tenderfoot" if he ventures out on the great plains. Those whose knowledge of the Philippines is not confined to the inspection of a handful of savages in an Exposition, or to a view of the coast from the deck of a passing steamer, know full well how laboriously Spanish missionaries had toiled to plant the two "mighty pillars of church and school," and how successful had been their efforts.

"Whilst We were Sleeping"

There was a celebration in New York Sunday last—the laying of the corner-stone of the new St. Columba parish school, which is to replace the old edifice used for school purposes since 1858. The occasion was one that naturally called for pleasurable reminiscences and for heartfelt thanksgiving in the memory of the good achieved in the years of the old school's efficiency. Archbishop Farley was particularly happy in his brief address of congratulation to pastor and people and his Grace touched a note which might well thrill the hearts of the enthusiastic thousands who had gathered to the ceremony. He spoke as one who of right rejoiced in the triumph of the day. Not an old man as yet, he had lived through the exciting days of conflict, when the mere suggestion of the need of religion in education stamped the Catholic as an enemy of the Republic; when the building of parochial schools to safeguard the faith of God's little ones, was openly affirmed to be a dangerous effort to introduce religious dominancy to the ruin of our free institutions. One may wonder whether the Archbishop himself realized the exultation that flashed out of his simple talk to his people as he sketched the struggle of those early days when his predecessor, the great Archbishop Hughes, rallied the faithful to valiant effort for Catholic schools, and compared the picture with the victory of to-day. Then we were enemies, now we are hailed the true friends of American institutions; then we were a destructive element, now we are the conservative force preparing with vigilant care for the combat that threatens, when the one safeguard shall be the respect for authority and the obedience to law which a religious training alone shall assure. All over the land the cry is heard to-day: we must have moral training in our school system if we mean to conserve the wellbeing of the people; we must train our little ones in the fear of God, in obedience to the law, in respect for the rights of others, in a reverent sense of justice, if we will preserve the principles of our American institutions. The old fallacy which excluded every semblance of religious instruction from the common schools is fairly universally understood, and one, who would have been an enemy in the old day, is not ashamed to say to Catholics to-day: "Whilst we were sleeping, you have been the one conservative force wide awake to the educational needs of the little ones." Truly may one who has lived through the years that have wrought the wondrous change feel a pardonable pride in the splendid record of God's Church—moving ever on to assured victory no matter how "the Gentiles rage and the people devise vain things."

Index to Volume One

With this number of AMERICA is issued the Index for Volume One which was completed with number 26, October 9. We might have had it ready for an earlier issue; but as it was the first, and therefore the model of the many we hope to publish, it required unusual care. We trust that our readers will regard it as justifying the time and labor expended in its preparation. Unlike the indexes of many reviews similar to AMERICA, ours has as few divisions as possible. A general index, patterned after a good book index, is followed by special alphabetical lists under the titles, "authors," "books," "periodicals," "obituary," "advertisers." This plan seemed to us to serve best for purposes of ready reference. It spares the reader from going to one section after another to find a title. Over eighteen hundred titles are neatly printed on six pages, each with three columns. A title page is so arranged as to make the index the head of the book. It can be used with the patent binders over 4,000 of which have already been distributed. It will look most appropriate in the regular bound volumes, some of which we are now preparing. They will be ready for sale November 15, at $4.00 each. In style they resemble the special patent binder for loose copies, with gilt letter stamps.

There is a trust among the Protestant churches. It is called the Federal Council of the Church of Christ in America. Its object is to do away with the many sectarian churches in small towns and villages and to gather Congregationalists, Baptists, Presbyterians and Methodists in one large church under one minister. This Trust diminishes the cost of the product to the consumers, it is profitable to the ministers that are in it, but like all others, it is ruinous to the small traders, that is, the ministers it does not admit to its favor. It professes to have succeeded beyond expectation.

A schism has broken out in the Christian Science Church. Mrs. Stetson, its chief in New York, has been found guilty of false teaching by the Mother Church in Boston. She is upheld by her congregation and declines to yield. There was a very stormy meeting at the church on Ninety-sixth street November 4. Mrs. Stetson was accused among other things, of launching death thoughts against her opponents. The chairman produced a set of diaries containing a record of her misdeeds: an attempt was made to lift him from the chair. As all these, being material, are for Christian Scientists but mere delusions of mortal mind, why do they make such a fuss over nothing?

LITERATURE

Humanity, Its Destiny and the Means to Attain It, by the Rev. FATHER HENRY DENIFLE, O.P. Translated from the German by the VERY REV. FERDINAND BROSSART, V.G., Covington. New York and Cincinnati: Fr. Pustet & Co.

This is a series of discourses which, taking Humanity as it actually exists in the world separated from God by apostasy, and therefore a prey to countless temporal evils and in jeopardy of the supreme eternal evil, show Christ, working through His Church as the only remedy of these evils, the only hope of man. They were preached by their eminent author whom, one might be tempted to think, God called away too soon for us, in the Cathedral of Gratz during 1872. They have all the enthusiasm of that time. Saturated with the spirit of the Syllabus, they show forth clearly the divine constitution of the Church, the essential hatred of the world for it, the staunch determination to make no terms with the enemy, the conviction that the world needs the Church and that the Church does not in the same way need the world and the unshaken confidence that the future is its own, that characterized those glorious days when the triumphs of the Vatican Council were fresh in men's minds and the wrongs of the much loved Pius IX stirred their hearts. We have gone a weary way since. Faith is as strong, loyalty as true to-day as then. But man easily adapts himself to circumstances. This is a benign law of Providence without which life would often become intolerable. But like many another it may be abused by the imperfect. To the generation of to-day Pius IX and his defiance of the world-power is a matter of history, partially known like the warfare of St. Gregory VII. Some are tempted to accept the present situation as irremediable, or at least to wish to compromise; a faint-heartedness that has more to do with Modernism than at first sight appears. They need the lesson Judith taught to the elders of Bethulia. They will find it in these discourses, the staple of those former days. Father Brossart has done a good work in presenting them in an excellent English dress to Catholics, so that they may not fall away from the high thoughts that belong to the children of God.

At the Root of Socialism. By FATHER POWER, S.J. London: B. A. Sands & Co. Price 3d.

Those who are interested in the subject of Socialism will find in this neat pamphlet a strong and attractive exposition of the "morality of private property" and "the immorality of confiscation" under the titles, "The Oneness of Men" and "The Twoness of Men." The lecture, though delivered before a Socialistic audience in Edinburgh, is directly applicable to any advocate of Socialism. In his "Foreword," the author tells us: "I am not tackling Socialism in any other form than that in which it is presented by the Glasgow Manifesto of November 28, 1907." Indeed, it is on a single clause of this manifesto of the Glasgow Socialist Labor Party, that Father Power founds his paper: "We of the Socialist Labor Party, with full knowledge of all that the problem involves, declare for confiscation as being the only adequate solution, and therefore the only moral one." Against this assertion, solid reasoning, "based on human nature as it is," a fund of humor and wealth of pointed phrase are marshalled to present in an attractive and convincing manner the old-time proofs of the class-room. New arguments are not given, but the old ones are well put. One who feels the need of having ready at hand a fresh and concise presentation of the Catholic position on Socialism's fundamental thesis, can do not better than read carefully pp. 13-32 of Father Power's "At the Root of Socialism."

L'Œuvre Qui Nous Sauvera. Montreal: Canadian Messenger.

This book of less than a hundred pages has already received the commendation and approval of Mgr. Sbarretti, Apostolic Delegate of Canada, three archbishops and eight bishops.

L'Œuvre Qui Nous Sauvera (The Work that Will Save Us) is men's retreats, whose nature and advantages could not better be summed up than in the words of Mgr. Sbarretti to the author:

"What is more salutary for the soul of the workingman, of the man in business or in the professions, of the youth or even of the priest, than to be led by the hand of God unto those lofty summits, where the divine voice speaks more audibly to the ear of the heart, and where the will, assisted by divine grace, is more effectually drawn towards good!"

Men's retreats may be traced back to the foundation of the Society of Jesus, in most of whose houses a section was reserved for priests or laymen desirous of following the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius. In the seventeenth century these retreats were very popular throughout central Europe. The great Universities of Prague, Olmutz, Vienna, Innsbruck, Ingoldstadt, Augsburg, Dillingen, each had its little Thebais. In the one house of St. Lazarus, St. Vincent de Paul received over 20,000 retreatants. These moral fortresses were swept away in the Revolutionary storm, but rose again stronger than ever towards the close of the last century. In 1891, Belgium, never behindhand in social endeavor, saw the opening of far-famed Fayt-Manage, a house which in the space of fifteen years took in 27,500 retreatants. At the present moment, in Belgium alone, 10,000 workmen go every year to renew their strength in the seclusion of a retreat.

As to the results of this movement, "All is saved," says Cardinal Guibert, "if Christians will give but three days to the consideration of eternal truths." This testimony is supported in the book under review by a host of others from all ranks of society. The author concludes his terse yet comprehensive essay by leading up to the first closed retreat in Canada, held at Sault-au-Récollet, near Montreal, from June 17 to 21, 1909.

Impressions of a Layman. By RALSTON J. MARKOE. St. Paul, Minn.: R. J. Markoe. $1.50.

The author is a lawyer, architect and civil engineer who is noted for his pointed and practical contributions on Catholic questions, and his "impressions" cover a wide variety of subjects. The views of an intelligent and observant layman, and especially of one whose professional experience qualifies him to speak with technical knowledge on the requirements and economies of church building, will prove valuable to pastors whose training has been mainly on other lines. Mr. Markoe's hints on architectural plans, acoustics, heating and ventilation, and particularly on the Catholic Symbolism to be expressed in design and decoration, should make his book a necessity to all who have charge of churches, colleges, academies and schools. He treats the matter from the point of view of common sense as well as of technical skill and intimate acquaintance with the need of Catholic institutions.

But his impressions have a wider scope. He criticizes, respectfully but frankly, parochial shortcomings, lays down from the layman's standpoint desirable improvements in the methods of conducting Sunday and parochial schools, of preaching practical sermons and giving the necessary moral training to the young. His remarks on Freemasonry, Socialism, and the Catholic and anti-Catholic view-points are well-informed, and of equal interest to lay and cleric. The writer has found some of Mr. Markoe's experiences duplicated in

New York and elsewhere. "Because of the recognized superiority of Catholic school graduates in secular training they are in constant demand by business men . . . who more-over employ them because they are Catholics. The head of a well-known business house in St. Paul, himself a non-Catholic, sends every year for a Catholic student to act as cashier, saying frankly that he wants to have his cash handled by some one who goes to confession." Business men also prefer Catholic students, because they are trained to respect authority and know how to obey.

There are some misprints in the book which will no doubt be corrected in the second edition that is sure to be demanded, but, apart from minor defects, we have no hesitation in commending it.

Autour d'un Foyer Basque: Récits et Idées, par PIERRE LEHMANDE, S. J., Nouvelle Librairie Nationale, 85, rue de Rennes, Paris.

In an age when social problems are distracting the nations there is a people that from their isolated position in the world and more so from the isolation which their language—difficult, complex, and unlike all others—furnishes, one would naturally expect to find free from such problems. It is the nation of the Basques, which Voltaire playfully described as "A handful of people dancing on the summits of the Pyrenees," yet in reality a brave, hardy, industrious and freedom-loving people; a people which antedates the settlements of the Phoenicians, Greeks and Carthaginians on the coasts of the Mediterranean; a people known to the Romans and spoken of by Horace; a people whom Hannibal found buried away on the hillsides and in the valleys of the Pyrenees during his march through Southern Europe; a people amongst whom there exists an alliance between the spirit of conservatism and that of modern initiative; a people which having received the religion of the Apostles has ever been proof against innovators of later times.

The Basques are unfortunately not without their social problems thanks to the work of the French Revolution and the vicissitudes of the Monarchies in Spain. In the first part of his book the author treats of the solution of these difficult problems, especially those arising from laws which affect the districts under French rule and which strike at the very foundation and secret of the longevity of the nation, namely, its ancestral families—"familles souches." In the second and third parts which more fully justify the picturesque title, "By a Basque Fireside," he gives us tableaux of the family life and traditions of this ancient race. The work is extremely interesting and gains in reliability from the fact that the author is himself a Basque and from the numerous references cited as supplying material for it.

Manuale di Teosofia. Parte Prima. By GIOVANNI BUSNELLI, Roma. Civiltà Cattolica.

St. Paul cautions the Christians of his time against those who "shall depart from the faith, giving heed to spirits of error and doctrines of devils." The caution is generally understood as referring to the teaching of the Gnostics. Gnosticism, Buddhism, Transcendental Pantheism, Esoteric Christianity are one and the same as Theosophy, which is now proclaimed as the new religion of the world, and man's perfection. Yet, under all these forms, Theosophy is but a diabolical religion. In it Satan characteristically appears as the ape of God, using formulas, moral maxims and preternatural phenomena borrowed from the true religion to mask his hideousness and to deceive his followers. His object is ever the same, the ruin of man by superstition, by lust and homicide. Theosophy is the embodiment of all religions, save Christianity and the Catholic Church. We should be thankful for this open confession. It is the embodiment of all that is irreligious; it bears unmistakably the stamp of its satanic origin. Madame Blavatsky, the apostle of Theosophy, expresses her abhorrence of the Christian religion: "Catholicity with its fetich worshipping is far worse and more pernicious than Hindooism in its most idolatrous aspect."

Let no one imagine, however, that Theosophy, because absurd, needs no refutation. It needs refutation, because it is error presented in a refined and attractive form. To expose it to the light is to refute it. This is what our author in his manual does very skilfully. The purpose of the Theosophic Society is unfolded and Theosophy is contrasted with Christianity. It is curious to note that Swedenborg, whose false mysticism some zealously seek to spread in this country, was one of the heralds of Theosophy. He says that in his book, "The Heavenly Jerusalem," is to be found the divine word which God communicated to him as to Moses. Men, however, should seek for it in Tartary, the land still governed by the Patriarchs. In his book "The True Christian Religion," (Occultism) he writes: "I found myself in the company of Angels and Spirits who had passed their life in great Tartary. From them I learned that from remote antiquity the inhabitants of those regions possessed the Divine Word which was their rule of worship, all based on interior communications. This word, they added, was contained in the book of Jaschar. . . . This people worshipped Jehovah alone, some as a visible, others as an invisible God, dwelling in a spiritual world occupying a lofty plateau in the southern regions bordering on the East. No Christians are tolerated among them. Should any happen to go thither, they are cast into prison and never liberated. Angels told me that Moses had borrowed from these books the first chapter of Genesis about Creation, etc." Modern Theosophists have obeyed the injunction. They have rushed to Tartary, to Thibet, where they found the word, Buddhism, Occultism, the divine science Theosophy which is to elevate mankind. Risum teneatis amici. Father Busnelli's work has merited a letter of congratulation from the Holy Father through the Secretary of State, Cardinal Merry Del Val, addressed to the author and the Civiltà Cattolica.

Outlines of General History, by V. A. RENOUF, B.A., edited by WILLIAM STARR MYERS, Ph.D. New York: The Macmillan Co. Price, $1.30 net.

To compress within the limits of five hundred octavo pages the history of sixty centuries is no light task. The most conscientious selection and arrangement of materials may fail of general approbation, for some surmises are bound to creep in disguised as facts and there is not space for fully presenting a disputed or debatable point. Thus, after mentioning two plausible explanations of the exaltation of the Bishop of Rome, (p. 187), the writer might have stated expressly the "other causes" which combined to establish the papal headship.

Reading of Pipin, (p. 196) we are reminded of Châteaubriand's words: "Qualifying as 'usurpation' Pipin's accession to the throne is one of those old lies of history which by frequent repetition become truths." Of old, the Frankish crown had been elective; the usurpation, were there any, consisted in making it hereditary. The Frankish counts assembled at Soissons raised Pipin on their shields, thereby electing him their ruler. To say the least, it is doubtful whether Pope St. Zachary was consulted about the change of dynasty. The author's comparison between Mohammedanism and Christianity, (p. 206) is naturally a comparison between the former and the private interpretation theory, which was cradled in the religious upheaval of the sixteenth century. "Fixed standards of belief" in mathematics have not resulted in mathematical stagnation, for those principles are true with a certainty that is not the plaything of human caprice. If in ethics or dogma fallible and faulty principles are adopted as "fixed standards of belief," moral and religious decay must result, just as by distorting the four operations one could build up a totally deranged system of a so-called science of numbers.

The account of the Great Schism, (p. 219) is so brief as to be misleading. The Italians did not "elect their own Pope," for of the sixteen cardinals who entered the Conclave of April 7, 1378, and elected Urban VI only four were of that nationality. Salembier's "Great Schism of the West," which, by the way, should appear on the author's reference list, says the last word on this matter which was so harmful to religion. The Catholic doctrine of indulgences is so clearly stated (p. 258), that no reader, unless he be evil-minded, will hurl at the Church the slanderous reproach of selling pardon for sin. We think that the author's praise of Darwin (p. 368), is excessive and that his view of the far-reaching influence of Darwin's pet doctrine is extreme.

No bias in favor of the Church is shown in the very copious reference lists. Could no place be found for Duchesne's exhaustive "Beginnings of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes," for Lingard's strongly documented "History of England," for Jannsen's monumental "History of the German People"?

Although a strictly non-partisan history is, we fear, a practical impossibility, we recognize and commend the author's honestly avowed intention. It is far easier to pick flaws in a work than it is to produce a work that is flawless. Barring a few blemishes Prof. Renouf's book presents in concise form much solid information which, we trust, will realize the lofty purpose outlined in the preface. D. P. S.

Standard Catholic Readers. By MARY E. DOYLE. New York: American Book Co.

There are five well graded readers in the course. The selections are, in general, quite a variation from those found in like books. From the standpoint of any teacher the matter is good; from the standpoint of the Catholic teacher it is better. It has evidently been the effort of the editor to present as much as possible of what is notable in Catholic writers, and from others, as much as possible of what is notably Catholic.

The publishers of these readers deserve credit for their earnest efforts to eliminate from the books anything that would offend the Catholic sense. The editorial department of the American Book Company should, perhaps, be commended the more for this, in as much as it must have listened to the suggestions of those who were qualified to judge of what would be most acceptable to Catholic pupils and most representative of the Catholic spirit in literature.

We have only one fault to notice. While the illustrations in these books are for the most part commendable, some of the colored plates call for a retouching. The processes now at the command of the illustrator ought to give better results than the wash-blue sky in the reproduction of Von Oer's "Babe of Bethlehem." The illustrator should, too, substitute more becoming cloaks for the green one which St. Joseph wears in this same picture, and for the greener one which is cast about St. Dominic's white habit in Sassoferato's "Madonna of the Rosary." Whatever may be said in general of the esthetic value of colored illustrations, these particular examples of the art surely do not make for the improvement of taste.

Bibliophoros, DD. SCHMITZ ET SESTILI. Rome: M. Bretschneider.

The fourth number of this review of Catholic thought in all parts of the world gives us a brief criticism of each of over seventy works distributed through its thirteen sections. Not unfrequently the distinguished editors take pains to quote the opinions of other reviewers, also well known in the domain of Catholic intellectual activity. After examining an excellent number of an excellent publication we read with true regret that, the first volume having been completed, no further numbers will be issued.

The Life of Christ. A Course of Lectures combining the Principal Events in Our Lord's Life with Catechism, by MARY VIRGINIA MERRICK. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price, 50 cents.

This manual will be useful to Catechists who understand how necessary is a knowledge of the Gospel to every Christian, and who would confirm the doctrine of the Catechism with our Lord's teaching and example. Cardinal Gibbons commends it in an introduction.

"A Funeral in the Catacombs," by Monsignor de Waal, in the November Ecclesiastical Review, is a touching and instructive story woven around a third century inscription on a burial vault in the Catacombs. The epitaph of Severus to his daughter is a striking proof of the identity of the Catholic faith and spirit in the twentieth century and the third. "To Every One That Hath" is a strong and original plea for the development of the missionary spirit in clergy and laity. Father Graham reads in the text that those who have the natural virtues will be given the supernatural, and those who use the talents they have received will be given more. The natural virtues of the northern nations made them receptive of Christianity, and the honesty, purity and respect for womanhood that obtained in pagan Ireland, as revealed in the Brehon Code, had not less to do with the nation's rapid conversion than the apostolic power of St. Patrick. Nations that lost or never acquired the missionary spirit lost the faith; Ireland kept the faith because she has been always diffusing it. John R. Foyar tells of the close connection between Church and people in pre-reformation England. Towns grew around church and monastery, and fairs, miracle-plays, dances and sports were held under their patronage. "Fair" is derived from "feria," the patronal feast of the church, when the people assembled and gradually began to barter their wares. The Sunday and patronal games were abolished at the Reformation and with them passed "Merrie England." Archbishop Howley treats the presentation of Joan of Arc in "Henry VI" as altogether Shakespeare's, and G. A. Arctander pleads modestly for occasional introduction of the vernacular in liturgical chant.

SOCIOLOGY

The Lake Mohonk Conference of Friends of the Indian held its twenty-seventh annual meeting toward the end of October. There was a good deal of discursive talk upon what ought to be done for the Indian and how to improve the Department that has charge of him, and Commissioner Valentine had some suggestions more or less practical. He held that the salaries of agents ought to be raised, judging it criminal negligence to pay the one on the Osage Reservation only $2,000 a year. He thought that the Indians ought to learn to speak, read and write English, to do arithmetic, to say "good morning" and "good afternoon," and to look people squarely between the eyes. He did not explain the special efficacy of "good morning" and "good afternoon" in promoting the comfort of the Indians, nor why they could not be just as happy saying: "Klahowya tilikum" as they do on the Northwest Coast, and he has not, apparently, enquired why it is that the Indian does not look people squarely between the eyes. There are many highly cultured nations amongst whom such looking is considered most disrespectful. If one thinks over it he finds the idea quite natural, and therefore not beyond the Indian's notions of propriety. If such be his opinion, what is to be gained by bringing him to our irreverence? Mr. Valentine has a plan for dealing with Indian lands. There are 300,000 Indians to be cared for; the lands are worth hundreds of millions if properly developed according to economic principles. But perhaps the Indian does not want his lands developed. His experience has taught him what Mr. Valentine ignores, that lands which in their natural condition tempt the avarice of what this real friend of his race rightly calls "the bad white man," would if improved and exploited be an irresistible bait.

The Immigration into the United States for the year ended June 30, 1909, was 751,786, the lowest figure since 1902, when it was 648,743. In 1899 it was only 311,715. There was a gradual increase from that year to 1907, when it reached the enormous total of 1,285,349. In 1908 it dropped 500,000. During the last ten years the greatest number of Irish immigrants was 54,266 in 1905; the lowest, 29,001, in 1902. In 1909 it was 39,021. English immigrants have increased remarkably. There were 10,702 in 1899; in 1904, 41,479, and in 1907, 51,126. There were 39,021 in 1909. The countries sending the largest numbers of immigrants during 1909 were South Italy, whence came 165,248; Poland, furnishing 77,565. Moreover there were 57,551 Hebrews. Japanese immigrants, 30,824 in 1907, dropped to 3,275 in 1909, and Chinese, nominal during the whole decade, were in 1909, only 1,841. During this year, 3,819 Japanese and 3,411 Chinese left the United States. The net increase of population due to immigration during the year was 543,843.

The Colliers' Union of the Rhenish-Westphalian district, employing about 330,000 men, has established a system of Labor Exchanges with a central office in Essen and branches in the principal mining towns. The function of the branches will be to furnish the miners, each in its own district, with work: that of the central office, to direct men from places where work is slack to those where the supply of labor is insufficient. The men will thus be saved from wandering vainly from place to place. Moreover, a man refusing to work in the mine designated shall have to give his reasons. It is hoped that abuses in management will thus be discovered and a better feeling between masters and men promoted. On the other hand collieries in the Union will be bound to employ no German who does not show his ticket from the exchange, though foreign workmen will be exempt from this rule; and none will get a ticket unless he shall have left his last employment legitimately, while if he do not take up his work in the place assigned, within two days, he shall not be employed for a fortnight. One is hardly surprised that the men think that the scheme is rather for the benefit of employers than for theirs, and that they are organizing to resist its execution.

The Census Mortality Bulletin 104, estimates that from 100,000 to 200,000 infants under five years die annually in the United States from preventable causes. Dr. C. L. Wilbur chief of the Bureau of Vital Statistics, holds that prompt registration of birth and precise statement of cause of death must be the foundation of any attempt to improve this condition. According to the best authorities, of infants' deaths from any specific disease 40% could have been saved in case of congenital debility; 60% of enteritis; 40% of measles; 50% of bronchial-pneumonia; 75% of croup and diphtheria and so on with regard to other diseases. To bring about this amelioration it is necessary to be able to follow up cases of suspected neglect or of surroundings incompatible with health, which it is very hard to do as long as registration is insufficiently attended to.

The campaign planned by the State Charities Aid Association against tuberculosis, opened at Syracuse, Wednesday, October 27, when 3,000 persons attended a meeting presided over by Salem Hyde, president of the Associated Charities. Dr. Walsh of Phipps Institute, Philadelphia, insisted on the need of hospitals for advanced cases who will not go to the poorhouse. Homer Folks pointed out that in eleven years as many had died of preventable disease in Onondaga County as were actually listening to him. Special meetings were held for schools, benevolent associations, etc. Nine other cities in Western New York are to be visited and instructed in the same way.

A report, based on census returns and on some statistics gathered for the International Statistics Institute, has been published by Prof. Walter F. Wilcox, of the Department of Statistics and Sociology, at Cornell University. The report declares the average annual number of divorces in the United States to be twice as great as the average annual number of any of the countries from which statistics are obtainable, except Japan and Algeria, and it is more than twice as great as all other Christian countries combined from which the Census Bureau has been able to get reports. The Western division of the United States has had the highest divorce rate in the last forty years. The increase of divorce in the Southern States has been far more rapid than in the Northern. The average divorce rate in the country has increased threefold in forty years.

Miss Caroline Phelps Stokes, of New York, who died in California last April, after making bequests of more than $100,000 to charitable institutions, and moderate legacies to her relatives leaves the residue of her estate estimated at from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 for the erection of modern tenements, the education of negroes in Africa and the United States, of North American Indians and needy deserving white students.

Last July Lord Gorell, formerly Judge of the Divorce Court, proposed in the English House of Lords to make divorce easy for all by giving the County Courts jurisdiction. His argument was that the poor should have an equal opportunity with the rich of availing themselves of the relief provided by law. A Royal Commission has been appointed to inquire into the desirability of the change.

M. Vallon of the French Academy of Medicine, has made a detailed study of one hundred and fifty-one persons, charged with murder or attempted murder. Forty-nine cases were directly traceable to alcoholism in some one of its various forms recognized by the profession. His studies, which have extended over a period of twenty years, warrant him in asserting that the greatest factor in criminality is alcoholism.

ECONOMICS

All over the country announcement was made during the week of an increase in the price of milk of a cent a quart with the likelihood of a further advance. In view of the statement of the Chicago Tribune that several retail milk dealers admitted the existence among them "of an understanding by which a general boost is to be made all over the city" and that the "only thing that is holding them off from making a simultaneous advance is fear that the State's Attorney might cause indictments to be voted against them on charges of conspiracy to increase the price of a staple commodity," the charge published by the World of this city makes interesting reading. A painstaking investigation, such is the declaration of the World, indicates that the greed of the big companies is the cause of the advance in the price of milk. These concerns have increased capitalization, competition is costly and directors are determined to pay large dividends; the consumer must pay the price. The milk producer is not to blame. The price paid him has increased because of the greater cost of production, but not in fair comparison with what the milk dealers charge. The railroads, too, exact their toll, but after due allowance is made for the increased amount paid to the farmer for his milk and to the railroads for freight, the milk dealers have to face an advance of less than a third of a cent per quart bottle while the consumer is compelled to pay a cent more and may expect to pay two cents more.

The statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor show that internal trade improved greatly in September of this year, principally in iron, bituminous coal, coke and flour. Compared with September, 1908, there was a falling off in live stock, packing-house products and grain. Lumber in the Central and Southern States improved; on the Atlantic and Pacific Coast it fell off. Cotton moved showed an improvement; cotton ginned of 1909 crop declined. The total number of freight-cars handled was 2,993,003, 10% better than in 1907. A shortage of cars is developing. Foreign trade was as follows: Imports September, 1909, $120,971,475 against $98,427,984 in 1908. Exports $153,889,357, against $139,327,205. Imports for 9 months ending September, 1909, were $1,068,548,810, against $798,498,698 for 9 months ending September, 1908. Exports for the same period of 1909 $1,160,810,807, against $1,230,967,349, for the same period of 1908. Though exports for the nine months of 1909 are below those of the same period of 1908, September shows a general increase over September, 1908. Exports to Europe being 8% better; to Asia and Oceanica, over 10%; and to North America, 26%. The increase in imports is due in part to the increased duties on certain articles in the revised tariff that has just gone into effect.

For the first time in twenty-five years wheat is over 40 shillings a quarter, old English wheat selling at 43 shillings. There seems to be no prospect of lower prices for some time to come. Wheat growing being therefore profitable once more, it is probable that much land now used for grazing will be brought under the plough. This will help to the settlement of more than one political or social question. At the Bombay Presidency Agricultural Conference the Lieut.-Governor pointed out that 290,000 natives have to be fed and this must put a limit to cotton-growing and industrial expansion unless agriculture be greatly developed. It is not enough for the government to provide irrigation. Antiquated methods must be abandoned. These facts taken in connection with these others that the grain exports of the United States are diminishing and the limit of Canadian production can be conjectured, go to show that the wheat supply is going to be a problem that will affect very materially the commercial world.

Senator Aldrich, Chairman of the Monetary Commission, now studying the financial system of the country preparatory to radical changes which the money troubles of two years ago seem to make necessary, began a two weeks' tour during which he will consult with the leading business men of the West. The Senator will deliver addresses in Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Omaha, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Milwaukee and Detroit. He explains that the plans of the Commission concern the entire country and that he wishes, therefore, to ascertain the sentiment of the West as well as of the East before the changes suggested be definitely accepted and put into execution.

Report has it that the Santa Fe Railway System is dickering for the ship lines to fight its great rival the Southern Pacific. For a week or more George T. Nicholson, Third Vice-President of the Santa Fe, is reported to have been going over the books of the Atlantic, Gulf and West Indies Steamship lines, the Coastwise Steamer Trust organized by C. W. Morse, and it is believed that on his report, likely to be a favorable one, the Santa Fe's directors will act. With control of this line of steamers the system would strike at the California fruit monopoly now held by the Southern Pacific. The steamship line would also give to the Santa Fe a route from Galveston to New York, from which point it has been thus far barred.

For the first time since 1879 a United States Government bond with a fixed maturity changed hands last week for less than its face value. Under pressure of continuous sales of small blocks of bonds by National banks, government bonds declined below par. Sales of Panama 2s were made at 99%, and the 2s of 1930 sold as low as 100 1-16. In the absence of Secretary MacVeagh officials of the Treasury Department were unwilling to discuss the drop. Probably no action will be taken in the contingency before the Secretary's return to Washington.

Messieurs Bellini and Tosi, Italian scientists, have installed at Brescia an apparatus which they name radio-goniometered wireless telegraphy; the instrument sends the electro-magnetic waves in a given circumscribed direction. One of these instruments is to be installed at Boulogne-sur-Mer, France. These men claim to have solved the problem of independent communication and the automatic localization of the corresponding wireless station.

It is reported from France that the ministry of Finance has formed a committee of French chemists to examine the merit of various alloys of aluminum. The Minister of Finance hopes that by January 1st, 1910, he will have aluminum pieces of 5 centimes and 10 centimes in circulation. It is claimed that aluminum coin in addition to being of less weight, will be more artistic and cleanly than bronze.

The use of wireless telegraphy is advancing rapidly. The Manx steamers plying between Liverpool and Douglas Isle of Man carry a wireless apparatus and holiday seekers can send a wireless for 36 cents to their friends on either shore.

Incorporation papers of the new Inter-Continental Rubber Company, with a capital of $40,000,000 were filed at Trenton. The new company is said to be the result of a combination of all their South African rubber interests formed by Thomas F. Ryan and Daniel Guggenheim, and will be a formidable competitor of the United States Rubber Company.

The Carnegie Hero Fund commission distributed $33,000, twenty-three silver and twenty-seven bronze medals in its regular fall meeting this week. Fifty persons were rewarded for acts of bravery and illustrious conduct, of whom, with the exception of one citizen of Canada, all are residents of the United States.

EDUCATION

One of the aims of the Catholic Educational Association specially insisted upon in its annual gatherings is to foster interest in Institute work among the Catholic teaching body, religious and lay. The men who are bending the efforts of the Association to the development of the Catholic school system in this country recognize the force these conferences exert to this end. The Institute readily becomes a bond uniting teachers in the interests of Catholic education. During its round of exercises teachers draw instruction and inspiration from the lips of experienced instructors invited to address them. Enthusiasm is awakened for the ideals that belong to the vocation of the Catholic teacher, and the narrowness of mere routine work is put aside in the impulse of these ideals.

That the purpose of the Association is making rapid headway is apparent from the reports which come to us in increasing numbers every year from the various dioceses. But the other day AMERICA received a neatly edited pamphlet from far off Portland, containing the detailed proceedings of the Annual Institute of the Catholic Educational Association of Oregon. When one recalls that scarcely a generation back the State of Oregon was but a missionary field, the good tidings of the growth of Catholic Education and of the excellent results being achieved in the Catholic schools of that region is a comfort to all who realize the importance of this phase of Catholic activity. Besides a full account of the excellent program prepared for the meeting of last July, the pamphlet makes known two very useful steps already successfully taken in Catholic School evolution in the Western archdiocese under the vigilant direction of Archbishop Christie. A uniform system of text-books has been introduced following the establishment of a uniform system of grading in religious and secular branches for the schools of the archdiocese. This means that much has been accomplished in the building up of a unified system of Catholic schools in Oregon embracing all the grades from the kindergarten to the college. The Institute work already strongly entrenched among the teachers of the archdiocese, will be a powerful help to meet to the full every educational demand of the Catholic school population.

"The object of the college is intellectual discipline and moral enlightenment, and it is the immediate task of those who administer the colleges of the country to find the means and organization by which that object can be attained." The words contain the answer of President Woodrow Wilson, of Princeton, to the question: What is a College for? which he puts in the latest number of Scribner's Magazine, and they suggest as well one of the problems facing educators to-day. The answer and the suggestion follow a remarkably sane and conservative analysis of the divergent opinions held in our time concerning the scope and purpose of college training. It does one good to note that so prominent a leader as President Wilson finds reason in the examination of modern life and the assessment of the part an educated man ought to play in it to cling to the old-time notion of the aim of college education. It must tend not to specializing but to broad general training,—to quote Mr. Wilson's own words: "It is for the training of men who are to rise above the ranks. . . It must subject its men to a general intellectual training which will be narrowed to no one point of view, to no one vocation or calling. It must release and quicken as many faculties of the mind as possible, and not only release and quicken, but discipline and strengthen them by putting them to the best of systematic labor." The reason why this appreciation of the scope of college work has ceased to hold place in so many minds, is because within the past ten or twelve years side issues which have come to be known as "undergraduate activities" have become the vital realities of nine out of every ten men who go to college. These embrace social, athletic, musical, dramatic, literary and other organizations which absorb the attention of the average college man to the practical exclusion of the essential object of college work and training. The development which has led to disastrous overturning of the old time usefulness of the college is traced by President Wilson in convincing manner to the evolution of our latter-day fraternity chapters and houses. His statement of the surprising influence of their growth upon college life is singularly keen and his conclusion entirely just and fair. How he will settle the problem he himself proposes and which deals with the subordination of the side issues to their proper secondary place in the activities of student life; how this may be done without casting the side issues out or discrediting them utterly is a topic we trust Mr. Woodrow will speedily find leisure to discuss as freely and as satisfactorily as he has succeeded in doing in regard to the subject matter of his present paper.

Another report of diocesan school work is contained in the October number of the Parish School Bulletin recently received from Columbus, Ohio. This latest issue of the Bulletin, edited by Rev. F. W. Howard, the Secretary of the Catholic Educational Association since its organization, is given up to a gratifying summary of the work accomplished in the seventh annual meeting of the teachers and principals of the Columbus Diocese. The meeting took place in the Cathedral school and with few exceptions all the diocesan schools were represented.

DRAMATIC NOTES

The New Theatre.—The opening of the New Theatre on Monday evening last, November 8th, was the most notable event of the dramatic week with "Antony and Cleopatra" for the first performance. The New Theatre is a departure in the American theatrical world and is in part an endowed institution and in part dependent upon public patronage. It has a declared ideal and mission to make the theatre the best possible expression of histrionic art and to lead as an educational influence in forming a public appreciation of the highest in theatrical production. Here according to its projection is to be the home of the ideal in the theatrical world in America. The element of commercialism, namely, the making of the theatre a mere instrument of profit, which has of recent years led to such debasement of the stage, has no place in the managerial consideration. That this standard may be lived up to is devoutly to be hoped, and with the splendid financial backing at the command of the New Theatre, there is every reason to believe that it will fulfil its purpose. It will be conducted as a repertory theatre with a stock company, a plan long in vogue many years ago, which produced many admirable actors.

On Saturday afternoon last the ceremony of turning over the New Theatre to the management took place before a notable gathering of literateurs, artists, actors, educators and civic functionaries. Governor Hughes made an address whose theme was the place of the theatre in a democracy. Its key-note was admirably expressed in the following extract:

"This is not a dramatic club. It is not intended to be for the entertainment of the few. Its purpose is not to provide exclusive privileges. This should be regarded as the people's theatre, making an appeal to the intelligent public; and it should be generously supported by the public. We cannot conceive of a state of society in which the dramatic instinct of our nature should not have play. It is impossible to view otherwise than with solicitude a careless and indifferent attitude on the part of the intelligent members of the community toward dramatic representation.

"In aristocratic communities the great importance of having adequate opportunity for the development of the fine arts, and for the encouragement of the drama, has been abundantly recognized; but that development and that encouragement are far more necessary in democratic America than in any aristocratic community. We want to have prosperity and wide diffusion of prosperity; but in order that prosperity and material gain shall not prove a curse instead of a blessing, we must do all we can to promote the refining influences of life—proper means of recreation, wholesome enjoyment, the cultivation of those capacities for delight and pleasure, which alone make the gains of prosperity a blessing to the human soul."

Senator Root in his address dwelt upon the higher standard which the financial backing of the new enterprise enabled its managers to set.

"Here," he said "is comparative independence of the sheriff, to enable the managers with cheerful souls to give us the best plays well acted; to give us the good old plays with which history and tradition and the memory of some of us associate the names of great actors; to give us the good new plays all the more readily produced because of the new spur of better opportunity for the stage and the audience; here can be found enjoyment which leaves no bad taste in the mouth; here the managers may snap their fingers at the sensational and meretricious; and here for many and many a year, while the brilliancy of these decorations grows dim, while the founders pass away, and new audiences throng the aisles, and occupy the seats, many and many a year shall be exerted to the full the beneficent influence of the acted drama upon the minds, the morals, and the manners of our people. It is a good cause, bravely undertaken, and the men who have espoused it are entitled to the hearty thanks of all of us."

Under such auspices the promise of the rehabilitation of the stage to better standards may be looked for. The steady debasement of the theatre in the past decade has been a source of sorrow and amazement to the lovers of histrionic art, and the return to higher things in the establishment of a theatrical institution with the lofty purposes of the New Theatre is more than welcome to an intelligent public sadly abused and neglected in recent years by the dominant note of meretriciousness in the theatrical world.

"The Builder of Bridges," Hudson Theatre.—A play constructed upon a theme whose motive is excellent but whose method is morally oblique. A brother embezzles and a sister seeks to shield him by pretending to love a man, who can condone the brother's offence, while she is plighted to another, whom at first she really loves. This is simply preaching that the end justifies the means. The heroine's devotion to her brother is admirable enough, but her treachery to her betrothed and her deceit and trickery in engaging the affections of an honest man, whom she had no intention of marrying is palpable and gross. Despite the cleverness with which the plot is worked out, the resulting impression is anything but pleasant, redeemed somewhat by a savory sprinkling of wit and humor.

"Idols," Bijou Theatre.—Mr. Wm. J. Locke's story of the same name loosely dramatized. One of two friends is accused of a murder, and the web of circumstantial evidence is fatally woven about him. When he is about to be convicted, the wife of his friend, whose life, the accused had once saved, establishes an alibi for him by falsely swearing that he was with her at the time of the murder, thus destroying her own reputation and shattering the faith of her husband. The solution finally comes in the admission of the accused man's wife—for he has been secretly married—that he was with her when the crime was committed. As in "The Builder of Bridges," we have here also the plea that the end justifies the means, a sentiment that neither on the stage nor in the world of reality will pass muster under ethical scrutiny.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

Kindly give the true version of the story in Browning's "The Ring and the Book," in which Pope Stephen VII. is said to have had the body of his predecessor, Formosus, dug up, tried in his pontifical robes and condemned to be beheaded etc., etc.; Pope Theodore in turn condemning Stephen, later popes condemning the one or the other and so on, ad infinitum. 'Tis of course, an old and oft repeated "story" and I presume an oft refuted one, but I can't lay my hand on a refutation.—M. G. K., Sacramento, Cal., October 23d.

The writer can find the details of this incident in any church history—Alzog's for instance. A brief and lucid narrative of the episode is given in the sixth volume of "The Catholic Encyclopedia" (Robert Appleton Co., New York) under the title "Formosus".—Ed. AMERICA.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

On November 4 the bishops of the province of Dubuque met to select the names for candidates recommended for the coadjutorship of the archdiocese of Dubuque.

On last Wednesday the Holy Father, Pius X, commemorated the silver jubilee of his episcopate. He was consecrated Bishop of Mantua, on Nov. 10, 1884.

Bishop Foley on Oct. 30 blessed the new monastery of the Blessed Sacrament of the Sisters of St. Dominic, Detroit. This is the third foundation of this strictly cloistered congregation, the others being at Newark, N. J., and Hunt's Point, New York.

A public meeting, at which Archbishop Farley presided, was held at Cathedral College, on Friday evening, Nov. 13, to explain to the Catholic men of New York the nature and scope of retreats and to enlist their support for the erection of a permanent House of Retreats.

In succession to the Right Rev. Mgr. Farrelly, consecrated Bishop of Cleveland, the Rev. Bernard J. Mahoney of Albany, N. Y., has been appointed Spiritual Director of the American College, Rome. Father Mahoney is an alumnus of the college and since his ordination in 1904, he has been an assistant at St. Peter's Church, Troy, N. Y.

At the dedication of the New Barbour Hall, at Kalamazoo, Mich., on Oct. 27, his excellency Mgr. Falconio, the Apostolic Delegate, presided and Bishop Colton, of Buffalo, N. Y., preached the sermon. Bishops Koudelka, Muldoon and a number of prominent civic officials were also present at the ceremony by which Dean O'Brien added a very important accession to the educational facilities of the city.

As no suitable house, easily accessible to the city has yet been found by the Director of the Retreats for Laymen, it has been decided to continue them during the winter at the Jesuit villa at Keyser Island. This island is beautifully situated on the Sound, and is only one hour by train from the Grand Central depot. Those who have made the Retreats there found it a delightful change and conducive in every way not only to the healthful rest of mind and body, but also to the spiritual reflection. The retreats to take place before Christmas will open on November 26th and December 17th. The dates for the others will be announced later. As the number of retreatants will be limited, applications should be made in due time to the Director, Rev. T. J. Shealy, S.J., 801 W. 181st St., New York.

—The Golden Jubilee of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul was a notable celebration in New Orleans, where the society has had a distinguished history, and has at present an active Council in every parish. It was founded in 1859 by William Blair Lancaster who, while studying in Paris, became a convert to the faith and learned the workings of the organization from the disciples of Ozanam. It has grown to large proportions and the most distinguished citizens take an active part in its silent work of benevolence. During the yellow fever plagues the heroism of its members won for the society the peculiar reverence with which it is still regarded in New Orleans. The members prepared for the Jubilee by a three-days' retreat, given by Rev. E. Mattern, S.J., and on the morning of the celebration all received holy communion at the hands of His Grace, Archbishop Blenk, assisted by Bishop Allen, of Mobile, and Bishop Meerschaert of Oklahoma. Congratulatory letters were received from Cardinal Gibbons and the President-General of the Society in Paris, and a special blessing from the Pope.

By Apostolic Letters issued on October 4, feast of St. Francis of Assisi, Pope Pius X decrees the perpetual observance of certain principles and practices by the Seraphic Order. The First Order (of men) is declared one, as far as founder and rule are concerned; but with regard to government and laws it consists of three recognized religious families. The Order of Friars Minor (O. F. M.) is the name applied to the union effected by Leo XIII among those who had until then been styled Observantines, Reformed, Alcantarines, and Recollects. The title of their superior, "Minister General of the whole Order of Minors," gives no jurisdiction or power over the other two recognized families, though he takes precedence in public functions. The Order of Minors Conventual (O. M. C.) and the Order of Minors Capuchin (O. M. Cap.) are declared as coming by legitimate and unbroken descent from St. Francis. Hence the three families are equal in antiquity and origin. The tertiaries are to be styled "Franciscan Tertiaries" without any addition; and the three ministers general are of equal authority in establishing them and in communicating to them the various Apostolic indulgences, graces and favors.

OBITUARY

In Washington, D. C., on Nov. 4, died Brig. Gen. John J. Coppinger, son-in-law of the late James G. Blaine, a soldier of wide experience and a Christian gentleman of splendid repute throughout the many changes his experience brought to him. He was born in Queenstown, Ireland, on October 11, 1834. Educated in a private school, he early won a commission in an English regiment raised for service in the Crimean war, but the close of hostilities before his regiment had been despatched to the seat of war prevented him from doing active duty in that conflict. The call for volunteers for the Papal army when the Sardinian army attacked the Pope's dominions gave him better opportunity. As trooper in the Zouaves, young Coppinger won distinction for his heroism during the unequal struggle with the forces of Victor Emmanuel; he was rewarded with a lieutenancy and was created a Knight of St. Gregory by the venerable Pontiff in whose service he fought with gallant bravery. Coming to this country at the outbreak of the Civil war, on the recommendation of Archbishop Hughes, the future General was commissioned Captain in the 14th Infantry regiment and joined the Army of the Potomac in July, 1862. With few exceptions Gen. Coppinger took part in all the engagements of the many campaigns of that division of the Federal Army up to the surrender of Lee, and was honorably mustered out of the service upon the close of hostilities, having finally attained the rank of Colonel of volunteers for gallant and meritorious conduct. Returning to the regular army upon its reorganization Gen. Coppinger saw much service in the Indian wars in the West, was promoted through the various grades for distinguished work as an officer in that trying field and was made Colonel of the Twenty-third Infantry in 1891. President Cleveland raised him to the rank of Brigadier-General in 1895. When the war with Spain began Gen. Coppinger was made a Major-General of volunteers and placed in command of the Fourth Army Corps at Huntsville, Ala. He reached the age limit of service Oct. 11, 1898, on which date he was placed on the retired list. Washington has been his home since his retirement. Gen. Coppinger was an edifying Catholic; the loyalty which in his youth had led him to join the "forlorn hope" gathered about the standard of Pius IX, accompanying him through his years of valiant service in the army of his adopted country.

Solemn funeral services were held at St. Matthew's Church, Washington, D. C., over the remains, and full military honors marked the interment in the National cemetery at Arlington. Cardinal Gibbons celebrated the Requiem Mass.

James McGovern, who for nearly a quarter of a century has been one of the best known men in New York's financial centre, and for several terms one of the governing committee of the Stock Exchange, died on November 6, after a long illness. He was born in Brooklyn, Aug. 31, 1854, and worked his way up the financial ladder from the bottom rung. He was actively interested in a number of Catholic charities and enterprises where his zealous cooperation and wise counsel will be much missed by his associates.

John J. Johnson, a prominent merchant and Catholic of Milwaukee, brother of the Rev. David M. Johnson, S.J., of Chicago, died on Oct. 29, aged 53 years.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

A CORRECTION.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I find in the politico-religious review of Hungary from the pen of Father A. Bangha, a few mistakes which, considering the importance of your publication and its enviable correctness of information together with its influence in the newspaperdom of our country, I am confident, occurred through oversight only.

There are no Ruthenians disturbed in northeastern Hungary in consequence of the revival of an old law forbidding the use of their language in the State school. The disturbed elements are not Ruthenians, but Roumanians. Then, it is not reasonable that the German language should be the medium of instruction in school, for the simple reason that the German language has nothing to do with this question.

The official language of Hungary being Magyar, it is only reasonable that the medium of education should be Magyar.

It appears that the reverend writer is under the impression that owing to the political sisterhood of Hungary to Austria the language of the country is German. It is a common mistake of all who have not been in Hungary.

The Roumanian bishops have taken steps to oppose Count Apponyi's measure prescribing the Magyar language as the medium for the instruction of religion in the Roumanian national schools. The reason of this very unjust law must have had its origin in some political scare caused by some imprudent word or other persistent indiscretion perpetrated by the Roumanian clerics, and objected to by the State authorities, who jealously guard against any aspirations threatening the unity of the Hungarian commonwealth.

CHRONICLE

The President Completes His Trip.—Wilmington, N. C., welcomed Mr. Taft with the same hearty hospitality that has marked his entire tour through the South. On Wednesday the President faced northward. Richmond, Va., was the last stopping place on his itinerary and nowhere was his reception more cordial than in the Capital of the late Confederacy. In the final speech of his trip Mr. Taft indicated some of the recommendations his first annual message to Congress will contain. He favored appropriations for the reclamation of arid lands and the conservation of water-power sites and mineral lands; he would ask for the arrangement of the departments of the Government in a way to make more effective enforcement of the Anti-Trust Law; amendments to the Interstate Commerce law were needed to give the Interstate Commerce tribunal more power and to prevent delays incident to appeals to the courts; he professed himself strongly in favor of a postal savings bank; he was hopeful that the monetary commission now studying financial reform would so present its report of conditions here and in Europe, as to point out steps which may be taken to reform what is "certainly today nothing but a patchwork"; legal procedure must be improved so as to make it, in criminal and civil cases alike, more simple, more rapid and less expensive; a Federal Health Bureau should be organized. "That is a pretty long list of things to do," he concluded, "but if we set our shoulders together we can do a lot in one or two sessions of Congress." With the characteristic tact which has done so much to win him popularity in the South, the President expressed his deep sympathy in the movement to erect a great memorial in honor of Gen. Robert E. Lee by the establishment of what he himself would value most highly, a great school of engineering at Washington and Lee University, and he proclaimed his desire to aid it in every way. "We have reached a point," said Mr. Taft, "I am glad to declare, when the North can admire to the full the heroes of the South, and the South admire to the full the heroes of the North." On Wednesday night Mr. Taft arrived in Washington where he expressed himself as immensely pleased with the journey and not too tired to stay out a couple of weeks longer, were he not impatient to get back to his family. The chief impression remaining with the President after his remarkable tour covering more than 14,000 miles was thus described in a brief address to representatives of the press whilst in Richmond: "The trip just made has been full of gratification to me, for I have been received with the utmost cordiality everywhere. We are an industrious, loyal people, and every class is anxious to show its hospitality to, and interest in, the man who for the time being represents the head of the Government."

The A. F. L. on the Contempt Case.—In Toronto, First Vice-President James Duncan of the American Federation of Labor presented to the full convention of the organization the committee report in the matter of the recent decision of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia approving the jail sentence of Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison, as chronicled last week in AMERICA. The report recommends that a further appeal be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. The report says: "We cannot permit these decisions to go unchallenged. They affect fundamental rights, and either the courts or Congress must safeguard them. We hold that the ordinary use of the injunction writ in contentions between workers and employers is an unwarrantable interference with the rights and liberties of the workers, and is intended and is used to intimidate workers, especially when they are engaged in a struggle for improved working conditions."

The Sugar Trust Prosecution.—In the matter of the frauds charged against the Sugar Trust, President Taft has agreed that Attorney-General Wickersham shall invoke the aid of the Supreme Court and push an appeal from Judge Holt's decision that the statute of limitation saves the Sugar Trust Directors from further prosecution. Meanwhile new indictments were found last week by the Federal grand jury alleging conspiracy to defraud the Government by false weighing of sugar at the Williamsburg docks on November 20, 1907. Those indicted are James F. Bendernagel, until quite recently general superintendent of the Williamsburg refinery of the American Sugar Refining Company, and six other employees of the Sugar Trust already awaiting trial on other charges. It appears that the cheating centred at this refinery. Just before the indictment of the former superintendent had been announced it became known that the Arbuckle Brothers' firm, the chief rival of the Sugar Trust in the sugar importing trade, had been for some days arranging to pay a big sum to the Government in order to make good duties on sugar which the authorities claimed had been underweighed.

Other Events of the Week.—The recommendation of the joint army and navy board that Pearl Harbor in the Hawaiian Islands be made the great naval station in the Pacific has been approved by President Taft. A temporary naval station only will be constructed at Olongapo in the Philippines and the proposed improvement in Manila harbor will be abandoned. Protection of the Philippine Islands will be left to the army.—Through carelessness fire broke out in the mine of the St. Paul Coal Company's mine at Cherry, Ill., an explosion followed and flames spread to all the workings. To subdue the flames the mine entrance was hermetically sealed after twenty-five workers had escaped and twelve bodies had been taken out. Great loss of life is feared, since but 80 of the 484 of the day-shift at work at the outbreak of the fire have been accounted for.

The Panama Canal.—Colonel Goethals, engineer in charge of the work on the canal, has prepared an estimate of $48,000,000 for 1910 in order to push the building of the canal during the coming year. Members of the Congressional Committee on Appropriations are now in Panama to investigate conditions preparatory to their report on the estimate asked for. According to one of them, the committee is determined to cut expenses in the civil administration and medical department so as to save $1,000,000 a year.

Storms in the Caribbean Sea.—The first news from Jamaica following the interruption of cable service during the violent storms of last week reports that a continuous deluge of rain had cut the island off from the rest of the world for the space of six days. The rain fall averaged ten inches a day; on one day thirteen inches fell. Telegraphic communication was possible only with the western part of the island, the land wires were down and the stations of the cable companies are badly damaged. Communication between Kingston and the interior of the island has been broken since November 6. The property loss has been enormous and great loss of life is apprehended. The Washington Weather Bureau anticipates no trouble along the Atlantic Coast from the disturbance, the officials believing that the storm will continue its course across the Bahamas and into the North Atlantic. Steamers arriving in New York from West Indian ports on Saturday brought reports of hard buffeting by waves and heavy weather during the trip with wind at hurricane velocity; they did not run clear of the storm after leaving Havana until well past Hatteras Cape.

Great Britain.—The County Council elections have left parties practically unchanged, the more conservative parties retaining the great advantage they gained three years ago. The Socialists lost ground in most places where they nominated candidates, especially in Glasgow. —A deputation of discharged soldiers out of work, headed by a Mr. Edmondson, late sergeant-major of the Twenty-first Hussars, was received lately by Mr. Haldane, Secretary for War. They demanded work in a very threatening way, their leader saying that five thousand such soldiers were out of work in London, and if the Government would not find work for them, he would know how to employ that number of trained men. Mr. Haldane treated them with great forbearance and dismissed them with the assurance that the Government had done and would do all it could for them. This did not satisfy them, and a procession of unemployed soldiers and others marched past the war-office to Trafalgar Square, where violent speeches were made and at a meeting at Battersea Mr. Hyndman, a Socialist leader, made a most insolent attack upon the Secretary for War. —Sir Robert Perks, a leading Nonconformist, who virtually dictated the first Education Bill of the present Government, has refused to support the ministry any longer on account of its socialistic tendencies.—Lord Charles Beresford is again in conflict with the Government, alleging that the Admiralty, in spite of a promise to the contrary, has discriminated against the officers who testified in his favor before the Commission on the state of the Navy, and that some who served on his personal staff have been treated in the same way. He will stand as a Unionist Tariff Reform candidate in East Marylebone at the next election.—Mr. Belloc asked the Foreign Secretary in the House of Commons whether the Government had received any information through the consuls abroad or from foreign governments concerning the burying alive of a native by a Belgian official of the Congo, for which the Secretary of the Congo Reform Association vouched. The Secretary answered that nothing of the kind had been reported to the Foreign office.—W. P. Frith, R. A., has just died in his ninety-second year. His pictures of crowds of the comfortable classes were very popular in the middle of the last century. Of them the most famous were Ramsgate Sands, The Railway Station and The Derby Day.—The King completed his sixty-eighth year on November 9.

Valuable Records for Canada.—The British War office has presented to the Canadian Government the original correspondence sent by successive Governors-General of Canada to the British authorities from 1791 to 1840, when Upper and Lower Canada were separately administered. The causes which led to the war of 1812 and the events of that war are fully dealt with. The relations which preceded the signing of the convention of 1818, which regulated the privileges of the United States in British North American fisheries, receive much attention in these records. Dr. Doughty, the Dominion archivist, when interviewed on the 9th inst. about this valuable gift, said these papers will have the effect of modifying some data hitherto considered historically accurate, which concern both Canada and the United States.

Opening of Canada's Parliament.—On November 11 the second session of the eleventh Parliament of Canada was opened by Earl Grey. Ordinarily the Senators and Commoners confine themselves to the routine ceremonies of this great function, in which the principal figure is the Governor-General, representing the King. But the fact that Mr. R. L. Borden, leader of the opposition, chose to question the Government not only upon the American tariff but also upon the project of establishing a Canadian navy shows how keen is the interest in this session and how vital to Canada are the issues to be debated. The speech from the throne, read by His Excellency the Governor-General in English and French, touched on the steady and progressive growth of Canada during the past year; mentioned that the revenue had almost completely regained what it had lost in the recent period of depression; noted the revival of activity in nearly every branch of business; announced that a bill would be introduced for the organization of a Canadian naval service on the lines of the resolution of the Canadian House of Commons of March 29 last, and that Parliament would be asked to confirm the "new convention between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic respecting the commercial relations between France and Canada, approved by the French legislative chambers"; stated that the transcontinental railway has made substantial advance during the year and has now reached a point 861 miles west of Winnipeg; said that a bill would be submitted enabling the Minister of Railways to lease any line, or lines, that connect with the International Railway; and concluded by informing Parliament that a measure would be proposed "for the purpose of rendering more effective the present legislation regarding combinations which unduly enhance prices."

Protest Against Canadian Navy.—The most notable event of the past week in Canadian politics is Mr. F. D. Monk's speech at the banquet tendered to him by the Conservative Association of Lachine in the County of Jacques-Cartier, which he represents in the House of Commons at Ottawa. His views, which were endorsed by Senator Landry, Bruno Nantel, M. P., and J. M. Tellier, M. L. A., and were enthusiastically cheered by the guests, may be summed up as follows: It is the most important question since Mr. Monk's entry into the political arena, and should not be dealt with until after an appeal to the electorate. Why this secrecy in the recent Imperial Conference, in which Mr. Brodeur and Sir Frederick Borden took part? In view of the cost of necessary and urgent public works, the expense of a Canadian navy is at present beyond Canada's means, and this excessive cost becomes more striking when compared with Canada's lack of need for naval protection. Mr. Monk quoted authorities to weaken the contention that Canada rests under an obligation to provide a navy for the defence of all parts of the Empire. A military or naval consolidation for the Empire would be fatal to the principle of self-government. Mr. R. L. Borden, leader of the opposition, being greatly embarrassed by this strong protest of his ablest lieutenant, Mr. Monk, has assembled a caucus of Conservatives at Ottawa to discuss the future attitude of the party when the Government shall bring down its proposals. At the conclusion of the discussion in caucus, Mr. Borden announced that no decision had been reached. The Conservative party does not see eye to eye on this matter, but it is in favor of aggressive hostility to what has been forecasted as the probable Government measure.

American Tonnage Tax.—The reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States with respect to harbor dues, which has been in force since 1885, has come to an end. This agreement provided that neither Canada nor the United States should collect tonnage dues on vessels plying on Lake Ontario. Under the new American tariff, however, a tax up to ten cents a ton per annum is imposed on Canadian vessels trading to ports on the Great Lakes. The new tax became effective tive last month. In view of this action on the part of the United States, Canada has decided to reimpose harbor dues on American vessels. The scale of fees, which will be collected only at ports where there are harbor-masters, will not be heavy. The maximum is five dollars on vessels of 700 tons or over, and the fee can be collected only twice a year on any vessel.

The French Bishops and Atheistic Schools.—On the 12th inst., at Nantes, France, the Catholic clergy refused absolution to Catholic children who are using, in the godless schools, text-books forbidden by the bishops. This is a fulfilment of the obligation imposed by the recent collective letter of the French episcopate. The Government has not only declined to modify the objectionable and historically mendacious text-books, but has officially instructed all teachers to punish such children as might refuse to receive their teachings and to use the prescribed text-books. The consequent conflict between the Education Department and the Catholic body has already resulted in no small demoralization of the State schools. The Teachers' Association, comprising 100,000 members, is suing all the bishops who signed the pastoral letter of last September. The suit is based on the alleged defamation contained in this letter. The plaintiffs claim five thousand francs' damages from each of the bishops who signed the letter. Mgr. Dubourg, Archbishop of Rennes, in a statement issued on the 7th inst., declares that Catholic voters must rally to the protection of the Church. "It is immaterial," he says, "whether they are Royalist, Imperialist, or Republican, we insist only that they be Catholic above everything."

Depopulation of France.—A recent number of the Journal Officiel published statistics of the movement of population in France during the first six months of this year. The total of births, as compared with last year, shows a decrease of 12,692, while the number of deaths has increased by 25,019. The population of France has, in the past six months, diminished by 28,023, a figure representing the excess of deaths over births. Mr. Jacques Bertillon, an authority on depopulation, says this plague, if not stopped, will be the ruin of his country. He attributes it to race suicide brought on by inordinate hunger for wealth and by the French testamentary law which prescribes equal division of property. He directs attention to the fact that France, which is the only European country in which the total of yearly births is diminishing, is also the only great country in which an equal division of this property is imposed by law on every testator. The first remedy would be to grant more freedom to testators. The second would be to consider the bringing up of a child as a form of state-supporting tax, and, on this principle, to diminish or cancel the taxes of families having more than three children, while imposing an extra tax of twenty per cent. on families of two or fewer children. As a corollary, adds

Mr. Bertillon, the present shameless propagation of the Malthusian doctrine should be absolutely prohibited. The time is at hand, he says, when the five poor sons of the German family will easily get the better of the only son of the French family.

The French Murder Trial.—Early last Sunday morning Madame Steinheil, the details of whose trial for the murder of her husband and stepmother were cabled all over the world, was acquitted and received an ovation. The hearings began on November 3, and dramatic scenes characterized them. During the latter days of the trial it became evident that the prisoner had a good chance of acquittal, as both the presiding judge and the advocate general sought to prove the woman's complicity in the crime rather than her guilt as the principal. No conclusive evidence was produced to fix the double murder on anyone else. The conduct of the trial by the presiding judge has been severely criticized by English and American jurists and has been strenuously defended by other legal experts.

Germany.—The press is exceedingly cordial in its references to the Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria, who with his wife, the Archduchess Sophia of Hohenberg, is now visiting Berlin as the guest of Emperor William. Though the visit of the representatives of the Austrian royalty is announced to be a family affair with no political significance, the newspapers insist upon drawing some such significance from a meeting planned to follow as closely as this does upon the recent conference of the Czar with King Victor Emmanuel. To support their position the German press quote an official declaration of the New Free Press of Vienna, in which the present visit of the heir to Austria's throne to Berlin is declared to be a conclusive proof of the close relations binding the rulers of the two German peoples. The note of cold indifference marking the references of the Berlin papers to recent conciliatory utterances of Premier Asquith and other representative Englishmen on the occasion of the celebration of King Edward's birthday is in this connection the more notable.—Throughout the Empire great enthusiasm marked the celebration of the one-hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birthday of the poet Schiller.—Not for years has Emperor William spoken as earnestly in public as he did in his recent address to this year's recruits drawn up to take the oath of loyalty to the fatherland. His remarks are considered to have a significance bearing on the European situation. "Your duty," he said to the young soldiers, "is to go wherever your Kaiser and your superior officers send you, and it makes no difference whether your task is to combat a foreign enemy or to maintain peace, order and safety in the German homeland. I earnestly hope that peace and quietness will be preserved to us in the future as in the past, and I bid you now to go to your barracks and do your duty."

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Excommunicated Comet—Whence the Myth?

If Calixtus III did not excommunicate the comet, whence came the myth? The question was proposed some months ago, and a thorough research was begun. The library of St. John Berchman's College, rich in folios of the Middle Ages, furnished material that is not at the hands of every investigator. Such facilities united to the untiring toil of the Rev. J. Thirion, S.J., director of the Astronomical Observatory of St. John Berchman's College, though better known to the scientific world as the Secretary of La Société Scientifique de Bruxelles, has resulted in the appearance of a neat booklet, bearing the title of "La Comète de Halley, son Histoire et la Légende de son Excommunication." The article appears also in the current number [October, 1909] of la Revue des Questions Scientifiques. A glance at the fruits of Father Thirion's research show that the myth is not only false but even without foundation.

The history of the myth is interesting. The French astronomers have been the chief offenders. Laplace in his "Exposition du Système du Monde" (Bk. IV; chap. iv, p. 283, edition 1829) tells us that "Calixtus ordered public prayers to conjure the Comet and the Turks." Next comes Arago, who tells us that the Pope "excommunicated at the same time the Comet and the Turks." Some years later we find Babinet writing that Calixtus "cast an anathema on the comet and on the Turks." And so the myth runs; the story is ever substantially the same—conjure changes into excommunicate, and this is replaced by anathematize, but for the writer they express the same idea.

So far no one gives an authority for the myth he has quoted. Robert Grant, however, is a little bolder, telling us that "Pope Calixtus II (sic) ordered prayers . . . He issued also a Bull in which he anathematized both the Turks and the comet" (History of Physical Astronomy, London, 1852, p. 305). We now have solid ground to work upon; there is a Bull of Calixtus excommunicating the comet. But Grant does not say where he read this Bull, and he has good reason for not naming the Bull, for no such Bull exists. The "Bullarium Romanum" was searched, the Bulls of Calixtus III, read, but not a word about the comet was found.

Next we find Dr. Andrew Dickson White ("History of the Warfare between Science and Theology in Christendom," London, 1896) writing: "no such Bull is to be found in the published Bullarium." So far we have an advance in the way of the truth; unhappily he adds: "Then, too, was incorporated into a litany the plea 'from the Turk and the Comet, good Lord deliver us.'" Simon Newcomb ("Popular Astronomy," London, 1878) gives the same story of prayers ordered against the comet. "This," he says, "is supposed to be the circumstance which gave rise to the popular myth of the Pope's Bull against the comet."

A careful research of the letters of Calixtus III showed that no prayers were ever ordered by Papal authority against the comet. Whence then this second myth? Chas. De Smedt, S.J., (Revue des Questions Scientifiques, Jan., 1877, p. 177) gives us the answer. "We believe," he says, "that the first offender was François Bruys, born in Mâconnais in 1708, who, after abjuring Catholicism to join the Reformed Church, published at The Hague (1732-1734) his book, 'Histoire des papes, depuis Saint Pierre jusqu' à Benoit XIII.'" Bruys quotes in the said history, "Platina, Vita Calixti, p. 283," as the authority for the myth in question. At last we are back to a contemporary of Calixtus III. Let us take a glance at Platina. If we read the work entitled "Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, tomi 3i pars altera, Calixti papae III Vita a B. Sacho e Vico Platina" we shall find a single paragraph in which Platina speaks of the Comet, of the pestilence then raging in Rome and of the Turks; he ends the paragraph by saying that the Pope (Calixtus) ordered prayers that God might help those fighting against the Turk. Those were days of great suffering in Rome; when Halley's Comet appeared in 1456, there was the famine, the pestilence and the hardships of war. As was the wont in like times, processions were undertaken and litanies sung. Perhaps some local priest may have added to the litany he said the plea: "From the Turk and the comet, good Lord deliver us"; but there is no historical proof. However we do know that such a plea was never ordered by papal authority.

Another contemporary of Calixtus III, St. John Capistrano, who was preaching the Crusade at that time, declared that the comet was a sign of God's help to the Christian host in their war against the Turk. With such an assertion preached everywhere—for a Crusade preacher covered much ground—it seems hardly likely that the folk would pray: "from the Turk and the Comet, good Lord deliver us."

Such is the fruit of historical research, the excommunication of Halley's comet is a myth and nothing more. Let us hope that it may no longer return with the periodicity of the comet to which it clings like a satellite.

Gin and Rum in Southern Nigeria

The British merchant carries on a large trade in his colony of Southern Nigeria, much of which consists in exchanging cheap gin and rum for the products of the interior of the country. The missionaries of the Church of England protest that the gin and the rum are poisonous and are destroying the native tribes; and as they have bishops in the colony to formulate their complaints and societies at home to back them, the Government appointed a Commission of Inquiry. This has made a report according to which the black man finds in the gin and the rum not a curse but a real blessing. They are so cheap that they can carry an immense import duty without becoming unreasonably dear; and so the colony's revenue is provided for without recourse to direct taxation which he holds in abhorrence. On the other hand, there are no grounds for supposing that he injures his health by drinking; for as a matter of fact he uses much of these liquors not as a beverage, but as currency. On the Congo, Belgian malice may compel the wretched natives to accept as a medium of exchange cotton cloth, guns, beads, etc.: the happier Nigerians pass from hand to hand throughout the country bottles of gin and rum, without any fear that a sudden fall in spirits will bring them to poverty.

We are told, moreover, that as those bottles accumulate in the hands of a thrifty black, he stores them in his treasury. They are his wealth, as flocks and herds and guns and powder and lead and cloth are the riches of less favored Africans. One might ask, what intrinsic quality is there in the gin and rum he drinks so rarely and so moderately to make the Nigerian prize it above other goods? But the Commission no longer exists to answer. Its report, however, gives a very remarkable piece of information concerning them. The cheapness of their production is no reason for presuming deficiency in their quality. The rum and gin, prepared in Holland and Germany for his black brother by the benevolent British merchant, have this extraordinary character (the miraculous result, no doubt, of the benevolence of the British merchant, who is no sordid Dutchman), that the more cheaply they are produced the purer and more wholesome they are. A silly rumor spread by the missionaries represented the chiefs of the interior as protesting against the introduction of these wonderful liquors into their land. The Commission took great pains to get at the truth of the matter, and discovered that the missionaries have been guilty of gross misrepresentation. The fact is that Nigeria is being civilized, and with "civilization on its luminous wings" has come into the country the objection to supertaxation now so prevalent in England. What the chiefs really objected to was the tremendous duty, 300 per cent. charged at Lagos, and the setting up of a license system in their territories. In other words, they wanted liquor, they wanted it as near cost price as possible, and they wanted plenty of it—to store away, of course, as accumulated wealth.

If the Commission's description of the drinking customs of the Nigerians be true, Tom Pinch punishing the Pecksniff currant wine was, compared with them, a desperate toper indeed. "At plays and visits a small glass of gin is handed round, and after the fathers and mothers have drunk from the glass, a sip is given to the children." Their ancestors, the blameless Ethiopians, feasting Zeus and the Olympians, would have marvelled at such moderation. With a single bottle one might entertain a tribe and have something over. No wonder the wealth of gin and rum accumulates. Moreover, the sending of spirits into Nigeria is nothing new. For two hundred years and more before the beginnings of modern African trade there were in England African merchants shipping their goods to what is now Southern Nigeria, but was then the Slave Coast. To-day they buy the negroes' rubber and ivory; in the old times they bought the negroes themselves. But then, as now, the price was in great part paid in rum. How immense beyond estimation must be the stores of spirits in the treasuries of this singular people, at once so abstemious and so greedy to possess gin and rum.

One who believes the Commission must hold that the Church of England missionaries of Nigeria, with Bishops Tugwell and Johnson at their head, are consummate liars. Bishop Tugwell asserts, and brings witnesses to prove it, that the negroes are being destroyed by alcohol; the Commissioners find them in no way deteriorating. Bishop Johnson writes to the Colonial Office that quart-bottles of gin are sold at six or seven pence each: the Commissioners report that gin is not sold in quart-bottles, and that its price is two shillings a quart. The Bishop also tells of his visit to a school at Warri. He addressed the seventy-five children present on the evils of drink and asked the habitual gin-drinkers to stand up. Sixty, out of the seventy-five, rose. He made no official record of the visit because there was no visitors' book in the school. Now come the Commissioners. They have seen with their own eyes in the visitors' book the Bishop's entry signed with his name and most complimentary to the school. The master who interpreted his speech says the question was not, "how many are habitual gin drinkers?" but, "how many have ever tasted gin?" The drinking custom just explained shows how sixty responded, and it is wonderful that the school did not rise as one boy. A missionary reported the fishing village, Iru, so demoralized by drink that he was forced to abandon his mission. The Commissioners visited it and found it in the normal Nigerian condition of exemplary sobriety. Another related that in the neighborhood of Oshogbo three chiefs had died from drink within a year. The Commissioners looked into the case and found that one died of a fall (a not unfrequent consequence of inebriety); another, of blood-poisoning (something that often happens to drunkards); and that the third never existed, which is a rather bold assertion.

The report leaves one in a dilemma. If Anglican bishops and their clergy lie so remorselessly about their own fellow-countrymen, why should not the missionaries of the Congo, inferior to them, from the English point of view, in character and education, be distrusted testifying about foreigners? If the latter are to be believed, much more should the testimony of the former be accepted. But this would bring in another difficulty. How is it that the British merchant, indifferent to the welfare of the negroes of his own colony, is so zealous for that of the Congolese? Is it because he has no trade with these? Lastly, if Commissioners visiting Nigeria fetch home a report in some things not unlike a fairy tale, it is not impossible that men who have never left England, swallow many a fairy tale about doings on the Congo. H. W.

Church Spoliation in Mexico

I

The sixteenth century was the golden age of Spanish exploration and conquest. It was also the century in which the Church, out of regard for the Spanish monarchs' zeal in spreading the Faith, granted to them so much power in ecclesiastical affairs that many questions of Church polity were examined and definitively settled by viceregal advisers or by the Spanish Council of the Indies. Disciplinary measures emanating from Rome were made subject to approval by the Council before being sent to the colonies and to the further confirmation by the Viceroy before publication.

The part taken by Ferdinand and Isabella in the propagation of the Faith elicited from Pope Alexander VI the Bull "Eximie devotionis" of November 16, 1501, in which he granted to them and to their successors the tithes of the lands that had been or should afterwards be discovered and subjected to the crown of Spain, with the proviso that the monarchs should attend to the erection and endowment of churches and the due support of the clergy.

A few years later, Pope Julius II in the Bull "Universalis ecclesiæ," dated July 28, 1508, conferred upon the Spanish monarchs the privilege of nomination to bishoprics and other church dignities in those same lands, and made the construction of "large churches" in them dependent upon the royal assent.

Wherever the Spanish explorers penetrated, missionaries accompanied them. Two priests were with Cortés when he burned his ships and took up his march towards the plateau of Anáhuac, and many others, both diocesan and regular, soon entered the new fields opened up by his prowess. Though representatives of various religious orders flocked to New Spain, as Mexico was then called, the Franciscans, Dominicans and Augustinians became particularly numerous and influential. The first bishop was Julian Garcés, a Dominican, with his chair at Tlascala, removed later to Puebla de los Angeles; next came Juan de Zumárraga, a Franciscan, who took his title from the capital. Church affairs went on so prosperously that within seventy years from the Conquest, there were some 800 religious houses and pastoral residences about evenly divided between regular and diocesan priests, besides ten convents of nuns. In disposing of the tithes, the Government assigned one-half to the ordinary of the diocese, one-sixth for church buildings and hospitals, two-ninths for parish priests and their assistants, and kept for itself the remaining ninth.

The contributions made in accordance with the famous "Bula de la Cruzada" extended to the Spanish dominions by Julius II in 1509, but not generally operative in Mexico until 1532, were devoted by the royal officers to religious propaganda and worship. Many of the provisions of this Bull are still in force throughout Latin America. In other ways, too, the Government promoted religion, as by protecting the missionaries, by furnishing supplies in kind from the public stores, and by a modest annual allowance. However, the "Pious Fund of the Californias," about which so much was written in connection with the award of the Tribunal of The Hague, was not a government undertaking. It owed its origin to Father Juan M. Salvatierra, S.J., whose pleading induced various wealthy citizens, both clerical and lay, to contribute towards an enterprise which was then threatened with ruin on account of the remoteness and poverty of the mission.

Though, during the centuries of Spanish domination, natives had been promoted to Church dignities now and then, towards the end of the eighteenth century nearly every ecclesiastical position of dignity and influence in Mexico was in the hands of some Spaniard who owed his office to the king. The parish priests, who were largely creoles, pure Indians or mestizos (of mixed blood), were selected by the Viceroy. The native priests, feeling that they were being kept down or thrust aside for the benefit of royal favorites, became more and more estranged from the bishops, vicars and canons, and disposed to view them with cold unfriendliness if not open hostility. The laity on their side, chafing under the viceregal rule, which was sometimes tyrannical, sometimes foolish, seldom fair, were drawn closer to their priests and further from their ecclesiastical and political superiors. Then the regulars had their little differences among themselves, with the parish priests, and with the bishops. In fact, by referring so many petty religious difficulties to the Viceroys and so many others of more importance to the Council of the Indies, the clergy high and low taught the royal officials a spirit of meddlesomeness which tended to blind them to the difference between Church and State and their respective spheres.

Thanks to government aid, supplemented by the generous benefactions of the faithful, the Church had not only grand cathedrals and other places of public worship, colleges, hospitals and convents, but also productive real estate and invested funds. Ecclesiastics were wont to lend Church moneys on property almost to its full value and rest satisfied with a very moderate interest which was secured by mortgage. These loans were looked upon by both creditor and debtor as permanent investments with no question of future repayment of the sum originally advanced. Besides the offerings to the crown made by bishops and parish priests upon assuming office, the Government from time to time had for one reason or another rather urgently solicited contributions from churchmen and laymen alike who responded loyally and generously, but such gifts were always free, even if not spontaneous.

Such was the state of the Church in Mexico when the first governmental decree for the seizure of ecclesiastical property was issued. In 1767, Carlos III, for reasons which he kept "concealed in his royal breast," expelled all Jesuits from the Spanish dominions and sequestered their property. Thus, by a stroke of the pen, over twenty fairly well endowed Mexican colleges, not to mention other holdings, were declared the property of the crown. Twenty years rolled by without further innovation. Then, as a hint of what was coming, a royal order of 1789 transferred cases affecting chaplaincies and pious works from the bishops' courts to secular tribunals. Under Viceroy José de Iturrigaray, in 1804, all real estate and moneys belonging to benevolent institutions were seized by the home government as a sort of forced loan. Interest at 3% on the value was promised for the original purposes of the funds.

During the war of Mexican independence which, beginning with the historic grito de Dolores, or shout for liberty, of the creole priest Miguel Hidalgo, September 16, 1810, dragged on for eleven years with no excessive humanity on either side, a royal order suppressed the Inquisition and seized its property, valued at over a million pesos. This was the last sequestration by the Spanish crown of Church property in New Spain, but the lesson had been mastered by the Mexicans. During their subjection to Spain, they had learned from her how to exact contributions from the Church, how to enrich themselves by dispossessing the clergy, by closing colleges, by stopping mission work, and by seizing the productive funds of hospitals and asylums. The lesson was not lost.

A Mild Form of Insanity

The late venerable Father Duranquet, S.J., used to rest with a merry twinkle in his gray eyes, of one of his spiritual clients in the charitable institutions on the islands in the East River, who said to him one day: "Father, I am not crazy; I only say everything that comes into my head. Now if you were to say everything that comes into your head, people would call you crazy, too." There is much true philosophy in the remark of this paranoiac; and measured by his standard of insanity, what a multitude of mild lunatics we find in the social and literary circles at the present time!

Has the reader ever spent an hour in the company of half a dozen Christian Scientists and listened to the theories they enunciate and the phrases they use? Here is a venerable high-brow who speaks of the "periphrastic scintillations of the psychic force," there is an old dowager discussing the "neurotic power of self immanence," and, alas! here is a handsome, blue-eyed girl telling how she loves "the Madonna" but thinks that Mrs. Eddy is superior to her in "hypnotic evolution." Much worse than this may be heard in any gathering of Eddyites, and indeed their Bible is manifestly the result of paranoia.

Take up some old books and theories and you will find similar evidences of insanity. Who has ever understood Spinoza's books or Berkeley's theories or the modern German so-called philosophers? Read them you may if you have great patience and much leisure; but understand them you cannot, for the writers are mildly insane. Under the blond-curls of the young dame; or in the centre of the high-brow's corrugated forehead if you look closely you will see the crack. It is not very wide but it is there.

Take again the modern novel, or the articles on ethical religion or social questions which appear in our popular magazines or newspapers. An educated man, that is, one who has a logical mind and Christian principles, for nobody else is properly speaking an educated man, takes up these novels or these articles and throws them away one after the other; and as he flings them into the waste basket you may hear him say "rubbish," "nonsense," "stuff," "indecent," "incoherent nonsense," "lunacy," "cracked." If he wants to be milder in his criticism and more polished he will use the French word "timbré." This word is not so harsh as "cracked." Reader, if you have read these things, am I not right?

One of the signs of mild lunacy is a lack of what has been called "sequaciousness of ideas." The mind of the stricken one jumps rapidly from one thing to another. There is no connection between the thoughts, no sequence of ideas, no logic, no principle, no creed, no code, no coherence. And these characteristics are found in our modern literature as frequently as good Father Duranquet found them in the asylums on the islands.

Why are they so frequent? Because the writers have no fixed ethical principles and no Christian faith. But that's a thesis which it would take too long to develop.

UMILTÀ.

The Supreme Court in Italy and the Religious Orders

(Concluded.)

The genesis of the decision seems to be purely and simply political—French in its purpose, but not in the method. When Waldeck-Rousseau, in 1901, began the campaign against the religious congregations in France, he found it necessary to make a new Law of Associations; and, to exclude religious communities, he began by defining a voluntary association as one formed on an agreement for individual gain or loss—defining the genus by a single class; as one might define a man by saying he is a white one, or a legitimate government by saying it is one of the Latin race. He quoted a commercial article of the French Code (1128): "It is only things which are in commerce that can be the object of agreement"; another (1780): "which prohibits perpetual engagements." "A whole article of our Code," he continued, "rests on the rule of public order, of the free circulation of goods; and I need not teach those who have made the least study of these matters that all sorts of personal servitudes are likewise interdicted" (January 21, 1901). From this fallacious description he proceeded to establish the lack of correspondence in a religious association with his definition of a commercial one, as well as the immorality of personal "servitude" by the obligations of religious vows.

In Italy, the public sentiment is not at all ripe for such a Law of Associations; and the executive is not disposed to affront public sentiment by acts of administration. In answer to the appeals constantly made by the anti-clericals for the destruction of the religious orders as in France—it being well understood that a fine field of exploitation would be thrown open to official liquidators as in that other unhappy country—a means has been devised of extending the laws in force, and enlarging their purview; and this without troubling the legislature, or compromising the executive. We are informed, but do not vouch for it, that the bench of judges was specially made up by the ministry for the object now attained; and we are also given to understand that this method of packing, not a jury, but a bench, is familiar to the Italian Government. The ministry had at hand the Israelite, Louis Mortara, as advocate general, a man notoriously anti-clerical. And so the judiciary quietly usurped legislative functions; and, further than that, it presumed, as one jurist expresses it, to exercise the tyranny of interpreting the private will as well of the deviser, as of the individual members in a voluntary association. Soon after the decision was rendered, a violent anti-clerical meeting of Mazzinians, called the Republican Congress, which was held in Rome, framed its resolutions, not now in the sense of clamoring for new laws, but of demanding a rigorous and severe application of existing statutes.

The consequences may be briefly indicated. Having an unqualified capacity to receive and ability to hold by civil law, having a qualified capacity to receive, but not to hold for themselves, by canon law, citizens who are members of a religious voluntary association are presumed in civil courts to receive, not for themselves, but for a community. Unrecognized as religious, they are disqualified as recognized citizens. Though no law prohibits any one from enjoying the benefits of property, the possibility of associated religious deriving benefit from property acquired by another makes the acquisition by that other illegal. Individual citizens who are religious cannot receive by donation or testament. They may live and associate; but, as the irony of the Court's decision has it, they may not have the means to live and associate. Further, each member of the association being civilly co-proprietor, possessing indivisibly with the others, his natural heirs can claim his part or quota of the community's goods. As it is not likely that rapacious lay people will be content to go and enjoy that quota, by occupying the poor friar's cell and drinking the broth which fell to his share, a poor monastery will have to liquidate its property, that secular heirs of the poor friar may enjoy the equivalent of his cell and his broth. Since the decision was rendered by the Supreme Court, one Court of Appeals has decided in that very sense against a convent in the country.

As to our own appreciation of the situation, a short passage of arms between Waldeck-Rousseau and one of his supporters will convey it perfectly. Said M. Lhopiteau: "The Chamber understands that the scattering of the persons (in a community), if not followed by the dispersion of their goods, would produce no effect. As a measure of police therefore, the committee was bound to propose for our enactment that the goods of the congregations dissolved should be dispersed." M. Waldeck-Rousseau began his reply by saying that M. Lhopiteau agreed with the Government in this: the dissolution of the communities would be "an empty word if we did not add a measure of execution which he himself calls the dispersion of their goods" (March 28, 1901).

THOMAS HUGHES, S.J.

Prehistoric Rhodesia *

As a joke on the Stock Exchange, and associated with the dreams and chimeras of Cecil Rhodes, Rhodesia is not unknown to the world: but as a land of mystery, a country to be searched and studied for records of the past, a source from which light may come to solve problems in the history of civilization, Rhodesia probably ranks, in most men's minds, in the same category as Labrador or Tierra del Fuego. Its riches, like those of the Klondike, have been proclaimed in the world to raise and shatter the hopes of many; yet, in spite of checks and disappointments, the country is full of a patient optimism determined upon making its future a bright one. Not only is Rhodesia to be a land of steady output in gold and diamonds, as well as the maize-granary of the future: it is to be a hunting ground for antiquarians and a seven-sealed volume from whose pages the secrets of a civilization, only less remote than that of Egypt, are to be revealed. The very gold mines of the country have their secrets of the past, while the mining expert is an antiquarian whose evidence must be heard by every savant who is careful not to make shipwreck of his reputation in South Africa.

The Rhodesian gold fields have, so far, been but imperfectly explored. Their yearly output is about $12,500,000, which is, on a rough estimate, as much as the Transvaal produces in a month. Yet the experts tell us that at least $375,000,000 worth of gold was extracted from the rocks in days long since gone by. The ancient workings are thickly spread over an area of 700 by 600 miles and they reveal a skill in rock-mining unsurpassed by that of any nation of antiquity. In evidence of this skill of the old miners and metallurgists it may be stated that at least two-thirds of all the registered gold claims in Rhodesia have been pegged on the lines of the ancient workings. This plan of re-opening partly used mines seems to be regarded as the safest as well as the easiest method, but many maintain that it denotes remissness on the part of prospectors, and that it rests on the unproved assumption that the ancients had adequately explored the country. All over the gold area there exist hundreds of ancient ruins, not one of which has been fully examined.

The most remarkable of these is the elliptical temple of Zimbabwe, in which important operations have been conducted by Mr. R. N. Hall, but nine-tenths of which yet remain unexplored. It bears many points of resemblance to the temple at Marib in southern Arabia. Its greatest length is about 280 feet, and its highest wall rises 35 feet above the ground. The walls are built of small brick-shaped blocks of granite closely fitted together without any cement. They are ornamented, at the top, with chevron, dentelle, and herringbone ornaments. Stone birds on pillars, and other emblems of nature-worship have been found among the mines. Moreover, numerous gold ornaments have been unearthed at Zimbabwe and elsewhere. Mr. Hall declares that 2,000 ounces of ancient gold ornaments have been discovered in Matabele-land alone. In fact the hasty and disorderly manner in which the buried treasure at Zimbabwe seems to have been stowed away offers a strong probability that the occupants of the temple had to fly for their lives before a sudden invasion of dusky warriors from the North who cared neither for gold nor for the laborious works of civilization. Another remarkable feature of the Zimbabwe ruins is a conical tower, thirty-one feet in height, with a diameter of seventeen feet at the base and of four feet at the top. It is perfectly solid and built, like the walls, with blocks of granite laid in beautifully even courses. Its original height was probably thirty-five feet.

As no inscriptions have yet been discovered on any of the Rhodesian ruins, and, as there is no external documentary evidence which gives the smallest direct hint as to who were the workers of the mines, and who were the builders of the numerous ruins to be found in Rhodesia, South African archeologists are forced to study the question with a good deal of patience and reserve. The Portuguese records of the sixteenth century show most distinctly that rock-mining was an industry unknown either in Portuguese West Africa or in its neighborhood. The scanty supply of gold which found its way to the colonists was the result of laborious and unskilful washings from alluvial deposit. These records, too, speak of the ruins as ancient. The Arab writers who describe the gold trade of Sofala, in the tenth century, state that the gold was brought to their countrymen by the natives, but their account of these latter makes it clear that they had no knowledge of rock-mining. In fact, Maçudi (915) and other Arab writers describe the natives of their time exactly as we find them to-day, i. e., not as skilled miners and assayers, but as naked barbarians with no knowledge of the value of gold except for purposes of barter.

That the African natives themselves were the makers of the deep rock mines and of the stately buildings in their neighborhood, no one seems to have suspected until, in 1895, Dr. Randal MacIver, an Egyptologist of some repute, was commissioned by the British Association to risk his reputation in South Africa. After a hasty survey and little or no study of the Arab and Portuguese records, he claimed to settle the question once for all, on the evidence of some Nankin China found among the ruins at Zimbabwe and on the strength of other contentions, set forth in his recent volume, "Medieval Rhodesia," he pronounced the ruins to be of Kaffir workmanship, in no case earlier than the fourteenth century. His challenge has been taken up by Mr. Hall, and the present volume is "the first instalment of a reply to Dr. McIver."

It dwells at some length on the remarkable Semitic traces to be found among the Ma-Karanga, the people who have inhabited the gold area from time immemorial; traces which greatly differentiate them from the Zulus and other Bantu races. These traces point to the infusion of Arabian or kindred blood in prehistoric times, and the suggestion is borne out by numerous Semitic customs still existing among the Ma-Karanga. Such are monotheism, the practice of circumcision, the observance of a Sabbath, the abhorrence of swine as unclean, and the transference of impurity to some animal which is either slain or driven away to wander on the veldt.

From the facts thus outlined but as set forth with much wealth of detail in his volume, Mr. Hall contents himself with proving that there is not the slightest ground for supposing that the Kaffirs ever went through such a process of evolution in culture as could enable them either to build the temples or engineer the mines. The work must have been done by strangers.

The question of who the strangers were can still be met, so the leading archæologists tell us, with a very fair measure of probability. There are strong reasons for supposing that, though Rhodesia is not Ophir, the gold of Ophir came from Rhodesia; Ophir itself being an emporium on the south coast of Arabia. Ancient writers, both Greek and Roman, tell us that the Sabæans of Arabia were the great gold purveyors of the world, but they do not tell us that the gold came from Arabia itself. It is probable then, in view of all the known facts, that the Sabæans, perhaps long before the days of Solomon, penetrated into S. E. Africa by way of the Sabi River; that they gradually exploited the gold area more and more to the West, and built walled enclosures for self protection and worship. Like other white settlers they left behind them a half-caste population which was numerous enough to make a strong and permanent impression on the features of the whole nation. The strain in the blood has lasted, but all the lessons in civilization have been, for many centuries, forgotten.

Religion in Bosnia and Herzegovina

Since 1895 no official census of Bosnia and Herzegovina has been taken. Nevertheless, the government, 1909, published the following figures as indicating the number of adherents of the different religious beliefs:

Servians, 782,851; Moslem, 602,200; Catholics, 400,081; Jews, 11,007, and Protestants, 6,747, in all about 1,800,000 inhabitants. And why are these statistics arranged according to religious belief, and not according to nationality? The answer is to be found in the policy of Austro-Hungary which recognizes in Bosnia only Turks, Servians, and, if it must be, "Bosniaks—" everything, only not the actual people, the Croats. It is only a few years since the Catholics are allowed to call themselves openly Croats, and the language that was first called the national tongue, and then "Bosniac," is now, since 1909, called the "Servo-Croatian." To what nation, then, do the inhabitants of Bosnia and the Herzegovina belong?

In a previous article in AMERICA on Bosnia and Herzegovina, it was stated that in the sixth and seventh centuries the Croats settled in the regions comprised in the territory of the present Bosnia and Herzegovina, and that in the ninth and tenth centuries many Serbs migrated to Hum (Herzegovina), in the eastern part of Bosnia. And so it has remained, up to the present time. More than two-thirds of the total population are Croat; of genuine Serbs there are comparatively few, for not all those who are enumerated in the statistics as Servians are of genuine Servian stock; they are for the most part Wallachian and may easily be recognized at first sight.

The Bosnian Turks are almost all of Croat descent, but up to the time of the Austro-Hungarian occupation of the land they really had no notion of what they were. Only the Begs (nobles) and the influential Agas (landed proprietors) claimed to be Bosnians, with Croat as their language. The bulk of the people, however, never knew what they were, and do not know to-day. But their language and their family names, which are almost all in the distinctly Croat fashion, "—ich" and "vich," give unmistakable evidence of their origin. Their religion the Turks love to call the "Turkish religion." And if anything important has occurred or they are in need, they are fond of such expressions as: "Tell me, if you be a Turk," "Help me, if you are a Turk." In like manner do the adherents of the Greek-orthodox church identify the religious belief with the nation itself; they invariably refer to it as the religion of Servia and the Church of Servia.

The Croats were the first of all the Slav tribes to adopt Christianity. This occurred towards the end of the seventh century; and the end of the eighth century found the nation entirely Christianized. This is true of the Bosnian and Herzegovinian Croats, whose bishoprics were originally suffragan to the metropolitan see of Spalato; later of the see of Ragusa, and finally (in 1247) of that of Kalosca in Hungary. In 1391 there existed in the territory of the Banus Stefan Kotromanic three bishoprics, viz., those of Bosna, Makar and Duvno. It was from the apostles of the Slavs, Saints Cyrillus and Methodius, and their disciples, that the Croats first took over into their own liturgy the Slavic language and then the Greek rite. But already in the twelfth century the Latin Rite had been reintroduced, but not in the Croat or old Slavic language. This Croat language with its Cyrillian script was long the liturgical language of Bosnia. As late as 1806 some old priests used it in the celebration of Mass, and in other liturgical functions. It is also highly probable that for a long time the Greek Rite was in use among the Catholics of Bosnia. In 1643 it is mentioned as being prevalent in the territory of the present Herzegovina. Yet in spite of this prevalence of the Greek Rite and the Slavic language, Bosnia was never a party to the Greek schism. On the contrary, its bishops were always in very active communion with Rome.

In the eleventh century we find in Bosnia many monasteries, of both the Latin and the Greek Rite, a sign that there lived in the country adherents of both rites. The Servians had accepted Christianity before the great Oriental schism; but later they often changed their religious profession. This depended entirely on the fact whether they were subject to Eastern emperors or to Hungarian-Croat or Bosnian rulers. Up to the time of Prince Stephen Nemanja (1159-1196) the Serbs were Catholic; this prince himself was originally a Catholic, but later on he embraced the schism and built many schismatic churches and monasteries, one of the latter, that of Ravonica standing to the present day. His son, Stephen the First Crowned (1196-1224) again entered into communion with Rome. But hardly had he been crowned, when he again severed his connections with the Church of Rome; and up to this day not one of his descendants has ever returned to the faith of his fathers.

It cannot be ascertained with certainty when the Bosnian Serbs embraced the schism; all that is definitely known is, that it was only in 1376 that they received their own bishopric. The Catholic bishopric of Ston is found in the territory of the present Herzegovina as early as the ninth century, but it has been schismatic since the thirteenth century. In the year 1777 the episcopal residence was transferred from Ston to Mostar.

In the second half of the twelfth century there came from Bulgaria the dangerous sect called the Bogumili (dear to God); they are also known in church history as Patari, Albigenes and Kathari. At first very severe measures were adopted against them; but later on the Bosnian rulers favored them, because they hoped with their help to win their independence more easily from the Hungarian-Croat kings. In fact, this sect waxed so strong and powerful, that it was looked upon as the national church of Bosnia.

After the death of King Stephen Dabisa (1395) the Catholic Church passed through a time of severe trials.

The Turks were encroaching more and more, the Bogumili threw off all restraint and pillaged and destroyed the Catholic churches. Even the bishops were forced to flee the land and took up their residence in Djakovo, in Slavonia, where, since the thirteenth century they had possessed large estates. With the fall of Bosnia under Turkish rule the bishopric came to an end. The Franciscans remained the sole teachers and defenders of the Catholic faith and church from the fifteenth century up to the time of the occupation by Austro-Hungary.

The Franciscans came to Bosnia for the first time towards the year 1235, in order to assist the bishop against the Bogumili. In the year 1326 they were given exclusive charge of the Inquisition, and in the same century their Bosnian vicariate already counted seven custodies. But the Turks ruined everything. Thirty-two monasteries were destroyed, many churches were razed to the ground, or turned into horse stables. It is impossible to depict the sufferings endured by the Catholics and their Franciscan priests at the hands of the Turks. We lead a wretched life from hour to hour," writes Fra Michael Radnic to the Propaganda in 1686, "the word 'death' is ever upon our lips. By day and by night we hide in caverns and forests and there is no one to offer us a word of consolation."

To all these evils must be added pest and famine, and frequent emigrations. Thus on one single occasion a band of Franciscans with 25,000 Christians emigrated to the neighboring Catholic countries. In Slavonia entire new villages thus arose, built by fugitive Bosnian Catholics.

The report of the provincial, Fra Marianus Pavlovic, of the year 1623 enumerates as still remaining only seventeen monasteries, churches and parishes, 268 Franciscan religious and 30,000 Catholics for the whole of Bosnia and Herzegovina! In the year 1741 Fra Filipus Lastric speaks of but thirty parishes, 150 Franciscan religious, and 50,000 Christians; he mentions not a single monastery, not a single church. Fra Elias Tlijic, the bishop, had in his diocese in 1806 thirty-five parishes, seventy-nine Franciscans, nine secular priests and 114,391 Catholics. In the latter half of the nineteenth century the number of Catholics grew considerably; but a genuine revival set in only with the occupation. In 1881 the Catholic hierarchy was newly erected in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It consists of an archbishop (of Sarajevo) with three suffragan bishops (of Banjaluka, Mostar and Trebinje).

In the year 1882 a preparatory seminary and college for boys was opened in Travnik, the first of the kind in Bosnia. From their inception these institutions have been in charge of the Jesuits. In 1890 a department of theology for the training of the secular clergy was likewise added, but in 1894 this was transferred to the magnificent central theological seminary for all Bosnia and Herzegovina in Sarajevo. This, too, is directed by the Fathers of the Society of Jesus. Of female institutes there are working there the Sisters of Charity (of St.

Vincent) in thirteen convents, the Augustinian Sisters in seven convents, the Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis, the Sisters of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, one convent each; and, the Servants of the Child Jesus, in five convents.

The Franciscans are divided into two provinces. The Bosnian province has twelve monasteries, among them a novitiate, a house of philosophy, and a college with six classes. Besides this they are in charge of seventy-five parishes (fifty in the Archdiocese of Sarajevo and twenty-five in that of Banjaluka). There are 189 members of this province. The province of Herzegovina has only three monasteries, and includes thirty-two parishes in the Diocese of Mutar. It numbers ninety members. Between the years 1878-1900 the Franciscans built five new convents and one college, erected fifty-two churches and thirty-one pastoral residences. Of the 132 parishes of which they still have charge, fifty-nine belong to them in their own right; all the others they will in course of time hand over to the secular clergy, which numbers now about seventy-five priests. This small number is not to be wondered at, for before the occupation there was not a single secular priest in the land, and the theological seminary was not opened until 1890.

It is most consoling to find that the number of Catholics has doubled in thirty years. According to the census of 1879 there were among the 1,158,164 inhabitants of Bosnia and Herzegovina 209,391 Catholics; in Sarajevo, the capital, only 800. To-day there are among the two million inhabitants 400,081 Catholics, in Sarajevo alone 15,000! Nevertheless, the position of Catholics is very unsatisfactory. The Turks as well as the Serbs have received their ecclesiastical autonomy, but not the Catholics. The Turks possess immense landed possessions, the rentals of which are for religious purposes. The Catholics, on the contrary, have received no school fund, in spite of the fact that the late Archbishop Strossmayer, as a Bosnian prelate, demanded of the emperor-king the restoration of the former possessions of the Bosnian Church. The government tries to be neutral, and consequently it assists the Catholics in the same proportion as it assists Turks and Serbs, that is, according to the numerical strength of the inhabitants. All churches, schools and monasteries have been erected by offerings from the faithful outside, for the native population is very poor.

Austria-Hungary has undoubtedly done a great deal for the occupied provinces, but unfortunately too little for the Catholics and for Christianity in general. Too much consideration was shown for the Turks, in order that they might not have the slightest reason to take offense. If a Catholic apostatizes and becomes a Mohammedan—which, thank God, is a very rare occurrence—not a soul takes any notice of it. But if a Turk wishes to become Catholic he must leave the land. It is to be hoped that this anomaly will soon cease now that the annexation is an accomplished fact.

The Vexatious British Budget

LONDON, NOVEMBER 3, 1909.

The House of Commons is discussing the last stage of the Finance Bill. It is six months since it was introduced into the House. Never in British history has a Budget scheme been the subject of such prolonged debate. After the third reading this week Parliament will take a fortnight's holiday, and at the end of the month will come the critical debate in the House of Lords.

What the attitude of the upper House will be was plainly foreshadowed by the Duke of Norfolk in a perfectly frank speech at a Conservative meeting last evening. After saying that Liberal press was predicting that the Lords would "tear up" the Budget, he went on:

"I don't want to tear up the Budget; but at the back of my head there is a secret hope that if the people are allowed to have an opportunity of expressing their opinion they will tear it up before they have done with it. If the Lords reject the Budget it will be in the belief that the responsibility rests upon them of letting the people have an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon it, and they will face all the threats and dangers with firmness and without flinching."

The London Municipal elections on November 1 have been carried through under the shadow of the Budget controversy. The Conservatives (who in London local politics call themselves "Municipal Reformers"), have held and slightly improved on the large gains they made in 1906. The most notable incident was the complete defeat of the Liberals, Progressives and Socialists in Battersea, Mr. John Burns's constituency, till now a stronghold of advanced Liberalism with a decidedly Socialist tinge. At Monday's polls in Battersea the Socialist candidates were supported by a mere handful of votes. The fact would seem to be that numbers of electors who formerly supported Socialist candidates simply as "Labour" men, are now realizing what the Socialist propaganda means, and shrinking back from it.

The Socialists are trying to use the Trades Union machinery to compel all labor candidates to adopt the full Socialist ticket. But inside the unions there is a growing revolt against these tactics, especially in the North where the Catholic workers muster strongly in the trades unions. The Socialist wing is making a dead set against three of the veteran representatives of labor in the House of Commons, Mr. Richard Bell, M. P., of the Railway Workers' Union, Mr. Burt, M. P., and Mr. Fenwick, M. P., of the Coal Miners' Union. All three have been for many years members of the House of Commons, where they have won the respect of men of all parties. None of the three belongs to the professional politician class. They began not as platform agitators but as day laborers on the railway track or in the coal mine. They came to the front in their trade unions and then were elected to Parliament on the Labor program of social reform, not of Socialism. None of them has the least sympathy with Utopian schemes of revolution, and this is their crime in the eyes of the Socialists. Thomas Burt is now seventy-one years of age, but hale and vigorous. He began work in a colliery as a boy of ten, educated himself and made his mark as a young temperance orator. He has been thirty-five years in Parliament. No man has deserved better of the northern miners, and the attempt of the Socialists to drive such a man from public life is a practical proof of the lack of real statesmanship in the movement.

Another man whom the Socialists have black-listed is John Burns, and even the advanced Liberals are anxious as to his position. In the practical work of administration he has unlearned much of the unpractical idealism of his earlier Socialistic career. He has come up against hard facts and now believes in plodding reform, not in wild schemes for making a new heaven and a new earth by Act of Parliament. He has not said one word in the agitation against the House of Lords, and some of the party papers are severely criticising him for the conciliatory attitude he took up on Monday night when the House of Commons discussed the Lords' amendments to his Housing and Town Planning Bill. Instead of asking for the sweeping rejection of the amendments Mr. Burns tried to find a way of compromise. The Socialists intended to run a candidate against him in Battersea but the revelation of their weakness given by the municipal polling on Monday may teach them discretion. I know that outside the Socialist wing of the Labor party there is not a man in the House of Commons who would not regret Mr. Burns' exclusion from Parliament.

The Conservatives are taking a very wise step in raising a fund to pay the election expenses of Conservative working men candidates at the coming elections. They mean to show that all educated working men are not bitten with the Socialist madness, and that their own party is not made up only of dukes and plutocrats.

The French Bishops and the Government Schools

PARIS, NOVEMBER 5, 1909.

The letter of the French bishops on anti-clerical education has not passed unnoticed. In many village schools, in Brittany especially, peasant children, prompted by their parents, refused to use the condemned books and were, in consequence, punished by their instructors. In other places, the parents themselves remonstrated with the teachers on the subject and firmly asserted their right to forbid the use of books that attack their religious and social creed. But the struggle is, of course, an unequal one: a handful of children, even backed up by their parents, are no match for the army of Government teachers, the majority of whom, in the towns especially, are either atheist or time serving. Even the village school-master wields, at the present day, extraordinary influence in France. His superior knowledge enables him to be of use in many ways to his more ignorant neighbors and, in political crisis, he often becomes an active and unscrupulous agent in the service of the Government.

But it is not only among the school children of France and their parents that the bishops' letter has produced an effect. The correspondent of le Matin, a paper that is distinctly anti-clerical in its tendency, gives a long account of an interview with M. Doumergue, the Minister of Public Instruction, who, in answer to his visitor's inquiry as to what he thought of the bishops' letter, exclaimed: "It means war. The situation is a serious one and we must take prompt measures." He then went on to explain that he had ordered the teachers throughout the country to take no notice of the bishops' letter, nor of their prohibition regarding certain books; they are to punish the children who decline to use these books and they must oppose themselves to the interference of the parents in the matter. "Our teachers need not be afraid," he added, "I shall defend them vigorously." One of M.

Doumergue's colleagues seems to have been less sanguine in his assertions. The Minister boldly assured his visitor that although the Government schools were violently attacked, they were certain to come out of the fight with flying colors. His colleague's words betrayed more anxiety and probably were a truer expression of the real thoughts of the men in power. "The bishops' declaration of war," he said, "put us in an embarrassing position. How are we to answer a child who refuses to learn its history in such or such a book? We may exclude the rebel from school for a certain number of days, but what are we to do next? The law of 1882, that regulates the school system has no provision for a case such as this. . . . We shall have to attack, before the tribunals, the child's parents who are the real offenders, but even this is not always easy, as there is no positive law on the subject, and the tribunals before whom similar cases have been judged, differ in their opinion. . . . The danger is a real one," was his conclusion.

M. Doumergue's circular, in answer to the letter of the bishops, is commented upon by the Catholic newspapers of France, who are unanimous in their opinion that the question of primary education is going through a grave crisis. The Minister accuses the bishops of having interfered in the direction of the Government schools over which they can pretend to no control or authority. His assertion is thus answered in a note issued by the Osservatore Romano and immediately published by La Croix and other Catholic papers. It puts the case in its true light.

"The Minister," says the note, "starts from false premises; he assumes that the bishops desire to interfere with the so-called neutral schools, which, in reality, are atheistical. On the contrary, the bishops urge Catholic parents not to send their children to these schools, where their faith is in danger. They are told to abstain from sending their children to schools that are unworthy of Catholic children and where teachers oblige them to use books condemned by the Church." It is only in cases where no Catholic school is at hand, that parents are permitted to send their children to the Government schools and in this case their duty obliges them to control the books that are used. This duty is imposed upon them by God Himself, it is the natural consequence of the sacred mission that devolved on them at their children's birth, no human power can absolve them from it.

That the books used in the Government schools are often openly irreligious and dangerous, even from a social point of view is beyond doubt. For instance, among the writers, whose works are used, is a certain M. Payot, whose treatise on "la Morale" is one of the Government class books. What his "Morale" consists in may be gathered from the fact that this same M. Payot is director of a review that has lately proved itself a virulent defender of the notorious Ferrer. It presents the Anarchist leader as having been done to death by the "Spanish monks," praises his "nobility of mind" and indulges in considerations, as dangerous as they are extravagant, upon the "state of soul of the new humanity."

Men such as these are public evil doers and yet it is into their keeping that the Government places the rising generation of French children. Now and then, it happens that the liberty so earnestly vindicated by the Catholic parents is claimed, on other grounds, by the Socialists. The radical mayor of St. Denis lately issued an order by which he obliged his fellow citizens to send their children to certain schools rather than to others, not on religious or moral grounds, but simply as a matter of convenience. Some schools in the town being overcrowded and others almost empty, he hoped by ordering the citizens to use the schools in their immediate neighborhood, to bring about more equal division of scholars. This somewhat arbitrary measure roused universal indignation, the Socialists of St. Denis placarded the walls with virulent manifestoes in which they said: "The fathers of families ought to be free to send their children to the school that they themselves select. . . . Children belong to their parents. Many citizens choose the schools to which they send their children because they themselves were educated there or else because they are personally acquainted with the teachers and thus they are able to co-operate with the latter, in the task of educating their children."

At first sight, this placard might be attributed to the Catholic parents, to whom the Government practically refuses the right to have a voice in a matter that touches them so closely as the mental and moral training of their sons and daughters. The Socialists of St. Denis, prompted by other motives, and acting on different principles, have nevertheless, in this instance, voiced the claims of the oppressed and persecuted Catholic parents of France.

Militarism Disturbs Belgium's Politics

LOUVAIN, NOVEMBER 4, 1909.

The political situation in Belgium has become grave and complicated. The point at issue is the military question. The elements of confusion are many and threatening. This much, however, is certain—all parties, the government and the three opposing tendencies in the Right, will have to make concessions, if any thing is to be done. Union among the Catholics, therefore, is necessary, for in this case, the government project is sure to pass. The Left have realized this, and hence have spoken little against the bill itself and have only dwelt on the differences existing among Catholics. Briefly the situation is this: The present system of recruiting, in order to fill up the contingent, is by drawing lots; then in order to make the required number the voluntariate exists. This, however, has been proved insufficient, hence the Government's new move. It takes for a basis of military régime the family instead of the individual, and calls for one son from each family. But here come in the various tendencies among the Catholics. One section headed by M. Levie is strongly militarist and calls, as a first step to this, for the abolition of the present system of substitution. On the other hand M. Woeste heads a group calling for the complete maintenance of the present law. A third group is headed by the Antwerp deputies and is strongly anti-militarist. The country at large is not averse to the new bill, provided there be no increase of the military burden. The Belgians are by no means militarists; to convince oneself of this, one has only to be present at the annual drawing of lots, to see the joy of those who have drawn a number exempting them from service.

Parliament opened a special session to consider the bill, on October 19th. M. Schollaert, the premier, began the debate. He explained the motives of the new legislation, dwelt on its equality for all, and called on the Right to follow him. M. Verhaegen, one of the democratic leaders of the young Right, declared unreservedly for the Government and said he was willing to make personal concessions and sacrifices for the general cause. Then followed a succession of Liberal and Socialist orators who did little more than accentuate the differences existing among the Catholics. At this juncture was held the meeting of the Right in which the country looked for the Catholic deputies to come to an arrangement definitely settling the question; they arrived, however, at no conclusion. The next day M. Woeste made a speech in the House in which he demanded no augmentation of the contingent and no increase of the military burden. He also dwelt on the unconstitutionality of that clause which provides once for all for the number to be drawn each year, and ended with these significant words: "better separate than go wrong." Then followed the Minister of War, General Hellebant. He spoke solely from the point of view of the army and declared that in proposing a bill that will fill up the vacancies that amount to four thousand he was merely doing his duty. He was also in favor of abolishing the system of substitution, for which the bill does not provide. M. Mélot, the chairman of the comité on the bill, spoke next. He insisted on article 119 of the Constitution, which says that the contingent shall be voted annually; the object of this is to keep the War Minister in bounds. This is one of the critical points of the debate. The majority of the Right undoubtedly stand with M. Mélot, while the Government declares, that without fixing the contingent once for all, their formula can not stand.

M. Segliers represented Antwerp in opposing militarism, declared for the maintenance of the voluntariate, for Art. 119, and said that if the bill were not amended in this sense, he and his colleagues would not vote for it. At this point M. Bertrand, a Socialist, moved an amendment abolishing substitution on the ground that this latter is unjust to the poor. M. Janson, leader of the Liberal party, declared for general service and the abolition of substitution, and spent the rest of his time in criticizing the Government. The speech of M. Levie, leader of the young Right, was awaited with some anxiety. In a very eloquent speech he defended the premier against M. Woeste, declared for the Government's formula and said that while personally he prefers a general military service he was willing to sacrifice his preferences, provided the system of substitution were abolished. He also declared that in this case the government might be assured of the vote of the Left. The effect of this speech was sensational, for as he sat down he was loudly applauded by the Opposition and some few Catholics.

Hence the situation is very grave and threatening and forebodes, at the least, the fall of the Ministry. Certainly the speech of M. Levie has changed the face of things; the impression produced has been strong and all, Catholics and Liberals, feel that a blow has been struck in favor of general military service. The Left is wild with joy while the Right is manifestly discouraged. That is how things stand as I write. Let us hope that M. Schollaert will see a way out of the difficulty.

The recent elevation to the rank of monsignor, of Canon Laderoze, lately named Rector of the Catholic University of Louvain, gives general satisfaction.

An enthusiastic reception was accorded at Brussels to Lieutenant Shackleton, the Antarctic explorer. P.

Spain and the Moret Ministry

The month of October ended in Spain with a change of Government. Maura and the Conservative Ministry had fallen; Moret and the Liberals were in power. From the first meeting of the Cortes, on October 15th, it became evident that the Liberals had determined to take advantage of the anti-Maura movement of Republicans, Freemasons and Socialists, in order to break down the power of Maura and the strong Conservative Ministry. All parliamentary rules were disregarded by the Liberals and the forces of the "Left." The climax came when La Cierva, (Conservative) Minister of Government, angered by Moret's tactics to impede all legislation, openly accused the Liberals of being in part responsible for the terrible crimes of July and of being in sympathy with the enemies of Spain. The enraged Liberals demanded that La Cierva should withdraw from the Ministry. Maura and the Conservative Ministers, who for nearly three years had given Spain a government of progressive laws and an honest, capable administration such as the nation had not seen in many a year, handed in their resignations. Anyone who will put aside political prejudice and review the history of Spain during the past few years will tell you that the nation advanced under Maura's administration, which was favorable to Catholics. True, the Carlist and Integrist parties, both strongly Catholic, did not support Maura. The former withheld its aid chiefly by reason of its attachment to the Carlist cause; the latter claimed that the political doctrines of Maura were tainted with Liberalism. Be the charge true or not, Maura has ever shown himself a practical Catholic, acting in good faith, and has never attacked the interests of the Church, while the history of Moret and the Liberals has been the story of little consideration for the Church and of open plots to weaken its power by methods imported from France.

Who is Moret? The Spanish cartoonist pictures him as "La Velea" (The Weather-vane), which points now one way, now another. "He points with the wind," says the cartoonist. The man of calm judgment answers: "Moret is the leader of the Liberals; is an impressive public speaker; has talent; is interested in scientific work; has many friends, both in Spain and abroad, by reason of personal, social qualities; but in politics is a man of ever-changing policy and absolutely lacking in powers of government." If his past political history may guide our judgment of the future, Moret will be a failure and Spain will suffer, for his cabinet is formed by Liberals, with Radical sympathy. Never had Spanish Catholics need of closer political union than now to resist the evil influences so closely united for war on their national Faith.

In the midst of the Moret triumph there is a sign of hope. The outburst of the national will which in 1906 defeated the machinations of these same Liberals and their proposed Association Law, and the recent general protests of bishops and people against the outrages of the "Sad Week" in Cataluña should indicate that the Moret Ministry must move slowly if it is to include in its program measures hostile to the religion of the disunited Catholics of Spain.

That there will be a change of policy towards Church and State affairs no one can doubt. One naturally asks if the fortress of Montjuich will open its portals to send forth into Barcelona the Anarchists who masquerading under the name of Republicanism and Progress committed crimes that shocked the world. Will the "lay schools" be opened again to receive a new brood of youthful anarchists to be well instructed in the "three R's": riot, robbery and revolution? In regard to the war in Africa one cannot speak with certainty. The Liberals are now praising the bravery of the "heroes fighting in Africa," while a few weeks since no statement of affairs in Africa was too absurd to be printed in the Liberal papers. Inconsistency is ever a familiar word when one is speaking of Liberal policy in Spain.

Trades Unions and Industrial Education

The American Federation of Labor, meeting some months ago at Denver, appointed a committee to examine the question: what sort of industrial education would suit organized labor? The committee invited several persons engaged in technical training to address them on the subject, and the efficiency of trade schools, their desirability, and industrial training in the grammar schools were fully discussed. There seems to be no reason why a technical school should not be efficient with regard to many trades. Whether in all cases its training could take the place of apprenticeship, is not clear. The desire to make industrial training part of the public school system appeared to be general; but the supporters of distinct and complete technical schools were in the minority. The practical objection to these from the Unions' point of view is that they would deprive them of the power of regulating in their own interest the number to be admitted to any trade and the conditions of admission. It has actually happened that when a Union had practically closed the door of apprenticeship, young men found their way into the trade by means of the diploma of a technical school. The idea of the committee is to make some general industrial training part of the grammar school course; and it is more than probable that this will be demanded.

Sensational Evangelism

The Presbyterian Board of Home Missions has begun to hold religious services in shops and factories. It proposes to make each church responsible for one factory, thus to bring the Church to the workers. We are not told to whom each church is to be responsible for its factory, nor whether the workmen welcome the kind of Gospel brought to them. The well-known text: "I have not sent them, yet they run: I have not spoken, yet they prophesy" is applicable to the innovation. A meeting held some days ago at Runkle Brothers' factory may serve as a specimen of these services. It began with a cornet solo, "The Star-Spangled Banner" blending into "The Wearing of the Green." Hymns were sung from printed leaflets, and the minister spoke, taking for his text "The Passing of the Third-Floor Back." As Presbyterians would, for their own part, rather hear "Croppies, Lie Down" than "The Wearing of the Green," one may assume that the playing of this tune shows that there are many Catholics among Messrs. Runkle's employees. Consequently it becomes a matter of wonder that the firm cooperates with the ministers in imposing upon them services that must be distasteful. Another minister with the minister's instinct for the novel and sensational, officiated on the stage of the American Music Hall, West Forty-second street, before a congregation of players, managers, ushers and stage-carpenters. It is said that they were greatly impressed. No doubt they were.

Priests and Profits

From time to time the post brings to the clergy circulars from companies that have been organized with the view of making them rich. Sometimes mines of prodigious worth are about to be developed. Sometimes an invention that will produce millions and is going to be put on the market, and the priest is cordially invited to come in and share in the profits. These benevolent companies often have splendid titles, but their presidents and directors, not wishing, perhaps, their charity to be known, conceal their names. Sometimes, nevertheless, they get a priest, dazzled with the prospect set before him, to guarantee their project. The question arises: who discovered the mine or made the invention? If either has a commercial value, there are many wide-awake business men looking for profitable investments, who would be glad to take it up on terms most advantageous to the discoverer or the inventor. Why, then, should the one or the other turn away from them to enrich priests, in these days in which the tendency is rather to deprive these of worldly advantages? Why should he sacrifice his own interests to do so? A priest's name appearing in any such scheme is, to a wise man, a strong reason to distrust it. No matter how good a counsellor a priest may be in his own sphere, he is, generally speaking, inapt when he goes outside it. We do not consult doctors about law, nor put the surgeon's knife into the hands of a merchant. A priest is foolish, therefore, if he allows himself to be led by such means to venture his own little means; he is worse than foolish if he risk the Church funds of which he is only an administrator. For the inevitable end will be that whatever money he invests with those that are not ashamed to exploit his inexperience will pass into their pockets and he will find himself a poorer and, let us hope, a wiser man.

The Wahrmund Affair Again

Our readers will recall the eagerness with which a writer in the American Journal of Theology early in the year seized upon the incident of the discredited Innsbruck Professor Wahrmund to take a fling at the Catholic faculties of the University in the Tyrolese capital. The story is told in No. 14 of AMERICA. The latest phase of Wahrmund's experience will hardly win for him new eulogy on the part of his American defenders. The Professor, after his offensive anti-Christian lectures in Innsbruck, was transferred to Prague, where in the current winter-semester's bulletin he is announced for two courses, not in his old branch of Canon Law, but in some secondary topics connected with that subject. The needed ministerial approval of his appointment to the chair in Prague was delayed, it appears, and Wahrmund, "the hero of freedom of teaching," as the Journal of Theology termed him, was unwise enough to rush into the lime-light once more and to fill the partisan free-thinking press of Germany with new charges of illiberalism and persecution.

Unfortunately for the Professor the Prague faculty of laws held possession of certain documents signed by Wahrmund, which place him in a rather contemptible position for one who had boasted of his devotion to the interests of freedom in scholarship, and which expose the pitiable selfishness of the man. The documents, which Wahrmund's colleagues were loath to publish until forced to do so by the false accusations of the press, comprise certain agreements entered into between himself, Dr. Marchet, and Baron Beck, respectively Minister of Instruction and President of the Ministry at the time of the Professor's removal from Innsbruck. According to this agreement Wahrmund pledged himself to announce only pro forma his courses in the Prague school; shortly after the opening of the semester he promised to apply for leave of absence for wider study, during which, as the agreement reads, he was to receive a yearly allowance of 10,000 crowns. Finally Wahrmund declared his intention to put in speedily an application for retirement because of physical disability, when, so runs the document, he was to be pensioned off with an addition of 2,000 crowns to the gratuity legally allowed one in his grade. Naturally the agreement was a secret one, and, as it appears, recognized even by the signers of the document to be altogether contrary to law, since both the Minister of Instruction and the President took care that its existence should not be communicated to the other members of the Ministry. It is a sadly compromising situation for all concerned, and now that the papers have been made public the agreement will of course be without effect. The New Free Press, and other free-thinking organs which defended the cause of the "hero of freedom and scholarship," have not a word to say, and poor Wahrmund loses even the money advantages which his dishonorable dealings had seemed to secure for him.

Bishop Hall's Ideas on Reunion

Bishop Hall of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of Vermont read a paper on Christian Unity at a Missionary Council held lately at Hartford. As reported in the daily papers it caused some surprise. When these announced that he was ready to let the Thirty-nine Articles go along with the Westminster Confession it seemed that he was willing to sacrifice the charter of the Episcopal Church to achieve organic union with the Presbyterians. Those who know how restive are English Episcopalians of Bishop Hall's school under these objectionable articles to which they are bound to subscribe, and how satisfied such Episcopalians are in America, where they are not imposed, would have been inclined to view the offer as decidedly humorous had Bishop Hall gone no farther. But the newspapers were apparently right in the main. Bishop Hall seems to be ready for a great surrender, such as at one time he could not have endured to contemplate. A passage or two from his address will prove this. Take, for example, "A desire for reunion does not turn on organization, but is a desire to realize Christ's own design. The succession of a ministry with an authoritative commission must be presented as more fundamental than any differentiation of orders within it." This may, of course, be interpreted to be an invitation to non-Episcopalians to admit that no such ministry is to be had except through bishops; under the circumstances it is naturally understood to mean that, as any project of reunion implies a universal Church of which the sects divided among themselves are members, so it recognizes a universal ministry demonstrating its commission by its effects, of which the members may be called priests or ministers and may be ordained by bishops or by presbyteries, or in any other way that commends itself to a particular denomination. Take another example: "We must distinguish between the facts of the Creeds and explanatory theories about them." This is pure Nominalism, an absolute renunciation of the theology in which Bishop Hall is supposed by his admirers to be an adept. The facts of the Creed amount to very little indeed without their exposition, which Bishop Hall's new tendencies lead him to depreciate as theories. Can one separate the fact from his theory of it? Catholics, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, all say: 'I believe in the Holy Catholic Church,' but each says it according to his concept of the church. The orthodox Christian and the Adoptionist can say together: "I believe in Jesus Christ the only Son of God," so long as no question is raised as to the meaning of the words. Such a union would mean the denial of all dogma, and that such a one as Bishop Hall can contemplate it as desirable, or even possible, is one of the saddest proofs of the degeneracy of Episcopalianism, of its utter inappreciation of the nature of revelation and faith, of the Church and its essential unity, we have met with for many a long day.

A Reversal in Education

Among the English-speaking people it is usually supposed that the case of education and its history before the reformation so-called has been brought before the bar of human opinion and definitely settled. The teaching has been that there was very little education before the reformation and that what existed was barely tolerated by the Church which constantly suppressed efforts at real enlightenment, since these might lead people away from faith. The Tudor monarchs, Henry VII and Edward VI, have had a name in the history of education as founders of educational institutions. Shakespeare, we are told, was educated at an Edward VI grammar school. The usual rule has been to think that these monarchs of the reform period did everything for modern education that possibly could be done and that so far as they were able they undid the past and laid the foundation of future development in education. Recent English historians and especially Gairdner have not acceded to this in recent years but have shown how utterly without foundation any such opinion was. At last even the popular mind in England is waking up to the truth. The London Times which, like most newspapers, follows rather than leads public opinion, recently used some expressions that are well worth while remembering.

"The reputation so long enjoyed by Henry VIII and Edward VI as founders and renewers of middle-class education out of the spoils of the monasteries, is now seen to have rested on a misunderstanding. They were destroyers rather than creators, and earned an undeserved repute as benefactors by allowing a small minority of schools to retain a portion of their property that had become vested in the Crown by confiscation; nor was the record of other Tudor rulers much better." Truth even from the bottom of her well does get to the light at last. Now let us hear some teaching of the real history of education instead of the prejudices of the past. When the Thunderer gives up thus to anything Catholic there can no longer be any possible doubt about it.

Religion and the Mind

There is probably no commoner fling at religion than to declare that it is responsible for a great many cases of insanity. There is no doubt at all that many inmates of insane asylums suffer from religious delusions and that the first manifestations of insanity in many people are connected with religion in some way. The reasoning that would make religion responsible for the insanity, however, is one of those curious post hoc ergo propter hoc conclusions that so often satisfy superficial people. The psychiatrists have been far from asserting anything of this kind and in recent years have come to acknowledge the place that religion has in soothing people who are tried too severely and keeping them from insanity and the madhouse. The succession of events when people go insane with religious delusions is first a mind that has a tendency to insanity and an exaggerated interest in anything that it takes up. This may be business or pleasure or indulgence in vice or anything else. This over attention reacts upon the mind still further to weaken it and the weakened mind pursues its object more intemperately than before. A vicious circle is formed for which the beginning is the weak mind and its object only a coincidence in the process of mental disequilibrium and not a cause.

As for the soothing effect of religion in keeping people from giving way to their emotions and in endangering their minds, testimonies are multiplying in our present-day overflowing literature with regard to nervousness and psychiatry. A rather striking testimony is found in Dr. John K. Mitchell's recent book published by J. B. Lippincott on Self Help for Nervous Women. Dr. Mitchell says:

"It is certainly true that considering as examples two such widely separated forms of religious belief as the Orthodox Jews and the strict Roman Catholics, one does not see as many nervous patients from them as from their numbers might be expected, especially when it is remembered that Jews as a whole are very nervous people and that the Roman Church includes in this country among its members numbers of the most emotional races in the world."

THE PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION.

President Taft's official proclamation of Thursday, November 25, as Thanksgiving Day, was issued from the State Department on November 15. Following is the text of the proclamation:

"By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

"The season of the year has returned when, in accordance with the reverent custom established by our forefathers, the people of the United States are wont to meet in their usual places of worship on a day of thanksgiving appointed by the civil magistrate to return thanks to God for the great mercies and benefits which they have enjoyed.

"During this past year we have been highly blessed. No great calamities of flood or tempest or epidemic sickness have befallen us. We have lived in quietness, undisturbed by wars or rumors of wars. Peace and plenty of bounteous crops and of great industrial production animate a cheerful and resolute people to all the renewed energies of beneficent industry and material and moral progress. It is altogether fitting that we should humbly and gratefully acknowledge the divine source of these blessings.

"Therefore, I hereby appoint Thursday, the twenty-fifth day of November, as a day of general thanksgiving, and I call upon the people on that day, laying aside their usual vocations, to repair to their churches and unite in appropriate services of praise and thanks to Almighty God.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

"Done at the city of Washington, this 15th day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and nine, and of the independence of the United States, the one hundred and thirty-fourth.

"WILLIAM H. TAFT.

"By the President, P. C. Knox, Secretary of State."

LITERATURE

The Catholic Encyclopedia.—Vol. VI.

To those who are wont to dismiss jejuneness with the slighting phrase, "as interesting as statistics," we submit by way of surprise, the following statistical information about the sixth and latest volume of "The Catholic Encyclopedia," which has just come from the press. Beginning with the "Fathers of the Church,"—the title of a long and scholarly article with an exhaustive bibliography, by the learned Benedictine, John Chapman—the new volume carries the work down to "Gregory." Under the two letters of the alphabet, thus partially covered, 724 subjects have been treated by 243 contributors, of whom seventy appear for the first time in this sixth instalment of the monumental undertaking. It is interesting to note that, of the 243 authors of articles, 90 belong to the United States, 69 to Great Britain and Ireland, 13 to France, 13 to Belgium and 16 to Germany and Austria-Hungary. The remaining 42 contributors are scattered over almost the entire globe.

A study of the list of contributors prefixed to the volume reveals a unique distinction of "The Catholic Encyclopedia" among similar works of reference. It has no hack-writers. Every writer has been chosen with reference to his ability in the matter which he treats. As a consequence, most of the names are those of distinguished men and acknowledged authorities who approached their task in a mood of jealous accuracy and painstaking responsibility. Thus we note the names of the two Bollandists, De Smedt and Van Ortoy; René Doumic and Georges Goyau, of the Revue des Deux Mondes; a bishop, a United States ethnologist, the president of a society of architects, members of learned societies, and professors belonging to nearly every university of note in Europe and the United States.

We cannot resist the indulgence of complacently dwelling upon the fact that the United States has furnished forth the largest number of writers for the present volume. We Catholics of the United States, as a class, are very self-depreciatory. One of our most graceful writers in a current number of a Catholic magazine sees reasons for our self-abasement. But does not "The Catholic Encyclopedia" encourage us to believe that the period of intellectual and literary depression, incident to our material conditions, is, at least, on the wane? There are ample grounds in the work before us for thinking that the Church in this country contains among clergy and laity a large supply of "the patient brain to track shy truth."

Another significant item among the statistics we have given is the addition of seventy new writers to the corps of contributors. The Encyclopedia is not only what may be described as a codification of Catholic scholarship and information; it is also, we cannot but notice, searching the world over for Catholic talent and ability, organizing it, giving it a consciousness of power and stimulating it to aim at sane and useful publicity.

When we turn from the external recommendations of the latest installment of the Encyclopedia to its contents we are confronted with an embarrassment of riches. Theologians and all who are interested in the details of Catholic philosophy and theology will welcome the articles on "Grace," "God," and "Freewill." The famous Molinist theory of the scientia media comes in for notice in all three articles, which thus afford an opportunity of interesting comparisons. Professor Joyce's brief notice of "Fundamental Articles" belongs to the same class of literature and deserves attention as a model of lucid exposition and succinct narrative. The short biographical sketches, such as those of Pedro da Fonseca, Gonet, Granderath, Genicot and Franzelin, will give much-needed information about persons who heretofore have been little more than names on the backs of leatherbound text-books and works of reference.

Two noteworthy articles appear under "Geography," that of Professor Souvay on "Biblical Geography," with accompanying maps, and another on "Geography and the Church," including an account of Catholic missionary exploration, by Otto Hartig, Assistant Librarian of the Royal Library, Munich.

St. Francis of Assisi, as we might expect, is conspicuous in these pages. The saint and the Franciscan Order are the subjects of two lengthy, erudite and most interesting papers from the pen of Dom Pascal Robinson. Professor Bihl, O. F. M., of the Collegio San Bonaventura, Florence, has a supplementary history of the Friars Minor, whilst Professor Oliger, of the Collegio S. Antonio, Rome, writes on the Rule of St. Francis, and Zephyrin Engelhardt, O. F. M., completes the subject with a narrative of the arrival and labors of the friars in America.

Special attention is commanded by the ample space devoted to France and Germany. Georges Goyau, associate editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes, gives a masterly sketch of France from the Treaty of Verdun down to the present year, delaying especially on events during the Third Republic. We venture to surmise that for the English-speaking Catholics, who have had to take their recent French history from the scrappy and incoherent jargon of a hostile and ill-informed public press, this part of the Encyclopedia will have superior interest. Pre-Reformation Germany is treated by Professor Franz Kampers, of the University of Breslau; modern Germany and, especially, the New German Empire, by Martin Spahn, of the University of Strasburg. The French and German literatures are done by René Doumic and Professor Remy respectively. But perhaps for us the subjects of most immediate interest and importance treated in this connection are those on French and German settlement and growth in the United States. The articles cover a field that has been allowed to lie neglected for some time and do inestimable service in tying up the loose ends of knowledge on vital subjects and bringing considerable portions of the history of the Church in the United States to date. Finally in connection with the titles of France and Germany, attention should be called to the unusually excellent maps of both countries, showing the boundaries of the ecclesiastical provinces, dioceses, vicariates, and prefectures apostolic.

Greece is a third European country that receives extended treatment in the new volume. Its modern history, so complex to the Western mind, is told by Adrian Fortescue, an authority not only on liturgy but on all that pertains to the Eastern Church. Andrew J. Shipman makes a notable contribution to historic records in his accounts of Catholic Greeks in the United States and of Orthodox Greeks in America.

It is clear from the few points we have chosen to mention in review of the sixth volume of "The Catholic Encyclopedia," that the latter is a product of patient intellectual toil and broad enterprise without a parallel in the English language, and, in very many respects, without its equal in any language. Its articles are no mere compilations by intelligent, but mechanical, processes. The high standard set in the first six volumes of "The Catholic Encyclopedia" requires the ripe fruit of scholarship and experience, and, in not a few instances, even original and laborious research. The result is that we have not merely a vast work of reference but also a literary and scientific achievement, original in design and execution, and embodying the latest and best in the world of Catholic thought, Catholic activities and Catholic academic investigation.

We should like, if space permitted, to notice with some detail other features of the sixth volume. "Feudalism" is the title of a long article by Bede Jarrett, O.P.; that on Galileo is by John Gerard, S. J.; Ralph Adams Cram devotes generous space to the subject of Gothic Architecture; other attractive titles are "Florence," "Giotto," "Ghirlandajo," "The Holy Grail," "Gallicanism," and the "Gradual." The stately tome, with its long, double-columned pages, is so crowded with matter that one is driven almost to a haphazard selection in his desire to point out the good things. It is a subject for surprise that so many interesting and momentous topics can be grouped together on no other principle of choice except the adventitious one of conventional association with a letter of the alphabet. We receive a staggering impression of the vastness of the field of knowledge and of the difficulties of the editors in their desire to omit nothing worth while and to exclude what is superfluous.

We have said nothing of the artistic workmanship of the material form of the volume. The binding and letter-press have received due attention in the wide-spread notices of the preceding volumes. The text of the sixth volume like that of its predecessors is abundantly interspersed with rare and interesting illustrations, many of them of full-page proportions, and all well-printed and clear. There are in addition three colored plates by Goupil.

A word should be said in praise of the excellence of the translations. As many of the foreign contributors write in their own vernaculars, a staff of translators is one of the permanent provisions in connection with the Encyclopedia. It is composed of the following writers, whose names are also to be found attached to a number of original articles: Ewan Macpherson, J. C. Grey, Joseph Otten, Leo A. Kelly, Katharine M. Crooks, Florence M. Rudge, Jean des Garennes, Blanche M. Kelly, Nicholas Weber, C. Cornelia Craigie, Thomas Kennedy, Dora Scott and Katharine Hennessy. Besides this standing board of translators, the services of others are obtained in the case of special papers presenting technical difficulties, such as the treatise on "Grace" in the present volume. We can only say that the foreign contributors are fortunate in their translators: the idiomatic accuracy of the English versions has obtained for their work a dignified uniformity with the English written articles.

Only four months have intervened since the appearance of the fifth volume. The editors of the Encyclopedia are sanguine in their expectation of being able from now on to finish the rest of the work at the rate of three volumes a year. In three years, at this rate, we should see the capstone laid on this truly titanic structure. The inception and progress of "The Catholic Encyclopedia" is one of the most encouraging signs in recent Catholic life, a monument of our age, and a rallying point for future endeavor.

Napoleon's Brothers, by A. HILLIARD ATTERIDGE. London, Methuen & Co.; New York, Brentano's.

Few ever stop to think how little we know of the immediate relatives of the great Emperor. One might be pretty well up in the history of the brief years of the Empire, and yet be unable to name his brothers off-hand, just as one well up in his Bible, might be puzzled for a moment if asked to give the names of the sons of Jacob. As the author of the interesting book we are noticing remarks, Napoleon's brothers are obscured by the splendor of Napoleon himself. One might go further and say that their own mediocrity obscures them, for it is certain that but for their imperial and imperious brother, they would never have been heard of. With the exception of Lucien, who for this very reason had no part in the drama of Kings played on the stage of Europe, they were merely his puppets; and although at a puppet-show we watch the puppets and ignore the man that pulls the strings, we necessarily act in the opposite way when history is in question. This being the case we understand that Mr. Atteridge's book does not pretend to be a contribution to the history of the Empire, but rather to what those who value polite learning call its erudition. Mr. Atteridge has given us a most readable book. He takes pleasure in pouring contempt on Jerome, whose whole life from the moment he abandoned his American wife in the heyday of his youth to that of his old age in which he deserted his so-called wife, the Marchesa Bartolini-

Badelli, was utterly contemptible. The contrast between him and Lucien, who having married Alexandrine Joubertou, stuck bravely to her, disposes the author to treat this second brother of Napoleon with more consideration than he deserves. The woes of Joseph in Spain and of Louis in Holland are well told, and a brief account is added of the more important descendants of the brothers. Mr. Atteridge skims lightly over unpleasant subjects as, for example, the character of Hortense, and the connection of Louis Napoleon and his cousin Prince Napoleon with the Carbonari. The latter's seamy side is kept so well out of sight, that we are not told even how he got his nick-name, Plon-Plon. Lucien's son, the Prince of Canino, of the Roman Republic, deserves at least the passing notice given his brother Pierre, who shot Victor Noir. However, just what is to be recorded and what omitted in a book of this kind is, after all, a matter of opinion, and Mr. Atteridge had a perfect right to follow his own. In doing so he has produced a book that we can sincerely recommend. A difference of opinion upon the propriety of using the native forms of names of places well-known to the ordinary reader under their English forms may be allowed, but for our part we prefer, for example, Pampeluna to Pamplona. A hundred years ago what to-day is called a battle-ship, was a ship-of-the-line, or a line-of-battle-ship. "A cardinal wearing cope and crozier" strikes us even in America as somewhat odd, though our scribblers do sometimes write of a dandy "wearing a cane." Mr. Atteridge gives a very good bibliography. H. W.

San Celestino by JOHN AYSBOUGH. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

This is an uncommon work of fiction. We are curious to learn its effect upon the public that welcomed "Marotz" and "Dromina." It ignores all human love, it is familiarly Catholic in its tone and spirit, is ascetical in its admirations and sympathies and reads sometimes like a chapter of Rodriguez done into modern fiction. It has nothing to recommend it to the reader of light literature except a discreet style and keen analytic pen-play on a background of rich imaginative color.

We have here an imaginary portrait, after the manner of Walter Pater's famous studies, of Saint Celestine V. The way in which a few scanty clues of facts serve as an articulation for a living, breathing figure of flesh and blood is, in its way, a triumph of literary art and almost deserves recognition as a serious study of an episode which has always attracted the attention of students in ecclesiastical history.

There is no attempt to be accurate in narrating the events of the times in which Saint Celestine lived. But the legitimate latitude of the novelist in the matter of accuracy finds compensation for the serious reader in the artistic reproduction of the life and manners of a bygone age. And, as for the reader who wishes to be entertained, the book abounds in witty delineations of character; and its pages, which are never dull, contain many light and exquisite pictures so vividly presented as to be likely to remain long in the memory after the book has been put aside.

The Cosmographiæ Introductio of Martin Waldseemüller in Facsimile. Followed by four Voyages of Amerigo Vespucci, with their translation into English; to which are added Waldseemüller's Two World Maps of 1507 with an introduction by Professor Joseph Fischer, S.J., and Professor Franz von Wieser. Edited by Charles George Herbermann, Ph.D. New York: published by the United States Catholic Historical Society, 1907.

The distinguished names of the publishers of this work and of its editor, are a sufficient guarantee of its excellence. Its publication in the fourth centenary of the naming of the New World, is most opportune. In 1507, fifteen years after the first voyage of Columbus, and one year after his death, the Geographer Martin Waldseemüller published his famous "Cosmographiæ Introductio." This important work consisted of two distinct parts: an outline of Cosmography (i.e. Geography) according to traditional views, a translation into Latin of the story of the four voyages of Amerigo Vespucci, written by himself, and two large world maps, a plane and a spherical projection, on which, in addition to those already known, Waldseemüller laid out the lands discovered by Columbus and explored and described by Vespucci. In these maps, the first to bear the name America, is the "baptismal certificate" of the New World. Both are of the utmost importance in the history of cartography. For centuries they were vainly sought in European libraries. At last in 1900 Father Joseph Fischer, S.J., Professor at Feldkirch, Austria, found a copy of the large Plane Map in the library of Castle Wolfegg, in Württemberg. In 1903 Father Fischer and his old Professor, Franz von Wieser, published a facsimile edition of it, together with an exhaustive commentary in folio. For fuller information concerning this important discovery and its literature we refer the student to two papers of Dr. Herbermann in the "Records and Studies" of the United States Catholic Historical Society. (Vol. III, Parts I and II, 1903.) The first is a brief extract of Father Fischer's study, "The Northmen in America," which contains the latest results of European investigation on this knotty point. The second gives us the origin and history of Waldseemüller's Map of 1507.

In his new work Dr. Herbermann has collected the most important parts of Waldseemüller's original publication. The two maps exhibit a picture of the world as it was known four centuries ago. The facsimile of the "Introductio" and the "Quatuor Americi Vesputii Navigationes" shows us a piece of early Strassburg black letter and the condition of the science of geography at the time of its publication. A careful translation of these documents into English makes them accessible to the American public. It was Vespucci's naïve and interesting narration and description of the newly discovered lands, that led Waldseemüller to name them "America." In later years Waldseemüller became convinced, that Vespucci should not be regarded as the true discoverer of the New World. His attempt, however, to withdraw the name failed. During his second voyage Vespucci encountered "a wild, cruel and cannibal tribe" called "Canibali." This name gives us perhaps a more likely derivation of the word "cannibal" than that given in the Standard Dictionary from "W. Ind. 'caribe,' brave, daring."

Dr. Herbermann's monograph undoubtedly deserves to be in all the libraries of our country and we are sure, that no student of early American history will refuse it a place on his book shelves.

Une Anglaise Convertie par le P. H. d'ARRAS.—I, Ma Conversion, récit autobiographique, par MME. L'ARRAS. II, Notes, Souvenirs, Correspondence. Introduction par la comtesse de COURSON. Paris: Librairie Gabriel Beauchesne et Cie; price 2 fr.; franco, 2 fr. 25.

Louisa Augusta Lechmere is the valiant woman whose life-story is told in these pages, partly in her own words, partly in those of her son, Father H. d'Arras, S.J. This noble convert was the daughter of Sir Edmund Lechmere and of the Honorable Clara Murray, who had been Lady-in-waiting to Queen Charlotte, wife of George III. Father and mother were Anglicans of the old school, pious in their way, of somewhat Puritanical views, with a childish dread of Catholicism, but upright and honorable. Born in 1829 Louisa Lechmere was caught in the eddies of the Oxford Movement, and by a series of apparently trifling but providential circumstances brought to the Truth. The fifty pages, written at the request of her friend and adviser, Mgr. Guillebert, Bishop of Fréjus and Toulon, in which she chronicles her struggles and conversion, breathe simplicity and candor in every line. Outlawed by relatives and friends, disinherited by her father, solemnly adjured in presence of that father's corpse to return to Protestantism, Louisa Lechmere, broken-hearted but unbending, stood out firm as a rock against every trial. It is a dramatic story as artless in the telling as it is ennobling in its moral lesson.

In the second part of the book, Father d'Arras, from notes and letters, has given us the subsequent life of his mother. Her happy marriage with M. d'Arras, her journeyings, her charities, her austerities, her sunny temperament, her ardent yet practical piety, her joy at giving three of her children to the service of God, are painted by her biographer with delicacy and reserve. If here and there the scribe might look for a little more compression, he will easily be indulgent as he remembers that it is a son and a priest recording, as Augustine did for Monica, the virtues of a brave-hearted Christian and of one of the best of mothers.

"Une Anglaise Convertie" belongs to a class of works we cannot too heartily recommend. Every Catholic biography has its message. The book before us gives us once more the assurance and the proof that the Grace of God flows into the most hidden channels, just as the ocean penetrates far inland through frith and fiord, bearing strength and life on its tides.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

A Brief History of Philosophy (Schwartz, Kirwin & Fauss, New York), is the newest elementary text-book from the indefatigable pen of Father Coppens. It would be most welcome were it for no other reason than that it is the only book of its kind in our language, and, as is probable, in any language. Dr. Turner's valuable "History of Philosophy," of course, is more scholarly and original; but it serves a class of readers who have reached a certain maturity of thought and been already initiated into the domain of philosophic speculation. Father Coppens writes for the beginner just setting foot into a terra incognita. Like all good elementary text-books, however, it will have interest even for the more advanced by affording a bird's-eye view of the vagaries and achievements of the human mind in search of truth and in offering a perspective for the modern specialist.

Reviews and Magazines

The November Irish Monthly has a charmingly descriptive and anecdotal sketch of the Norwegian fjords by J. A. Gaughan. The view in one place was so striking that an American was for a moment at a loss to name a finer in America. But only for a moment. He saved the situation by remembering that he "had never been over the Canadian Rockies." Norway it would seem has become sober by legislation. Saloons and the retailing of whiskey are prohibited. Wine and beer are allowed in cafes, which are closed from noon on Saturday till 10 a. m. on Monday. Idlers are compelled to labor for the State which takes over the care of their families, and thus want and inebriety have been effectually suppressed.—Rev F. M. Gill, S.J., makes an amusing entomological story out of a very scientific description of "How the Microgaster Glomeratus Came to Belvidere." Who the "Microgaster" was and how he behaved when Father Gill introduced him to the Dublin College, is the narrator's secret.—A. L. P. continues "A New Tale of Acadie," which, though true in every detail, is the most interesting and edifying in the number, and this is the highest tribute we can pay to a magazine of which Father Russell, the editor, is also a contributor. It is considered a distinction to have a poem in the Irish Monthly and Rev. Hugh Blunt, an American, has won it in "The Call of the Blood." His refrain, "The blood of me is calling to the Gael," will find many an echo on this side of the water. Other contributions in prose and verse are of the usual high standard.

a powerful brain. His life was pure, his spirit chivalrous, his charity unbounded. He died in 1900 without accomplishing his task, but to the generations to come he pointed the way.

In his review of lately published Biblical Works, Jean Coles singles out (1) "The History of the Kingdom of God, up to the time of Our Lord," by Ed. König, of the University of Bonn. This is on the whole a solid work and by its firm championship of the supernatural, a consoling contrast to the "dissolving" Higher Criticism of the day. (2) W. H. Bennet's "The Religion of the Post-Exilic Prophets." This work opens the new series, "The Literature and Religion of Israel," edited by James Hastings, known already by his "Dictionary of the Bible." The editor will engage the labors of men like Morris Jastrow, J. Moffat, Buchanan Gray, etc. The point of view is that of the "Hastings Dictionary." The Catholic scholar will not admit all the conclusions, but there is much to praise in this serious, methodical and learned work. (3) A. Van Hoonacker's "The Twelve Minor Prophets." The Louvain professor has admirably accomplished his purpose which was to get at the original text as closely as possible, by sound textual criticism, faithfully to reproduce the sense in the French translation and clearly explain it by an historical, philological and exegetical commentary. The erudition of the author is prodigious, his interpretations bold, but safe. Had he known of Laur's thesis on "The Names of the Prophets," he might have modified certain minor details of his commentary on Zacharias.

In The New Ireland Review for November, the Rev. T. A. Finlay refreshes us with a dialogue on "Free Thought." Watchwords and party cries have had so great an influence in the world's history that even the short chapter in which the United States figures could not be called complete without such decorations. As new pictured appeals to patriotism or expediency or lust for power appear, other set pieces which have served a similar purpose are relegated to cobwebbed attics where obsolete political devices and baits are huddled in dusty disorder. "No taxation without representation" and "Fifty-four forty or fight," once stirred up public feeling and influenced public action, but now they enjoy the stuffy repose of the lumber-room. In the last solution, the writer tells us, freedom of thought seems to mean in the mouths of those who use it as a rallying cry, rejection of all religious authority and teaching. It matters not how much strength and comfort others may find in the criterion of religious truth to which they have given their allegiance and no blind, unreasoning allegiance either, for our champion of free thought, with his molelike clearness of vision, sees nothing but intellectual serfdom in their action. A more intelligent and more dispassionate study of the motives which underlie the Catholic position might bring home to our knight errant under the free thought banner that the stand of the Church is from all view-points simply unique. No other religious organization stands on the same plane with her. In political economy, civics and the natural sciences all rests on the speculations of searchers after truth, and the frequency with which their theories are upset and their conclusions rejected shows that only too often they are gropers in gloom. But what the Church proposes as dogmatic truth is not a mere rehash of the clever guesses of the learned, for her teaching authority rests on no such shifting and uncertain foundation. The mistakes of the learned are legion and the end is not yet. The unfriendly attitude of some men towards religious truth is due, if we may hazard a suggestion, to the impression produced upon them by the thousand and one discordant sects. The noisy advocacy of man-made religions has disgusted the thoughtful who have erroneously supposed that the Church can urge in her own behalf nothing better than emotional appeals to party feeling. We look for more of those dialogues from the same well trimmed pen.

A strongly written article by the Rev. R. Fullerton, on marriage from the Socialistic standpoint, depicts the degradation into which the human family would sink were the promiscuousness advocated by socialists to become a general practice.

Michel d' Herbigny's second article in the Etudes, of October 5, on the Russian Newman, Vladimir Soloviev sketches the various stages in that eventful career. Born in 1853 Soloviev was brought up in the principles of primitive Slavophilism. At the Moscow Gymnasium Büchner's "Matter and Force," Strauss' and Renan's "Life of Christ" sapped his belief. Strange to say he was brought back to it by reading Spinoza, who taught him the existence of the spiritual and the necessity of the Divine. Philosophy henceforth claimed him. A "docent" at Moscow, in 1877, when but twenty-four years old, he was soon retired, his lectures not finding favor with Russian officialdom. The pen now became his weapon. He traveled through Europe everywhere enlisting noble hearts, and foremost amongst them Bishop Strossmayer, in the cause he had championed—Russia's full and complete return to Christ, and the reunion of the Eastern and Western Churches. Soloviev was a noble heart,

According to the Philadelphia Public Ledger the library of the late Henry C. Lea has been given in his will to the University of Pennsylvania and the Ledger adds to this statement:

"As all his own work was based upon original authorities, he expended unlimited time and money in gathering a great mass of more or less obscure and little known publications in all languages, which furnished his raw material, or his tools of trade. In this wide field his library is probably approached by no other private collection and in this country is quite unique.

It is hardly necessary to recall that Mr. Lea's most exploited contributions to printed historical records have been shown to be a mass of information, gathered without discrimination. Scholars will learn with satisfaction that what is valuable in his collection will henceforth be submitted to scholarly treatment before publication.

SOCIOLOGY

The Rev. W. H. Ketcham, Director of the Catholic Indian Bureau, denies the current assertion that the Indians are increasing in numbers. In a letter to the Catholic Citizen, he says:

"One reason that the Indians appear, from government statistical statements to be increasing is that a more careful census of the Indian population is taken now than formerly. Of the 300,000 Indians now claimed by the United States a very large percentage do not have a drop of Indian blood in their veins and are accounted as Indians solely on the ground that they have tribal rights which have been acquired by adoption or intermarriage; in reality they are of white or negro blood.

"White Indians' are to be found in most tribes, while in the Southern tribes, who prior to the Civil war were slave holders, particularly in the case of the Muskogees (Creeks) and Seminoles, there are many 'black Indians' of pure negro blood. With the exception of the tribes here mentioned the Indians have had little tolerance for the negroes, but on account of the large number of marriages between whites and Indians I am of the opinion that 100,000 real Indians (full bloods) are as many as the United States can muster at the present time. I do not pretend to be speaking with absolute accuracy, but I know the Indian population of the United States well, and am convinced that in making these statements I am approximately correct.

"Disease, whisky, and the vices of the white man have done much to exterminate the Indian. The remnant must rapidly disappear because of the ever increasing custom of intermarriage with whites. The Sioux are largely a full blood people and the Sioux missionaries contend that they are dying out with frightful rapidity; on the other hand, the Chippewas, among whom intermarriages with whites are very frequent, are, according to the testimony of their missionaries, increasing. Some tribes appear to remain stationary.

"It is safe to say, generally speaking, that the full blood Indians are decreasing in number, and that the mixed bloods are increasing; that the Indian race, in all probability, a century hence, will have few if any representatives in the United States."

Nathan Straus has given a cottage at Lakewood, N. J., and eight acres of pine woods, surrounding it for a sanatorium for children from the tenements, in the first stage of tuberculosis. He has also given his stock in the Lakewood Hotel, worth about $500,000, as an endowment. Miss Dorothy Whitney has given $100,000, and other gifts make up an endowment fund of $700,000, which it is expected will reach a million. Ninety-two children have been treated successfully and plans are being made for the accommodation of 400. An annual income exceeding that of the endowment by $60,000 will be needed. This is to be provided for by annual subscriptions. The average time for a cure is three months: 1,200 patients therefore will pass through the institution each year.

The delegates sent by the State Department to the International Congress on Drunkenness last July have made their report. They recommend for this country the practice common in England, France and Australia, of posting placards explanatory of the evils of intemperance. At the Congress the delegates of twenty-three countries supported Judge Pollard of the St. Louis Police Court, in his proposal to suspend sentence on every first offender and compel him to take the pledge for a year. Should he break it, the sentence would follow.

Suicide is increasing fearfully. In the period of 1900-1904 it averaged 17.5 per 100,000 in 65 cities of over 100,000 population. In 1904-1908 it rose to 19.5, and in the last year of this period it was 21.8. The increase is greater in Western and Southern cities than in Northern and North-central, and amongst the well-to-do than amongst the poorer classes.

It has been decided to hold the next national convention of the German Catholic Central Verein in Newark, N. J. A meeting of delegates of the thirty societies affiliated in the New Jersey Federation of German Catholic Societies, will be held at St. Mary's rectory, Newark, on Dec. 12, to fix the exact date for the meeting of the National convention.

The secret methods followed in the Astor divorce are widely criticised. Some hold that they tend to increase the number of divorces, others object to them as Star Chamber methods, others again complain that there is secrecy for the rich and none for the poor. The last seems to be the most general objection.

The Mayor of Plymouth, England, has given great scandal by recommending publicly the asphyxiation of the feeble-minded and the application of the money thus saved to what he calls more useful purposes.

W. D. Sloane has given Columbia University $100,000 for additions to the Sloane Maternity Hospital, founded by himself and his wife.

ECONOMICS

Since the establishment of a date-palm orchard in a small and tentative way at Tempe, Arizona, in 1899, the experiments conducted under the auspices of the University of Arizona have demonstrated that parts of the territory are suitable for the production of dates of excellent quality in commercial quantities. The original importation of date-palm "suckers," or offshoots, made by the United States Department of Agriculture in 1890, consisted of sixty specimens from Cairo, Egypt and the French colony of Algeria. When they began to fruit, it was observed that some varieties needed a longer and hotter season for ripening than the Arizona climate afforded, but the early and medium early kinds produced dates of excellent quality.

Desirable varieties are propagated by suckers, which come into full bearing from six to eight years after planting. As with other fruit trees, the seed cannot be depended upon to reproduce the parent tree; the date-palm is moreover dioecious. The trees flower in April and ripen their fruit from August to January. From twenty-five to two hundred pounds of dates may be expected from each tree in full bearing.

To protect the ripening fruit from the ravages of birds, each great cluster, like a huge bunch of grapes, is enclosed in a sack of cheese-cloth. The fruit is treated with carbon bisulphide, to destroy the larvae of moths, for it needs no preservative. The green cluster may be cut and ripened under cover, as is done with bananas, but there is always a great loss of flavor. The gopher and the desert rat are the date-palm's chief enemies, for they devour the succulent roots and eat out the hearts of the trees. A pernicious variety of scale which saps the vitality of the tree is destroyed by means of a gasoline torch, with no damage to the trunk, which, from its endogenous structure, can withstand terrific heat. Some palms on Sutter and Bush streets were the only forms of vegetable life in that locality which survived the San Francisco fire of 1906.

The Orient, the first ship of the well known Orient Line to Australia, has made her last voyage, and is to be handed over to the ship-breakers. She has been in continuous service for thirty years and has steamed between three and four million miles.

The Trafalgar dock, Southampton, England, is being enlarged to accommodate the White Star steamers, Titanic and Olympic, now building. It is to be 890 feet long and 100 feet wide at the entrance, and will have 34 feet of water on the sill at high tide.

EDUCATION

The Atlantic Monthly for November has three papers that will attract the attention of those whose inclinations run to school methods and training. In "The Making of a Professor" the writer gives us a bright sketch which turns upon the ever controverted question: what is true scholarship? Does it rest in the faculty to commune with the world's great creative minds and to interpret their message of humanity, or is it found in the capacity for collection and arrangement of data about them? Is it the zeal of the system with its study of things about literature which leaves one no time to study literature itself? And the writer has succeeded in developing a strong plea against the narrowness of all those, who confusing means and end inordinately emphasize the trivial unknown things of scholarly research to the neglect of the great field of the known and the approved.

In the paper "Vocation Teaching," William Miller suggests a novelty in the make-up of the teaching faculty of high schools. Recognizing the folly of elective courses where the pupil is apt to choose his courses without due thought or a due appreciation of his own weaknesses, he would introduce into every high school a vocation teacher whose task it will be to get a knowledge of the individual aptitude of pupils and of their desires in order to help them in their choice of school work. This Vocation Teacher would do more than help in the choice of courses. When the actual work is on he would keep in close touch with the pupil all through his course, guiding, supervising and encouraging him—and to this one task in the details of its conception he would give his whole time. The only difficulty that the author seriously considers in his proposal—although he grants that it presents many grave difficulties—would be the securing of properly equipped and trained men to do the work. One might observe that all that is described as belonging to the province of this new teacher suggested for high schools, used to be considered as part of the duty of every good teacher no matter how lowly his part in the training of the young. But our present tendency is to specialize and surely the specialization that leads to the Vocation Teacher here described is the very acme of the art!

The Inaugural Address of President A. Lawrence Lowell, of Harvard, is a strong paper in which the new head of Harvard discusses the ideal college training from these three different aspects: the highest development of the individual student, the proper relation of the college to the professional school and the relation of the students to one another. One is glad to note that Harvard's new President does not mean to align himself with those who seem to fancy that the need of college training has ceased, and that the college is to be absorbed between the secondary school on the one side and the professional school on the other. That particular feature of educational training which subjects its men to a general training, which will be narrowed to no one point of view, to no one vocation or calling, has, as President Lowell affirms, a great work to do for the American people, and it is not by destroying but by perfecting its efficiency that there will be achieved the results needed in our intellectual advancement.

The London Tablet prints "A Suggestion to French Convents in England," which takes a practical view of an important matter, the necessity of coordination amongst the teaching orders and congregations. This, no doubt, is more pressing in England than in this country for the reasons given by the writer of the article, the influx of French religious and the stricter organization of secondary education. Nevertheless the matter deserves the attention of the teaching religious in America. These have for their vocation, first, to seek their own salvation, and then to labor for the salvation of others. The latter element is a means to attain the former; but if the teaching is not what it ought to be, it is not going to do much for either. It is certain that no order or congregation can cover the whole field of education thoroughly. One may be especially adapted to primary work; another to secondary. One may be especially fitted to give a liberal education; another, to give a commercial training. Each remaining in its own sphere will produce good results; intruding into the sphere of another, it will fail. Moreover, even in its own sphere not every order or congregation can do everything well, and this must be more frequently the case with those that have charge of higher education. Under such circumstances it becomes a duty to employ experienced secular instructors, or else to admit frankly that certain subjects are omitted from the curriculum. The former is the course to be preferred, but the latter is preferable to slipshod teaching by an inefficient religious.

Another gratifying evidence of a prosperous condition in Catholic educational work comes to us with the appearance of the fifteenth annual report of the Superintendent of Parish Schools of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, just published. The report makes a book of one hundred and fifty-one pages, the matter and form of which are alike creditable to the compiler, the Rev. Philip R. McDevitt, for years the efficient Superintendent of the Philadelphia

Parish schools. AMERICA has commented in a former number on the personal report of Father McDevitt, termed by the Standard and Times a "truly notable production."

The book before us gives in addition a series of interesting reading notes culled from the reports of educational and charity conferences held during the year and a detailed summary of enrollment, attendance and courses of study in the Philadelphia Parish schools during 1908-9. A map showing the general population, also Common school attendance and Parish school attendance of the several States of the Union based upon data taken from the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1908, will prove an attraction for such as find occasion to study statistics. It offers an easy line of argument to those who question the justice of the present condition of affairs among us, illustrating as it does the immense burden carried by Catholics who for conscience' sake willingly accept the obligation of double taxation for educational purposes.

In a communication recently forwarded to the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of New York by a former school principal, Mr. H. W. Smith, a suggestion is made which deserves more than passing and local attention. As is known the summer vacation period has been gradually lengthened within the past generation or two until the conclusion of Mr. Smith that "summer vacations are altogether too long, injurious to the city and demoralizing to school efficiency," is become a fairly general opinion. To remedy the evil the veteran principal makes this proposition:

"Let the months of June, July, August and September be considered the vacation period. During that time open the schools every morning as usual at nine o'clock, and close them at twelve—no afternoon session. During the months of June and July allow one-half of the teachers to be absent on their vacations, and the other half during August and September. This arrangement of vacations would do away with the cost and labor of the summer schools as now organized, and save the city very considerable expense.

The course of study during that period, I would recommend, should be confined to the essentials, reading, writing and arithmetic, which would overcome a great deal of the loss which is now sustained by absence from school."

The suggestion has more than its novelty to commend it. Whether it will appeal to those who should seek a remedy against the demoralizing effects of vacations on the school efficiency of our primary schools is another question.

SCIENCE

The National Geographic Society, satisfied after a thorough examination of Commander Peary's report, that the explorer really reached the point further North and believing itself justified in demanding like proof of Dr. Cook, has forwarded the following cablegram to the University of Copenhagen: "The National Geographic Society is about to send representatives to Copenhagen. As our committee has access to the original records of Commander Peary, we respectfully ask the University of Copenhagen to grant the request of being present at the official examination of Dr. Cook's papers. The professors of the University promptly cabled back an absolute refusal."

The National Geographic Society's committee is made up of T. Howard Gore, Rear Admiral John E. Pillsbury, U. S. N., and Dr. G. Willard Hayes of the geological survey. The society feels satisfied that it will give entirely impartial judgment.

The Signal Corps of the United States Army, under the direction of Gen. Allen and Major Geo. B. Squires will begin shortly to investigate the feasibility of using wireless telegraphy and telephony on dirigibles and aeroplanes. The wireless telegraphy set, designed by the army, is the lightest known, weighing but seventy-five pounds. To prevent the possibility of ignition of the gas of the lighter-than-air machines the spark is encased in a mica capsule. This instrument is calculated to send and receive messages over thirty miles. The aeroplane offers a serious difficulty in the use of these instruments, it being certain that the noise of the engine will prevent receiving messages though it will not affect those sent. A muffler on the engine has been suggested, but its installation would so cut down the power that the plane could no longer be made to lift the weight of aviator and wireless outfit.

The British Radium Corporation has erected a factory in London to extract radium from pitchblende found in the Trenwith copper mines of Cornwall, and thus put this mineral on a commercial basis. The pitchblende was till lately regarded as an incumbrance but now it has made the Trenwith mines richer than the diamond fields of Africa. The total quantity of radium which has been recovered for scientific use does not yet exceed a quarter of a pound and is valued at $2,500,000 an ounce. Hitherto the only available sources of radium have been in Austria.

With a million dollars, the gift of a noted philanthropist, at their disposal, entomologists feel assured that they can eradicate the hook worm which has made such inroads on the health of the poor people of the South. Dr. Charles Stiles, chief of the division of Zoology, United States Public Health and Marine Hospital Service, and discoverer of the American species of this parasite, claims that his investigations go to show that 2,000,000 persons are afflicted with this dreaded disease. A board of twelve physicians, scientists and philanthropists has been appointed to make the necessary allotments for research.

Jean Commandon, a French scientist, has invented a micro-cinematograph which gives records of active microbes. By placing the infected animal's blood between two strips of glass and attaching the cinematograph apparatus to an ultra microscope, he has succeeded in magnifying to 20,000 diameters and exhibiting the sleeping sickness microbes as large as eels and in active operation. Other records show the heart beating and the digestive process of microbes the size of which is one-thousandth of a millimeter.

Halley's comet was observed visibly with little difficulty on October 17th, with a 15-inch equatorial. It appears to be growing brighter somewhat more rapidly than was anticipated. More recent computations by Rev. G. H. Searle, C.S.P., warrant the belief that the comet will pass in front of the sun's face on May 18th, 9:15 p. m., Eastern time. At present the comet is about two hundred and thirty million miles from the earth and fifty million miles more from the sun.

The science of metallurgy, according to Elmer E. Carey, in the Los Angeles Mining Review, is now entering upon the electrochemical period. To substantiate this there are advanced the electrolytic methods of refining copper and of reducing gold, iron, tin, aluminum, mercury and sodium. The processes are attended with little difficulty and yield the more staple products. The metals, so derived, are freer of impurities, and stouter and finer grained.

The Medical profession is awaiting with interest the result of a series of experiments which Dr. Eugene Hodenpyl, chief pathologist of Roosevelt Hospital, has been making for several months with a new cancer serum. These are following the usual method of serum treatments for malignant diseases. An animal inoculated with fluid from a cancerous patient, resisting the inroads of the malady, develops an antibody, which latter being injected into the patient, stimulates his system to do like battle against the disease. The Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research is working along the same lines.

A new monorail car was shown a few days ago, in the War Office grounds, London. It measures 40 feet in length, 10 in width, is 13 feet high, weighs 22 tons, and accommodates 40 passengers. Two gyroscopes, each weighing three-quarters of a ton, give it stability. With a motor working at 80-horse power, a speed of 25 miles an hour was attained. The test seemed to show that the heavier the car the greater is the stability and consequently the greater the safety.

We are no longer to believe that the smoke nuisance occasioned by railroads has but a single solution, the electrification of the road. The Big Four road claims to have an effective smoke-preventer. Smoke is occasioned by the imperfect combustion of certain gasses and it is found that heated air assists in very great measure this consumption. Accordingly an air pump attachment is made to force air, previously heated, into the fire-box of the engine.

During the recent tests at Fort Meyer, Va., of the Baldwin lighter-than-air dirigible considerable difficulty was experienced in generating the necessary hydrogen for inflation. In view of this the United States Signal Corps has installed an electrolytic gas plant at Fort Omaha, the site chosen for future experimentations in aviation. The plant is rated to deliver 690 feet of hydrogen an hour.

French papers report that a fossil human skeleton has been discovered in the Department of Dordogne. It was imbedded in the lower middle post tertiary stratum and is said to be 20,000 years old. We shall hear of this skeleton again, as we have heard of others with regard to which similar claims have been made.

The Executive Committee of the Zeppelin Polar Expedition has authorized a test expedition to Spitzbergen in order to ascertain the conditions there affecting the management of airships. Plans have been drawn up for the construction of a suitable airship which will be launched in 1911.

Dr. Robert W. Wood, professor of experimental physics at Johns Hopkins University, has added one more to his many notable achievements in color photography. He has succeeded in producing landscape scenes in which the infra red and ultra violet rays are shown. These colors have never before been visible to the naked eye.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Under the auspices of Archbishop Farley arrangements are in progress to celebrate in St. Patrick's Cathedral, on December 1, the centenary of the founding of the American branch of the Sisters of Charity by Mother Elizabeth Seton, at Emmitsburg, Md., the New York foundation of which is now located at Mount St. Vincent-on-the-Hudson. On the following day local commemorations will take place in the different parishes where these Sisters have schools. The Seton Sisters of Charity have been established in New York as a separate and independent foundation from the Emmitsburg jurisdiction since December 8, 1846, when the community was located at St. James' Academy, 35 East Broadway. It now numbers about 1,400 members, who have charge of 20 academies, 6 high schools, 73 parochial schools, with 50,000 pupils; 5 orphan asylums, 1,800 inmates; children in Homes, 600; in Industrial Schools and Protectory, 1,620; 1 foundling hospital, 3,340 children and 550 needy and homeless mothers; 2 day nurseries, 100 children; 1 home for aged poor, 270 inmates; 1 retreat for insane, 150 patients; 11 hospitals. Their first school and orphan asylum in New York was opened in 1817, in old St. Patrick's parish by Sisters Rose White, Cecelia O'Conway and Elizabeth Boyle who were sent from Emmitsburg for this purpose by Mother Seton. From the East Broadway house the convent was moved in 1847 to the location in what is now Central Park. In 1857 when the Park was laid out another move had to be made to the present site below Yonkers on the Hudson. This centenary celebration was postponed from last June, owing to the absence of Archbishop Farley in Rome.

On September 17, Archbishop Harty, of Manila, gave a banquet to the Papal Delegate in the Archipelago, Mgr. Ambrosio Agius O.S.B., on the occasion of the latter's departure for Rome. At the banquet, which was held in the Archbishop's Palace, the most prominent men in the Philippines were present. Among other distinguished guests were Cameron Forbes, the General Governor of the Islands, the Military Governor, Representatives of the Manila Banking Corporations and the Superiors of the Religious Orders. It is believed that Mgr. Agius, who is now in Rome, will return in about four months.

At the Night School for working men in Manila, of which AMERICA made mention a few weeks ago, the attendance is now more than six hundred and it is steadily increasing. Father Vilallonga, S.J., is thinking of establishing a "Patronato Mariano" in order to give the working people material help in addition to the intellectual and moral help, which through the Sodalists of Mary he is already giving them.

The Rt. Rev. T. A. Hendrick, D.D., Bishop of Cebu, has left the Islands in company with his brother, Mgr. Hendrick, of Ovid, New York. The bishop has recovered from his late illness, but is in need of rest for a time and a more invigorating climate.

President Taft was a guest of honor at the golden jubilee celebration of St. Aloysius' Church, Washington, D. C., on Sunday. President Buchanan was present at the laying of the corner stone fifty years ago. Accompanied by the Apostolic Delegate, Mgr. Diomedeo Falconio and Cardinal Gibbons, the President reviewed a parade of the Holy Name Societies, the Catholic Knights of America, the Ancient Order of Hibernians, the Knights of Columbus and other Catholic organizations of the District. The open-air exercises took place in front of the church where the Rev. Eugene McDonnell, S.J., introduced the President to an assemblage of from thirty to forty thousand people. The President's address was short. He said religion was the cornerstone of the republic, and that the separation of Church and State was sometimes construed as meaning hostility to religion. He pointed out the error in this view, and then referred to his own attitude towards all Churches which, he said, he regarded as influences for the advance of civilization. These he would aid in every way he could.

Owing to several unseemly incidents Mgr. Bisleti, the Major-Domo of his Holiness has sent the following circular letter to those personages upon whose recommendations foreigners are usually granted audiences with the Pope: "It is my duty to call your attention to the grave responsibility assumed by him who supports by his recommendation demands for admission to the august presence of his Holiness. You will therefore kindly take care not to give commendatory letters under any form whatever, even for collective audiences or Papal functions, except to those whom you know personally, or at least through references that are certain and worthy of consideration."

The London Tablet of October 30, publishes a letter written by the Rev. George Tyrrell to the Old Catholic Bishop, Herzog, in which he denied that the Councils of Trent and Vatican were ecumenical, admitted only a primacy of honor in the Roman Pontiff and showed himself in sympathy with the Church of England, and with the Old Catholics in England as elsewhere. It was evidently written a comparatively short time before his death.

His Grace the Archbishop of Montreal recently went to St. Eustache to baptize the fourteenth child of his sister, Mrs. Belair, who has twelve children living, six boys and six girls. As there was no train when the Archbishop was ready to return, Mr. Rodolphe Forget, M.P., sent his automobile to St. Eustache; the Archbishop motored the twenty-five miles in an hour and reached Montreal in time to bless the armory of the 65th regiment, after the laying of the crowning stone by Sir Frederick Borden, Minister of Militia and Defence.

A Class in Musical Methods has been begun in connection with the work of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, the object of which is to promote a knowledge of good and thoroughly Catholic music suitable for use in our Sunday Schools, as well as to train Catechists in rendering the same. The class is being held at St. Charles Borromeo's, this city, on Wednesday evenings.

On November 10 Archbishop Farley confirmed at Graymore, the six men and twelve women, members of the Society of the Atonement, who had been received into the Church on October 30. Brother Paul James Francis is to take a theological course at Dunwoodie Seminary, and will act also as editor of The Lamp, the publication of which will be continued.

Archbishop O'Connell, of Boston, was invited recently to address the Women's Alliance of that city in explanation of what the Catholic Church is and the work the Church is doing. As he was unable to attend the meeting of the Alliance himself an exhaustive paper he had prepared on "What the Catholic Church Stands For" was read for him by Mgr. Splaine in the hall of the Second Church (Unitarian), on November 10, before a very large audience, the pastor of the church, the Rev. Thomas Van Ness presiding. We are assured the paper was listened to with marked attention during the hour and a half required for its reading, and at its close the large audience of women gave a hearty vote of thanks to the archbishop. That the paper created a profound impression on the members of the Alliance and honest inquiry set afoot was shown by the questions of those who crowded about Mgr. Splaine at its close. The opening sentence indicated the whole scope of the paper: "I come to present to you the position of the Catholic Church in the United States; to tell you what she stands for, what she is doing and what are the sources of her stability and strength."

DRAMATIC NOTES

"The Cottage in the Air," New Theatre.—This is the second production staged here. In one sense it is much more pleasing in its general effect than the representation of "Anthony and Cleopatra," with which the new enterprise was inaugurated. This is no doubt due to the fact that "The Cottage in the Air" is much more easily within the capacity of The New Theatre Stock Company than a Shakespearian tragedy. The modern stage has lost the classical tradition and there are few actors in the new school to fill parts requiring the exceptional and intelligent training which Shakespearian tragedy demands.

It is rare now-a-days to hear an actor in a Shakespearian part who can speak his lines intelligibly. Blank verse is a strange language to the modern stage, and as a rule it is nothing short of lamentable to hear Shakespeare mouthed and butchered on the rare occasions when one of his plays is produced.

The New Theatre had the good fortune to secure Miss Marlowe and Mr. Southern for the leading parts in "Anthony and Cleopatra," with some excellent support. But even with this unusual combination the performance fell short of what it might have been in the days when the traditions of the elder school still held the boards. A giant's robes require the stature of a giant to fill them. While Miss Marlowe came within fair reach of the part of Cleopatra, Mr. Southern's Anthony, though good, was cold and palpably an effort, intelligent, it is true, but far from satisfying. Notable defect in the performances was the difficulty of hearing the lines, a defect due in some measure to faulty acoustics in the theatre itself, and in large part to the fatally imperfect reading of the lines on the part of the company.

In "The Cottage in the Air" this acoustic defect was notably overcome, no doubt owing to the fact that the performers were easily within their capacities in a play where speaking lines were well within their comprehension, and when the heroic element and primitive passions, which require unusual powers for their adequate expression, were absent. "The Cottage in the Air" is a sentimental comedy in four acts with a mildly philanthropic moral. The Princess Priscilla, the daughter of a pompous and wooden-headed Grand Duke, has been secretly instilled with the notion by her tutor, Herr Fritzing, a benevolent old gentleman who dreams and theorizes about an ideal social democracy, that royal pomp and state are mere vanities. Inspired by the idea that her mission in life is to put Herr Fritzing's theories into practice, the Princess escapes in disguise from Court, accompanied by Herr Fritzing, as her uncle, and with him settles in a cottage in a little English town, where she proceeds to play the role of a lady bountiful. She believes that human happiness consists in letting everyone have what everyone wants, with the result that in the distribution of her benevolence the little village is turned topsyturvy with innumerable ensuing funny complications. Finally she comes to the end of her resources, when her betrothed, a prince royal, turns up at the opportune time, rescues her from her embarrassing position and carries her back in triumph to the pomps and vanities of royal life. The theme is carried along in a light and fanciful vein, awaking a pleasant and mild interest with the evident moral that the practical everyday world could be made anew by a theory and that the proper place for each one is in that sphere where nature has placed them. This of course is nothing new, but pertinent at the present hour.

The performance was clever and admirable. Mr. Bruning as Herr Fritzing, the benevolent and impractical old dreamer, perhaps carried off the chief honors, and the entire cast filled their parts with the greatest credit. We may congratulate ourselves that we have in the New Theatre Stock Company more than a mere promise of good things in the way of historic art.

"Seven Days," Astor Theatre.—This is a roaring farce with a good deal of horse-play mingled throughout. Its situations are amusing in the extreme. It pivots upon the complications arising out of a dinner given by a newly divorced man, whose rich maiden aunt arrives upon the scene entirely ignorant of the domestic troubles. He induces one of his female guests to impersonate his wife. The wife herself arrives at this juncture thinking her husband away from home. Meantime a burglar pursued by a policeman gets into the house, and the health officers, who have discovered that the cook has small-pox, seal it up and place all the inmates under quarantine. There is of course neither rhyme nor reason in the play; it is simply pure farce but provocative of uproarious laughter in its sheer absurdity.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

A. C. R., Gardner, Me.—The Basilicas were the great halls for the administration of justice that, with slight modifications, became, in the early Christian period in Rome, places of Christian worship. See the articles on "Basilica" and "Christian Architecture" in "The Catholic Encyclopedia," which show how their form originated a style of ecclesiastical architecture.

A Reader of AMERICA.—We could hardly take up the matter again. The editorial you refer to gives the opinion of the best Catholic writers. Naturally the enemies of the Church welcome an ally wherever found.

PERSONAL

Very Rev. Dr. Thomas J. Shahan, rector of the Catholic University of America, has been made a domestic prelate. The Papal Brief came to him on Tuesday evening through the Apostolic Delegate, Mgr. Falconio, having been forwarded to Washington through the Chancellor's office in Baltimore.

Mr. Saxton Cory provided in his will which disposed of nearly £150,000, that no member of the Roman Catholic Church or "American Catholic Church" should benefit by it.

The Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J., has happily recovered from his recent severe illness and was able, on November 7, to deliver a lecture on the work of the early Jesuit missionaries in Canada in the Church of Our Lady, Guelph.

A report that has had extensive circulation in the press that the late Charles Warren Stoddard burned all his unpublished poems and essays just before his death, is denied on authority. These relics are now being prepared for early publication.

On Nov. 2, All Souls' Day, the Rt. Rev. Mgr. Edward Francis Hurley, of Portland, Me., celebrated the silver jubilee of his ordination to the priesthood. Mgr. Hurley, who at one time was vicar general of the diocese, has been pastor of St. Dominic's, Portland, since the death of Vicar General John W. Murphy.

OBITUARY

Rev. Mother Judith, one of the pioneer Sisters of the Sacred Heart in Hawaii, died at Honolulu October 13. For half a century Mother Judith had devoted herself heart and soul to the noble work of Catholic education in the Hawaiian Islands. For thirty-five years she was Superior of the convent of the Sacred Heart, Honolulu, an office she resigned a few months before her death, owing to ill health and advanced years. Rev. Mother Judith (Marie Brasier) was born in Puy-de-Dôme, France, in 1834, and joined the Hawaiian Mission in 1859.

Mlle. Juliette Dodu died lately in Switzerland. A girl of 18 when the Franco-Prussian war broke out in 1870, she was a telegraph operator at Pithiviers twenty-five miles northeast of Orleans. The Germans in cutting the telegraph wires somehow overlooked one leading into her office and Mlle. Dodu was thus able to notify the government at Tours of their movements.

Moreover during the battles of November around Orleans she found the German wire near her window. She tapped it and during seventeen days intercepted the despatches from the headquarters of Prince Frederick Charles, sending the information to Aurelle de Palladines in Orleans. At last discovered, she was sentenced to be shot as a spy. The Prince himself, moved by her devotion, interfered and saved her life.

Peter Pawinski, for two terms city comptroller of Milwaukee, died on Oct. 28, aged 52 years. He was born in Poland, and was prominent in the affairs of the Polish National Alliance.

George Daniel, Sr., who had served as postmaster and for three terms as Mayor of Sandusky, Ohio, died on November 5, aged 75 years. He was a native of Hesse-Darmstadt.

The Rev. Bernard Kroeger, pioneer priest of the Diocese of Fort Wayne, dean of the Logansport district, and rector of St. Bridget's Church, Fort Wayne, died on November 9, aged 77 years. He was born in Prussia and ordained in Fort Wayne August 2, 1863.

The Rev. Daniel H. O'Dwyer, pastor of St. John's, New York City, died of apoplexy Sunday morning. On Saturday he attended the funeral services of his father, John O'Dwyer, who had died the previous Thursday. Father O'Dwyer was forty-seven years old. Six years ago he became pastor of St. John's which had but 500 members. Since then it has grown to 15,000. Through Father O'Dwyer's efforts a new church valued at $250,000 was erected recently.

Mother Mary of the Desert, for more than half a century head of St. Mary's Boys' Asylum, New Orleans, and for more than sixty-five years a member of the Marianites of the Holy Cross, died recently, aged eighty-four years. She was the sole survivor of the pioneer band of Marianite Sisters who went to New Orleans from Canada in 1852, during an epidemic of yellow fever. Born in France in 1825, she became a religious in 1846 and was professed at St. Laurent, Canada, in 1847. She left a diary in which she had recorded the interesting events under her observation for the past sixty-five years. Mother Desert has been one of the most noted characters in New Orleans for half a century. From the inmates of her orphanage she selected with unfailing eye boys of talent, and procured the means of educating them for various professions. Priests, doctors, lawyers and merchants of her making stood around her bier.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Having just returned from a trip to West Virginia, and read with unabated interest your issue of October 16th, the writer was, more than ordinarily, impressed with the editorial "A New World's Holiday," as being peculiarly applicable to the Knights of Columbus in their celebration of Columbus Day throughout the United States, and the enlightening consequences which may be expected to follow each recurring year, as the celebration grows.

The writer happened to be in a town—little more than a village—a few days after the celebration of Columbus Day by a local council of the Knights. A fairly good report of the celebration and the speeches was published by the local paper. About the same time a Woman's Temperance League meeting was being held, and the visiting delegates were being entertained by the hospitable families of the town. A Catholic friend entertained four of these delegates. The evening after Columbus Day these ladies read with great interest an account of the celebration, and expressed the greatest astonishment on learning that Columbus was a Catholic!

Here were four evidently intelligent women who confessed their complete ignorance of such an historic fact. The further information they received on Catholic subjects, and their enjoyment of the refined influence of a Catholic home greatly impressed these women, and no doubt will have a lasting influence on their minds in the future.

From many years' association with people of our rural sections, I believe they are a deeply religious people, but have been purposely kept in ignorance of Catholic historical facts by their teachers and preachers, and the Catholic Church has been so persistently maligned from their pulpits, it is only natural that they fear and detest the Mother Church of Christendom. I have had many experiences of this deep ignorance, and consequent prejudice against the Faith. I was once asked by a West Virginia gentleman, of historic name and lineage in Old Virginia, the significance of the Holy Name button I wore, and when the inscription on the button was explained to him, he asked in apparently great astonishment: "Do you Catholics believe in Jesus?" He was asked if he were not thinking of the Jews: "No," he said, "I was always taught that you did not believe in Him, although worshipping His mother." But this was accounted for by learning afterward that he attended a Presbyterian church, the pastor of which never for twenty years preached a sermon without somehow dragging in Catholicity and re-educating Catholics.

On a recent occasion a neighbor called one Sunday afternoon to ask if it were really true that Catholics worshiped Mary. She said her Methodist minister had that morning asserted they did, "calling her the Blessed Virgin Mother of God, without any Scriptural authority for doing so." But knowing so many Catholics she "could hardly believe him." She was requested to bring over her King James Bible and the first Chapter of St. Luke was read to her. She said she never remembered having read that chapter, and confessed that her knowledge of the Scriptures was limited to certain verses, printed on leaflets, and learned at Sunday School. Her respect for the Bible was sincere, and when she read again and again: "Henceforth all generations shall call me Blessed" she turned down the leaf of her Bible, and declared she would show it to her minister and prove to him how wrong he was.

To counteract, in some measure, and dispel such dense ignorance of our Holy Faith, the Federation of Catholic Societies of this county has within the past six months published a Catholic Catechism, bi-weekly, in an evening paper, chapter by chapter. Having completed the Catechism, it is now publishing "The Inquirer's Guide. An easy Way to Learn What the Catholic Church is, and What the Catholic Church Teaches," by the Right Rev. Regis Canevin, D.D., Bishop of Pittsburg. Thus it is hoped the minds of many earnest souls seeing the Light may be led out of the darkness of unbelief, who otherwise might never hear anything truthfully explained of Catholic faith and practice.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

I cannot feel comfortable without AMERICA.—Rev. D. S. O'Begley, Delphos, Kansas.

Long life and a prosperous one to AMERICA and to its editors. Rev. James Walsh, Providence, R. I.

I have read several issues of AMERICA, and always found it an honest, fearless and solid Catholic paper. I shall be glad to recommend it to the notice of the seminarians. Wishing you a full measure of success in your work.—Rev. T. F. Gignac, Laporte, Texas.

The current number of "AMERICA," the Catholic review of New York, edited and published by the Jesuit Fathers, is the beginning of its second volume. This weekly publication stands alone in the United States as the highest type of Catholic journalism, and we feel its success is assured.—The Record, Louisville, Ky.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA.....190

CHRONICLE

Contempt of U. S. Supreme Court.—Six men were imprisoned last week in the Federal jail, Washington, D. C., for contempt of the Supreme Court of the United States; Capt. Shipp, sheriff at Chattanooga, Tenn., his jailer and four assistants. They are serving sentences of from sixty to ninety days for failing to protect from a mob a negro whose legal execution had been stayed by the U. S. Supreme Court until it could review the case. It is the first instance in American history of imprisonment for contempt of the Supreme Court, and also the first time that the Federal Government has imposed a penalty in connection with the lynching of a negro.

Standard Oil Under the Ban.—After a struggle to control the greatest corporation in the country which has endured three years, a judgment was handed down in the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Missouri that marks a signal victory for the law officers of the Government. The decree, prepared by Judge Sanborn, was handed down in St. Paul where the judges of the Circuit are now in session. It affirms the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey to be an illegal combination operating in restraint of trade, and orders its dissolution within thirty days. The judgment forbidding further combination and practically destroying all activity of the Oil Monopoly is entered under the Anti-Trust Law. It is directed against seven individuals, one of whom is John D. Rockefeller, and thirty-seven subsidiary corporations. Thirty-three other corporations mentioned in the original charge before the court, are not included in the decree, the allegations in their case being held "not proven" and their case dismissed. The special prosecutor, who conducted the case for the Government, holds that a favorable decision was reached on every point urged by him. Of course the case will be appealed to the United States Supreme Court; announcement to this effect was in fact made by the corporation's attorney before the judgment had been handed down.

Sugar Trust Frauds.—James F. Bendernagel, formerly superintendent of the Williamsburg plant of the American Sugar Refining Company, who is under indictment on a charge of conspiring with six employees of the Sugar Trust to defraud the government of sugar duties, waived examination before United States Commissioner Benedict, in Brooklyn, and gave $5,000 bail for his appearance on December 1 before the United States Court of the Southern District in Manhattan. James B. Reynolds, until November 1 assistant secretary in charge of customs and now a member of the Foreign Tariff Board, denies the charge of Richard Parr, acting Deputy Surveyor of Customs at New York, that while assistant secretary he placed obstacles in the way of the exposure of the Trust. A similar denial of the charge that, while he was Secretary of the Treasury, he covered up frauds of sugar corporations, was made by Lyman J. Gage. The accusation was made by Wilbur S. Wake-man, formerly Appraiser of the Port of New York. The President has made the prosecution of the Sugar Trust by the Federal Government his own affair. Secretary MacVeagh has been told by the President that he will be given the absolute right of appointment and dismissal in the customs service as the need may arise for carrying on the investigation of the Trust's methods.

The Nicaragua Trouble.—An unsatisfactory reply to the emphatic demand made by Secretary of State Knox for an explanation of the killing of two American citizens by the soldiers of Zelaya was received in Washington. The Secretary, after a conference with his department assistants and with representatives of the Navy, made known his determination to advise the President to take drastic action. Marines, the advance guard of every military movement beyond the limits of the country, are held in readiness to be rushed to Nicaragua if need be to avenge what appears to be the irregular putting to death of two Americans identified with the revolt against Zelaya. Secretary Knox has informed the Chargé d'Affaires of Nicaragua in Washington "that if it be found that the two Americans, Cannon and his companion, were 'summarily executed' this Government will not for a moment tolerate such a treatment of American citizens." He bases his position on the fact that no court, acting within the limits of the Hague agreement, can sentence any prisoner of war, native or foreign, except he can be proved to be a spy, or one acting independent of any military organization. These two Americans do not appear to have been classed as spies.

The Cherry, Illinois, Mine Disaster.—The first flash of sunshine in a story of black disaster came with the tidings that twenty of the miners entombed in the St. Paul Mine at Cherry, Illinois, were taken out alive after an imprisonment of seven days. They had been cut off by the flames and a cave-in following the disastrous fire and explosions a week ago. When the small supply of food the men had with them was exhausted they had eaten bark and chewed tobacco and leather. Small quantities of water had been found in pools in the depths of their prison and after this had been consumed the prisoners drank of the mine seepage. It was their pounding on the wall to cause this to drip down that quite accidentally attracted the attention of a party that had entered the mine to discover and remove the dead. The cave-in had saved the imprisoned group from the smoke and gas following the fire and the supply of air in their end of a drift had been sufficient for them. Madly excited crowds at the pit's mouth above received the rescued party, who though gaunt and weak after their terrible experience will soon be themselves again. One poor fellow died in the moment of safety; a priest in the rescuing party was just able to give him the last Sacraments. The twenty miners brought out are sure others will be found alive in the depths and the work of rescue goes on with feverish energy. The awful disaster has aroused the generous charity of the country and relief in money and necessities is pouring into the desolate little town.

An Appeal for a Ship Subsidy.—Addressing the members of the Chamber of Commerce in New York, Senator Root made an appeal in favor of action which will enable the American marine service to equalize the hard competition with foreign nations. "By our protective tariff," he said, "we have raised the standard of wages and the standard of living within our own country to such a point that the moment American enterprise passes beyond the protective limit of that law, it is impossible for Americans to compete on equal terms with the sailors and ships of other nations." . . . "When we reach the seaboard and our ships put forth to compete upon the ocean with the ships of other countries, that protection ceases, and, as a result it costs so much more to run an American ship than it costs to run the ships of other nations, of other great commercial nations, that the American ship has to go out of business." The only remedy the Senator had to suggest was that "we either abandon the policy which puts up American wages and the American standard of living or that we extend the policy to our ships." The prevailing press comment on this address is unfavorable, questioning why individuals or corporations should be enabled to grow wealthy by protection and still expect to receive from Government subsidies which would enable them to add to this wealth.

Great Britain.—Lord Lansdowne has given notice in the House of Lords that he will move the rejection of the Budget. Mr. Haldane, Secretary of War, speaking on behalf of the ministers says that Parliament will be dissolved and the Government will face the country on the issue of the Budget, Free Trade and the Peers.—The natives of India sent by their fellow countrymen in Natal to interest the Government and the public in their condition in that colony, have returned to South Africa. Their mission was unsuccessful.—The Indian Reform Bill went into effect on November 15th. The Governor-General's Council is increased from 126 to 370 members. Of these 135 will be elected. The legislative functions of the council have been enlarged and it will take an active part in the making up of the Budget. Representation is arranged so as to give representatives to Mohammedans though in a minority. On account of the anarchistic agitation the general and provincial governments may declare ineligible persons whose election is thought to be against the public welfare.—Mr. Herbert Gladstone, the Home Secretary, has accepted the Governor-Generalship of South Africa.

Irish Notes.—The Irish Party took strong measures against the contingency of the returned Land Bill being rejected by the Lords. By unanimous vote they circularized the branches of the Irish National League "to take such steps as will be necessary to deal with the crisis." This was significant owing to the statement of Mr. Redmond that he would not feel called upon to lift a hand to protect the landlords from whatever violence their action should provoke. Mr. Wm. Redmond said that peace could not be maintained if the Bill were rejected; Mr. Dillon placed on the Lords "the responsibility of all the disturbances, suffering and crime that might ensue"; Mr. Gwynne, a very conservative member, declared he would not restrain but stand with the people in forcibly preventing the letting of grazing lands and otherwise forcing the landlords to terms; and Mr. Birrell was understood to utter a like threat when he said to the Irish Lords: "Why do you quarrel in the neighborhood of an abyss?" That the landlords have taken the hint is evidenced by the recent cables announcing that the returned and modified bill has been passed by the Upper House. Much depends on the nature of the modifications; but whether the Land Bill shall prove satisfactory or not, organized agitation is threatened against the exactions of the Budget. The opinion is growing that Mr. Healy is right in his contention that it will impose $10,000,000 additional tax on Ireland, which is already overtaxed by $12,000,000 a year. All parties are agreed that Ireland's circumstances have not been considered at all, that she has been discriminated against in favor of Great Britain, and some are predicting that when the farmers realize the burden of the land and death duties, their resistance will create a condition tantamount to an agrarian war. The farmers of Antrim and Derry, irrespective of political affiliations, have already formed an association for the protection of their interests. They demand that the Government, owing to the great increase of unjust taxation, refund half the cost of administering certain acts for local purposes and all acts for national purposes. They also protest against the custom of giving compulsory powers to the Government Board to administer imperial taxation at the expense of the local taxpayers, as "grossly unjust." The fact that Protestant farmers form the bulk of the membership of this new A. P. A.—Agricultural Protective Association—indicates that Ireland is united against the discriminations of the new finance.

Montreal Theatre Condemned.—The Most Rev. Paul Bruchési, Archbishop of Montreal, issued, on the 11th inst., a pastoral letter condemning the plays presented at the Académie de Musique in that city. His Grace, whose stand on theatre morality is well known, had received assurances from the manager that the plays would be irreproachable on the score of morality; but, hearing from conscientious Catholic playgoers that these promises had been broken, he took the trouble of reading all the plays presented in the past few weeks at the Académie de Musique. He found them immoral and dangerous. Adultery, far from being, as it is in Scripture and Catholic teaching, a horrible crime, is flaunted therein as a piece of good fortune, which forms the warp and woof of all these dramas. They are full of indecent innuendoes and provocations to crime. To frequent this theatre is to attend a school of sin. Were the pretext true—which His Grace absolutely denies—that nowadays no theatre can exist without these shameful and immoral intrigues, the disappearance of the theatre would be desirable. There are enough harmless entertainments without going in search of those which spell ruin for the soul. The archbishop, feeling, as he says, that the great mass of the people are with him in this condemnation, exhorts Catholic mothers to strengthen his hand by banding themselves together against this pestilential drama.

The Montreal Gazette of November 20 says efforts are being made by the management of the Académie de Musique to induce Archbishop Bruchési to remove the condemnation which His Grace passed upon that theatre in a letter read in all Catholic churches the previous Sunday. In answer to a very respectful letter from the management of that theatre acknowledging "the just remonstrances" addressed to them and promising that they "will in future keep a strict watch to see that the plays presented should be in perfect accordance with what you have a right to demand," the Archbishop points out that "similar promises have been made before and have not been kept," and insists upon a reliable censorship of competent and honorable men before he will remove his strictures upon that theatre. The firmness of His Grace's stand is commended by the local press.

Trade with Canada Increasing.—The Payne tariff is acting favorably on exchange in commodities between the United States and British North America. The latter country, our northern neighbor, which includes Newfoundland and Labrador, with an estimated population of seven millions, took from the United States during the months of August and September, 1908, under the Dingley tariff, goods to the value of $23,392,309. In August and September, 1909, the first two months under the Payne tariff, British North America took American goods worth $34,669,107, an increase of more than 48 per cent. Canada's exports to the United States during August and September, 1908, were $14,160,425, and for the corresponding months of 1909, they rose to $16,891,303, an increase of more than 19 per cent. The importance of these figures becomes clearer when they are compared with the increase in our trade with Mexico. The latter republic, with more than twice the population of British North America, took from the United States during August and September, 1908, goods worth $7,707,802, and for the corresponding two months of the Payne tariff for 1909, $8,685,414, a total and an increase (12.6 per cent.) almost exactly one-quarter of Canada's total and increase. Mexico's exports to the United States during August and September, 1908, amounted to $6,274,350, and during the same months of 1909, to $6,891,887, a total considerably less than one-half of Canada's total exports during the same period, and an increase (9.8 per cent.) slightly more than one-half of Canada's increase.

The Pope on France.—Addressing the French pilgrims in Rome, November 18, Pius X said that the French Government, in the expulsion of religious orders, the trials and condemnations of Cardinal Andrieu and other bishops, and the threatened laws extending official protection to irreligious teachers and effecting a state monopoly of schools, had but one aim: to undermine the basis of Christianity. The action of the government in depriving ecclesiastics of the liberty and rights granted by French laws to all free citizens, and the bishops' courageous fulfilment of their apostolic duty, should animate Catholics to give them loyal support and defend manfully their religious rights. The proposed state monopoly of education is intended to efface Christianity in the schools and therefore throughout the nation. Hence all Catholics should unite against the denial of legal acknowledgment of the hierarchy and Catholic schools. Following the Pope's pronouncement Catholic children were withdrawn from the government schools in many parts of France, and in some places a public bonfire was made of the interdicted text-books.

Germany.—It is officially announced that the Dr. von Mühlberg, Prussian representative at the Vatican, on the occasion of the silver jubilee of Pius X as bishop, presented Emperor William's congratulations to the Holy Father. The personal letter of the Emperor conveying his greetings and good wishes was a very cordial one. The Pope, the same announcement adds, expressed his gratification to Dr. von Mühlberg over the Emperor's interest in the happy event.—The German National Committee for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic is in session in Leipsic. The Empress Augusta Victoria, from the beginning most cordial in her support of the movement, sent a special representative to assure the members of the committee of her deep interest in their work and of her purpose to cooperate actively with them in every way possible and proper.—Berlin reports an unexpectedly heavy snow-storm which put an end for the time being to ordinary traffic in the city. The storm is said to have caused heavy damage throughout the Empire, though complete information is lacking on account of the breaking off of telegraphic and telephonic communication. Thuringia, Saxony, and Silesia especially sent in alarming reports of disaster.—The Nord-deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung publishes the estimates which have been prepared for submission to the Reichstag when it reconvenes this month. The budget calls for a total of 2,660,305,450 marks, an excess of nearly seven million over last year. The sum calls for 152 million marks over the estimated assured income of the year. The proposed expenditure includes 807 million marks for the army and 443 million for the navy, an increase of 15 million for the latter as against a decrease of 28 million marks in the army estimates.—Exchange Professor Richards of Harvard, who recently finished his course of lectures in the Berlin University, has been honored by the Berlin Academy of Sciences with election as corresponding member of their body in the Department of Physico-Mathematics.

Austria.—The municipal council of Buda-Pesth has passed an ordinance requiring the teaching of German in all the city schools. The step is welcomed with hearty approval by Germans in the Hungarian capital city as an evidence that knowledge of their language is recognized as a necessity despite the determined stand of the Hungarians for nationalization of their institutions.—The persuasion appears to grow in political circles that for the first time in a long while there is prospect of an understanding between the governing parties of the dual kingdom. Last week Emperor Francis Joseph received in special audience a committee of the dominant party in Hungary. Its members, the Premier, Dr. Wekerle, the Minister of Commerce, Francis Kossuth, and Count Julius Andrássy, Minister of the Interior, journeyed up to Vienna at the Emperor's request in order to hear the conditions on which the Crown was ready to accept the program announced by their party. As a result of the conference harmony between Austria and Hungary seems assured. A new cabinet for Hungary in which Andrássy will be Prime-Minister, Dr. Wekerle, Minister of Finance, and Kossuth will retain his present portfolio is soon to be announced; certain concessions are to be made in the matter of the Hungarians' military demands; the new ministry will unite with Austria in the matter of cash payments, whilst the question of the organization of an independent Hungarian Bank will be for the present set aside.—Prospects are not thus bright in the questions agitated by the Bohemian representatives in the imperial Parliament. The long-looked-for conference of the German party leaders with President of the Council von Bienenroth which was expected to lead to peace measures with the Slavs in Parliament, occurred last week. To the general disappointment of the nation no such results followed. The German leaders demanded an unconditional abandonment of the obstructive tactics by which the Czechs have of late rendered parliamentary action impossible. The Slavic Union, of which the Czech members of parliament are members, refused assent to this proposition. President von Bienenroth in a strong speech, making known the conference action to Parliament, declared that he and his fellow-ministers were ready to lay down the burden of office at any time, but that they were resolved first to put the affairs of State in order. He indignantly repelled the charge of nationalism of faction spirits made against them by the Czechs and insisted that the one difficulty Parliament had to contend with was the obstruction policy of that party.—A "Red-Book" is soon to be issued regarding the recent annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. It is said to contain important disclosures concerning the latest phase of the Balkan question, which in its development for a time threatened bloody war.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

"The Decay of the Church of Rome"

One reflecting a little on the subject will find many arguments to prove how important the Church is in the eyes of the world; among them, the number of candid friends ready to advise it and the eagerness of the world to see their advice followed. Of course it is always disappointed. It then rebukes gravely the blindness of the Church, not understanding that by God's immutable ordinance the Church teaches all and is taught by none. In an evil day he who now calls himself Joseph McCabe undertook to advise where he should have obeyed. He fell from his place and has taken up his parable against the Church in several books of which the latest is "The Decay of The Church of Rome." It has been received with some applause.

Another of the proofs we have alluded to, may be drawn from the frequent computing of its membership by statisticians. They reckon us to be about 250,000,000; some making the number larger; others, smaller. Mr. McCabe corrects them all. We ought to be, according to him, 270,000,000: we are actually, he says, 190,764,378. The difference between the two represents the defections of the last eighty years. "Romanism," he asserts, "has entered upon a remarkable phase of disintegration." What is a phase of disintegration? If it means anything, does it not imply a reintegration to follow? Mr. McCabe's affectation of exactness is rather absurd. An estimate of our number can be only an approximation in which such precision can have no place. His objection, however, to the higher figures of others is, that they are reached by the including of whole populations, of which he holds, the greater part have fallen away. Thus, out of 39,000,000, French, he reckons only 6,000,000 as Catholics.

Here in the United States is being made a somewhat similar objection. The editor of The World Almanac for 1909, adds this note to the Statistics of Religious Denominations: "The aggregate represents actual church-membership and includes all Catholics, but not all persons affiliated by family ties to Protestant bodies." Here he seems to insinuate the common opinion, that to swell its numbers, the Church reckons all born of Catholic parents simply on account of their origin. This is a mistake. Family ties, bringing children back eventually to Adam, make them children of wrath. They can not, therefore, make them members of the Church. Protestants count up their members consistently with their idea of what makes them such: we do the same consistently with ours. If our idea differs from theirs the reason is to be found in the essential difference between the Protestant and the Catholic idea of the Church established by Christ. This Protestants usually hold to be the invisible company of the elect. They distinguish between it and their organizations; but these naturally are supposed to contain such only as show signs of election by professing conversion and affiliating themselves to one of them, that is, by "joining the Church." One who prefers not to be religious, does not join it: one who would cease to be such, lets his membership lapse. The process implies a maturity of choice that excludes mere children.

For Catholics, on the other hand, the Church is the visible society of Christians who hold the same faith, receive the same Sacraments and live in subjection to lawful pastors under one visible head. They make no distinction between the Church of Christ and their organization. Entrance into it is obligatory; and by baptism an infant is a member of it. The baptized, as they grow up, may become unworthy: they remain members until they deny their faith and withdraw their obedience. This is not mere theory. Everyone knows that unless a Catholic has renounced his religion, he recognizes the hold his Church has on him, as no Protestant does. He confesses that the Church has Christ's mission, to call sinners to penance; and, though he may be far from Catholic practice, he acknowledges that jurisdiction which, he hopes, will some day reconcile him to God. What lapsed Church member as death approaches, if he call for a minister at all, judges it imperative to have one of his former denomination? What bad Catholic does not in such circumstances desire his own priest? How rarely does a Protestant say: "I am a Presbyterian, a Baptist or an Episcopalian, but a bad one?" "I am a Catholic, but a bad one," is heard constantly. We do not pretend that all the unpractising in France are such as we have described. Nevertheless, will Mr. McCabe maintain that there are only six million men and women there who look forward to die in the peace of the Church?

Mr. McCabe deduces the decay of the Church also from the illiteracy of its more active members. He seems to have forgotten the words of the Apostle: "See your vocation, brethren, that there are not many wise according to the flesh." The Church of England is called weak because it is chiefly of the cultured. Why the opposite should be for us a cause of decay, is not easy to understand. From a purely material point of view, a hold on the lower classes is counted in these democratic times as strength; and Mr. McCabe's former ministrations in the household of faith will tell him that the Church is powerful with the poor elsewhere than in Southern Italy, the Tyrol and Spanish America, where he now sees it. As for his assertion that education brings revolt, this depends entirely upon the kind of education.

To judge the progress of the Church in English-speaking countries, its influence must be taken into account; and this was a negligible quantity a century ago. We do not deny the leakage Mr. McCabe makes so much of, but we think it less than he would have it. He has examined that of England with some diligence. Taking a fair estimate of the Catholics at the beginning of the nineteenth century as 100,000, he asserts that as the population has increased fourfold, these should have grown to 400,000. To these must be added the normal increase of 1,000,000 Irish and the foreigners that have entered the country, and his conclusion is that the Catholics in England should be between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000, instead of 1,200,000, the number he estimates them at. Thus he calculates a leakage since 1850 of 2,000,000. In the first place, the population at the end of the nineteenth century was nine per cent. less than four times what it was in 1801. Taking as Mr. McCabe rightly does, 1850 as a pivotal date, and granting the immigration from all sources to have been 1,200,000, the Catholics should have numbered in 1901, a little over 2,500,000, and the leakage would have been 1,300,000, assuming his estimate of this actual number to be correct. The "Catholic Directory," however, puts this at 1,500,000, which cuts Mr. McCabe's leakage in half. Any leakage is distressing, but considering the surroundings into which the Irish Catholics were transferred directly from an atmosphere of faith; the difficulty of providing spiritually for so large a number; the odium of which their religion and their blood made them the objects, one is not astonished at it. It is consoling to know that with the multiplication of pastors, churches and schools, the leakage is being overcome. To say that the leakage in the United States is the same proportionately as in England, is mere assertion.

Though Mr. McCabe's book might be recommended to excitable persons afflicted with a chronic fear of popery, we do not think that Mr. McCabe, even from a purely natural standpoint, can be held to have established his thesis. We have such guarantees in the supernatural order as take away any apprehension of even the possibility of the decay of the Church; and we finish this article as we began it, by pointing out that the very interest our enemies take in us, indicates that they by no means feel certain of this decay. In Capua

We sit of an evening in the large hall where the pillars are sculptured and the walls frescoed; the color scheme is good to the eye and there are many seats and couches cunningly devised and placed for our comfort amid palms and ferns and chrysanthemums in bloom, the whole suffused in the glow of countless lights half concealed in the mouldings upon pillar and wall. An orchestra makes music for us—a violin, a 'cello and a piano, nor are they mere perfunctory scrapers of strings but artists who play as those loving their art. Moreover it is good music that they discourse, Beethoven and Chopin and Schumann and Brahms and Mendelssohn and Haydn and Mozart; nothing base or noisy. And at our doors the beating of the surf on the sand makes continuous undertone for the harmonies.

We are in Capua, some for rest, others for mere variety in the endless chase of pleasure. Here are men white-haired and worn, bearing on their faces the runes of many an Iliad and an Odyssey, and with them gentle old women, the lines of patient endurance etched deeply in their features—their eyes are tired. There are men not old in years but their hair is gray and their faces, still young and fresh, are set in the expression of concentrated endeavor. These, like us, have come from the legions in Gaul and must soon go back to the wars. There are many young women fair to see but for the most part hard of feature and bold in the challenge of their look—never were lilies of the field attired in glory such as theirs; they move with conscious grace and insolence, their eyes are heavy-lidded and their voices are shrill. They scan us and one another coldly and impersonally as one might in former times have appraised the merchandise of the slave market. These are dwellers in Capua. If it be the crown of resting to think of toil over with and afar, and if idleness be ever restless, then must time hang heavy on the white hands of those young women, I fancy! Here are, too, a few children—a thought overdressed, a shade self-conscious—up much too late according to our old-fashioned notions. And we yield ourselves utterly to the spell of the music, a fitting close for the days spent in the fresh sea-wind and the warm sun. Music is surely the topmost height of sensuous pleasure. It is amazing how it orders one's thought to rhythmic movement and gives to the mind wings for heights and depths otherwise unscaled and unscalable!

It is good to be in Capua, to get the armor off that galls the collar bone where the thongs cross, to unclasp the sword-belt and doff the helmet and for a few days relax the hard muscles, give healing balm to the old wounds, and recline at ease, snuffing lazily the rich odors of luxurious peace. And it is good, while the music fills the air, to dream with half-closed eyes of the camp away in Gaul, the watch fires at night, the sentries—and the wounded of the fight. Now it is curious that I should think of the wounded, for to-night is "Conference" night and if I were with the legions I should be out with my comrades, lantern in hand, looking for those who have been hurt in the fight so to speak. It would be a long way from Capua,—

"I recommend the usual relief." Thus speaks my friend and conference-partner, Matthew Sheridan (a plasterer by trade), reporting on the last of the old cases on our Conference role.

"There's a new case," says the President; "Anne and Catherine Mahony, 545 West —th street, basement. Sheridan and Prout committee."

The treasurer passes the hat, relief-tickets are distributed, closing prayers are said and Sheridan and I set out. We have two old cases to visit first and then we seek 545 West —th street. It is an ordinary single tenement, no better or worse than others. As we go in at the basement door we see the usual long, narrow, dark passage with one gas-jet turned low at the farther end. There are a couple of gas-meters on the wall and the usual tenement reek in the air is here tempered (somewhat mercifully) by a strong odor of gas and the curious exhalation that is apt to arise from coal-bins, empty ash cans and insufficiently emptied garbage-pails in dark basements. We find a door on the left and knock on it. A door farther down the passage opens. A small, thin old woman with spectacled eyes and an anxious kindly face peers out at us in the semi-darkness. We state our errand and are bidden to come in.

The "basement flat" is really one long room. At the end where we enter is the cooking range and high up on the wall is one unshaded gas-jet. We cannot see to the far end for there is a screen across the room and, moreover, the shadows are dark down there, but evidently the "sleeping apartments" are thereabouts.

Around where we stand there is light enough to show that everything is scrupulously clean, and, if one may say such a thing, in its place. Thus we make the acquaintance of Anne and Catherine Mahony, aged respectively 62 and 58, janitresses of 545 West—th street, in token whereof they enjoy rent-free the spacious apartment wherein we are—also the light of one gas-jet gratis. This, with the few pieces of furniture, cooking utensils, etc., displayed before us, constitute (with the clothes upon their backs, and much worn they are at that) all the right, title and interest that the sisters have in this world.

Anne is straight of back, thin but with a suggestion of ruggedness; she looks one fairly in the face with wide open eye herself and is vigorous and cheerful of speech. Her sparse gray hair is parted and drawn tightly into a workmanlike knot at the back of her head. She moves with quick and sure step and gesture. Catherine is smaller, shrunken, bowed; her face is drawn as with pain. Her hair, not so gray or thin as Anne's, is piled amorphously upon the top of her head. She draws a worn woolen shawl more tightly around her shoulders as we enter and moves her chair closer to the range where a little fire still lingers. Her voice is thin and querulous and she has a cough.

The story is absurdly simple as Anne tells it. They used to be dressmakers, successful in a small way, twenty-five years ago. Advancing age and strenuous competition drove them gradually out of business and little by little their savings melted away. Then Catherine's health broke and down the hill they went until now they possess but one of the necessities of life, namely, lodging. Food must be found for one must live. For "lodging and light" Anne works all day at her janitress's numberless duties and has no time for sustained effort otherwise; Catherine is quite unable to work.

The curious thing about it, as Catherine says, is that she isn't "really sick" in any special way, but she "hasn't any strength." The Bellevue doctor has warned her that she is "delicate in the left lung" and must be careful. She must eat plenty of eggs, drink plenty of milk, and above all get plenty of fresh air. That's what he says. Her cough is much better than it used to be, and some days she feels pretty well. If her strength would only come back she'd be able to work again.

But other days she's "quite discouraged" when she is too weak to go out into the park, and she begins to "feel the cold terrible" in these November days. "The landlord is very good to us," says Anne. "He gives us light and the flat and the tenants are easy on us—some of them."

My partner leaves the relief tickets and we go out with the grateful thanks of the sisters following us. "How long do you suppose she'll last?" I ask him. He has grown gray in the footsteps of St. Vincent de Paul and is wise in these matters.

"With luck—ninety days, maybe."

* * * * *

A crashing chord on the piano closing a phrase of the Andante in Haydn's "Surprise Symphony" brings me back with a start.

Oh yes! It is good to be in Capua—but only for a little while. After all, man's place is with the legions in Gaul.

ANDREW PROUT.

Christianity and Christian Socialism

I.

After the fellowship of Christian Socialists have successfully attempted to reduce Scientific International Socialism to its pure essentials, they commence to examine also Christian religion with the view of freeing it from elements foreign to its nature. This process, as was explained in a former article, is deemed necessary, in order to cement together Christianity and Socialism in a firm and permanent union. The leaders of the Fellowship, especially the ministers, are not willing to leave this purification of Christianity to the good will and intelligence of the Christian denominations, but claim it as their proper providential task. Hence we Catholics, too, are expected to learn from them what should be retained as the pure and precious metal of Christianity, and what should be rejected as slag.

As to the latter point they tell us summarily that Christianity has been utterly depraved and corrupted so as to become altogether incapable of achieving its divinely appointed end consisting in the regeneration of social life. The corruption, as they say, crept in very soon after its origin, even at the time of the Apostles, took wider dimensions in the Constantine period, and reached its climax in our present capitalistic age. As corrupting elements infused into Christianity are especially marked out dogmatism, sacramentalism and ceremonialism, other-worldliness and belief in immortality, asceticism, celibacy, monasticism, and churchliness. Prof. W. Rauschenbusch has discussed this subject at full length in his work entitled "Christianity and the Social Crisis" (pp.158-199), and Christian Socialists have strongly endorsed his views. Edward J. Ward, when Secretary of the Fellowship in 1907, addressed to the members a note in which he said that this book was, in his opinion, without exception, the best presentation of the Christian Socialist position that has appeared anywhere. (Christian Socialist, August 15, 1907.) According to the learned professor, though Christianity was originally undogmatic, nevertheless since the second century and especially since the great controversies of the fourth century dogma came to be regarded as its essence. The change was due to the influence of Greek intellectualism. (Christianity and Social Crisis, pp. 178, 179.)

The origin of ceremonies and sacraments is explained as follows: "Christianity in its original purity was a religion of absolute spirituality, almost wholly emancipated from ceremonial elements, insisting simply on right relations to men as the expression of religion." "But even in the first generation few were able to rise to the spirituality of Jesus and Paul." "The Jewish Christians clung to their inherited ceremonial and tried to bind Christianity down to it." In the heathen world "the material furnished by Christianity was worked over into a new ceremonialism essentially like the magic ritual of the Greek mysteries and Oriental cults, only more wonderful and efficacious. "The formulas of baptism and the Lord's Supper were fraught with magic powers. Worship became a process of mystagogic initiation into mysteries. All the old essentials of pagan religion were reproduced in Christian form, but with scarcely a break in their essence: the effort to placate God by sacrifice, the amulets, vows, oracles, festivals, incense, candles, pictures and statues. It was like a tropical jungle sprouting again after it is cut down.." (Ibid, pp. 176, 177.)

Both dogmatism and ceremonialism, it is maintained, hindered the development of social and ethical life. "The constant insistence on dogma induced an unthinking submission of intellect. In that respect dogmatism cooperated with ritualism, which likewise requires no intelligence in the worshipper, and which always acts as a narcotic on the intellect of the people." (Ibid, p. 179.)

We find the same views set forth, though not so systematically, in many numbers of the Christian Socialist. We read in the issue of June 15, 1906: "The tests of Christianity are first practical, then experimental—never dogmatic." In that of August 1, 1907, it is said that the great idea of Brotherhood went forth from Nazareth and conquered Rome when yet unhampered by ceremonial or sacrament, by priest or pope or sect. In that of December 15, 1907, Prof. Edwin Markham says: "Creeds and sects would mean nothing to Jesus" (if He came again). "Orthodoxy and heterodoxy would be to Him only the gleam of the same bubble on opposite sides."

The belief in immortality, according to Rauschenbusch, is of heathen origin. The hope of blessedness or the fear of punishment after death played, as he sets forth, no appreciable part in the Old Testament, but it was an important element in the religions which developed in the pagan world before the Christian era. From them it was carried into Christianity. "This dualism of spirit and matter was not derived from the teaching of Jesus. It was in the intellectual atmosphere of the day part of the general spiritual equipment of the times. Platonic and Stoic philosophy taught it. It was the strongest religious ingredient of the religious movements of that age. It was inevitable that Christianity, both in its theology and in its popular religious feelings should be deeply affected by it." ("Christianity and the Social Crisis," pp. 162, 163.) "The Nicene Council was not merely the triumph of a christological formula, but of that conception of Christianity which made it primarily redemption from death and impartation of immortality." (Ibid, p. 161.)

The Rev. Dr. George Willis Cooke, consistently with economic determinism, derives the belief in immortality from the introduction of private property. "As there was no individual ownership of property in primitive society, so there was no belief in individual immortality. . . . What the primitive man believed in, was the survival after death of his clan, not of himself as a personal soul. . . . In other words, the clan soul lived on, the individual soul faded away into nothingness. As the idea of property has developed through the ages, in the form of personal ownership and control, so has the conception of personal immortality grown." (Christian Socialist, Aug. 15, 1909.)

Asceticism, too, which was intimately connected with the belief in immortality, was, in the opinion of Prof. Rauschenbusch, not Christian, but a Christian modification of a general spiritual drift in contemporary life, and a fatal one. Because it assumed the identity of evil with matter and cut all satisfaction of natural desires to a minimum, it made perfect life a contradiction of nature. Turning against the sexual instinct as its special enemy, it not only stood against concubinage and divorce, but also lowered the dignity of marriage, even so far, as to honor voluntary virginity in men and women and to make it obligatory for churchmen. By doing so it became injurious to the family, the social cell. "(Christianity and the Social Crisis," p. 164, 165.)

George H. Strobell concurs with Prof. Rauschenbusch in the condemnation of celibacy, when he writes in the Christian Socialist, Jan. 1, 1909: "The Roman Catholic clergy have made that sweet family relation impossible for themselves and for millions of their best, their most consecrated men, crushing and bending mind and body toward an unnatural, and impossible sexless humanity."

Monasticism, in which asceticism was practised in a special manner, annihilated the foundations of civil society, the family, property, and worldly professions, withdrew from social life the very forces which were best fitted to preserve and invigorate or to restore and reconstruct it, and sterilized the best individuals so as to leave only the morally incapable to propagate their kind in the world. ("Christianity and the Social Crisis," pp. 170-176.)

From the preceding explanations it may well be understood why the Fellowship finds a more ready response on the part of Protestant Churches. What it regards as unnatural outgrowths in Christianity and as obstacles to its own progress, they have long since abolished. Dogmas, sacraments, ceremonies, asceticism, celibacy, monasticism have been uprooted by them as harmful weeds. Thus the soil is well prepared to receive the seed of Christian Socialism, and many ministers are willing to water it by their word.

Ecclesiastical Affairs in Portugal

Those who have lived among them will agree that the Portuguese are the kindest of peoples, but, along with all its inherited goodness, Portugal shows very great latitude in both belief and practice. The "slackness" in religious matters is the direct result of past persecution of the Church by the State, and of the bondage in which the former lies to the latter. Previous to the Concordat negotiated by Pope Leo XIII in 1886, the ecclesiastical and civil powers in Portugal had been in conflict for half a century, dating from 1834, when the victorious Liberals, after overthrowing the Absolutist régime, proved their liberalism by expelling the religious orders of men at the point of the bayonet, and by confiscating their property. It was a serious blow to the Church because the monks and friars had been the teachers, preachers and confessors, and as the secular clergy possessed neither the authority, the training nor numbers necessary to fill the gap, religious education went by the board. Since then, several generations have grown up without proper instruction in the Faith, while the diatribes of the infidel press have gone far towards convincing a large part of the population of Lisbon that there is no God. No Papal Bull can be published in Portugal without the approval of the Government, the "placitum regium," and it is clear that the Church is still dominated by eighteenth century Regalism.

The case of the Bishop of Beja is one in point. After a notable career in Oporto, where he directed a large industrial school for boys, this zealous priest was appointed to the extensive Diocese of Beja, which he found in a sad state. For many years the control of the diocesan seminary had been in the hands of a couple of unworthy priests—brothers—whose misdeeds had caused a rebellion among the students and led to a government inquiry which confirmed the charges against them. However, these two ecclesiastics had political backing, and when the new bishop took possession of his see, he found them still in possession. Deciding that the work of reform must begin with the seminary, he reported to the Government that he proposed to dismiss them. This is the usual course here, because ecclesiastical posts are filled by the Minister of Justice.

After waiting a year for a reply, which never came, the bishop took action, and immediately met with a storm of abuse from the press, almost his only defender being the courageous Catholic daily Portugal; the Republican papers, one of which had some years before loudly demanded the removal of the offending ecclesiastics, now denounced the bishop as a usurper of the royal prerogative (sic!) and cried out for his punishment as a lesson to other "reactionaries." The Diario Popular, organ of Julio de Vilhena, chief of the Regenerador, once the Conservative party, took the same line in a series of leading articles notable for their Erastian ideas and violence of language. The Seculo, the best known and most pernicious of Lisbon dailies, informed the bishop that "if he had lived some centuries earlier and dared to affront the prerogatives of the civil power, King Pedro I would have taught him with a whip how the pride of bishops must bend before the authority of the law." The journalist relied on his readers' ignorance of history, because it was for a breach of the moral, not of the civil law, that the justice-loving monarch threatened the then Bishop of Oporto with a scourging.

The war now being waged against the bishop is part of an anti-clerical movement which began some months ago to oppose the religious awakening, which has been at work in the Church of late years. In 1901, the Regenerador ministry authorized the existence of religious orders having for their objects: (1) teaching, or (2) beneficence, or (3) the propagation of faith and civilization in the over-sea dominions. Under the shelter of this decree a number of Orders have been re-established in Portugal, mostly with foreign subjects. Last spring, the Republican Deputy, Dr. Alfonso Costa introduced a bill prohibiting (inter alia) all teaching by religious congregations, and providing for the dissolution of the Apostleship of Prayer and "other Jesuitical associations." The bill, however, did not become law, so in August the anti-Clericals promoted a demonstration consisting of about fifty thousand persons, which marched to the Parliament House, and petitioned for the revival of the laws of Pombal and Aguiar (nick-named "Mata-frades" i. e., Kill-friars), that is, for the suppression of the Orders and for schools without religion. The Monarchist majorities in the Lower House refused to discuss the matter. Undismayed by this rebuff, the Liberals continue their war against the Church, and if they could overthrow the Monarchy, one of their first acts would be to adopt the policy which Waldeck-Rousseau so successfully inaugurated in France.

Their campaign is directed on French lines. They pretend to defend the secular clergy against foreign ecclesiastics (the regulars) who are alleged to be usurping the influence and privileges of the native clergy and despoiling the latter of the offerings of the faithful.

It may be that the bishops are wise to lie hidden at present, because Liberalism has now such a hold on the nation that any forward movement on their part would probably bring them few defenders and a host of enemies. Yet it is permissible to think that persecution is what the Church needs, and that sooner or later the way to a better state of things will be found through a Kulturkampf. The present religious temperature of the capital may be guessed when we find that many good Catholics consider yearly Communion quite sufficient, and regard more frequent reception of the Blessed Eucharist as a mark of Ultramontaniam, while a very small proportion of the population receive the Last Sacraments. Of course, Lisbon is not Portugal, as I have said before, and even in Lisbon the upper class are devout, and in the North, all classes practise their religion in a way that contrasts very favorably with the South.

The principal enemy of religion is the press. Whereas in other countries the leading newspapers have at least outward decency and fairness and a respect for authority, such is not the case in Portugal with the paper that claims the widest circulation; while of the popular Republican dailies it is enough to say that the Mundo deserves its nick-name of "Immundo" (unclean), and the Vanguarda, which organized the famous pilgrimage to the graves of the murderers of King Carlos, is what one might expect the organ of Freemasonry to be.

Portugal is now a country, not of liberty, but of license, and the Church has a hard battle to fight in preserving the Faith of the people, which once carried the Cross of Christ to the ends of the earth. We are only at the beginning of a long and severe struggle, and Catholics have to learn that only by union, discipline and tenacity of purpose, all of which they lack, can the battle be won. The clergy, ill-educated, ill-paid and hampered by the State, are, most of them, doing all in their power. Will the laity do their part? The issue is largely in their hands, and though the future is clouded, it is not altogether dark. The Church has made a decided advance in the last ten years, but much more may be expected from a people whose good qualities, by the common consent of those who know them, far outweigh their defects.

HENRY BYRON.

For many years a large number of members of the Church of England, including not a few of its ministers, have objected to the public recitation of the Athanasian Creed on account of what they call "the damnatory clauses." In compliance with a suggestion that a new translation be made, the Archbishop of Canterbury appointed a committee to undertake it, giving his opinion at the same time that the objectors would not be satisfied in this way. The new translation has now been finished, differing from the old only by a few slight verbal changes. The Guardian holds that the Archbishop's opinion has been justified, and that the work of the translators brings no relief to those who object to the retaining of the Creed in its place in the Prayer Book.

Church Spoliation in Mexico

II.

After eight years of desultory warfare, the revolt begun in 1810 by Hidalgo and his half-armed Indians seemed to be crushed. Hidalgo and his fellow priest, Morelos had been captured, degraded and shot, and other leaders had perished or accepted amnesty. The insurgent Guerrero was still in the field with some faithful followers and Fernandez, later known as President Guadalupe Victoria, was skulking some place in the chaparral. Otherwise, New Spain was tranquil. Then it was that Agustin Iturbide, winning over the vice-regal troops and using the viceregal funds which he had received to hunt down Guerrero, achieved Mexican independence by a three-years' war and won for himself the offices of generalissimo of the army and high admiral with the style of "most serene highness." When his soldiers proclaimed him emperor and the overawed members of the first Congress, at a time when a quorum was not present, approved their action, he entered upon a reign of eight months, during which the imperial government seized certain properties the income from which was for the support of missionaries in the Philippines. After his enforced abdication, as expenses had been heavy and receipts light, the "Constituent Assembly" of 1823 ordered the sale of what remained of the property of the Jesuits and Hospitallers and of the Inquisition. Ten years later, the Government seized one-half the movable property of the missions of the Californias and authorized President Santa Ana to expel all Spanish religious. The year 1842 saw the end of Father Salvatierra's "Pious Fund of the Californias." What was left of it was sold for $2,000,000, which the Government appropriated.

In 1855, the minister of justice and ecclesiastical affairs was a full-blooded Zapotec Indian, well qualified for a part of his duties, for he had been a seminarian until the end of his first year of theology. This Indian, Benito Juarez, put through the first "Juarez Law," by which special military and ecclesiastical courts were abolished and the clergy were deprived of the franchise. It was the forerunner of other and far more grievous enactments. The following year, President Comonfort sent troops to the neighboring city of Puebla to put down a revolt fomented, so it was said, by the clergy. In punishment for their offense, all Church property in the States of Puebla and Vera Cruz, except what was actually needed for divine service, was ordered seized and sold. The governors of the two States dealt harshly with all who concealed Church property or spoke against the law which ordered its seizure.

The great convent of San Francisco in the capital occupied with its collegiate church and public chapels a whole city block. In September, 1856, the convent was entered by the authorities, the friars were charged with conspiracy, and their property, with the exception of the houses of worship and their religious furnishings, was confiscated. The friars had no trial.

It was an evil day for the Church and the beginning of days more evil when Miguel Lerdo de Tejada y Corrial accepted the portfolio of the Treasury in President Comonfort's cabinet, for he was as well known for his ability as he was for his hatred of religion. He was soon ready with the notorious "Lerdo Law," which did more harm than all previous legislation combined. By its provisions, tenants holding from civil or ecclesiastical corporations were authorized to purchase outright all properties except those occupied by the buildings immediately applied to the purposes of the corporations. Property, chiefly of the Church, to the value of twenty-three million pesos changed hands by the operation of the law, the Government receiving five per cent. on each sale. Property thus sold could never revert to the "corporations" (the Church), which were further forbidden to own or to administer on landed property.

Bishops and priests raised their voices against the iniquitous measure, but their protests were brushed aside. If they persisted, they were threatened with punishment, and the threats were not idle. Upwards of a score of the most prominent and influential were driven into exile, and the same lash was held over the others to enforce if not acquiescence in the robbery at least silence about the crime. Free and independent Mexico was speedily becoming a strange republic. D. P. S.

The Theological Faculty of the University of Innsbruck

The theological faculty of the University of Innsbruck for the current year consists of nine professors and six privat-docents. Of the professors eight are ordinary and one extraordinary—all priests of the Society of Jesus. There is also an honorary professor, Father Hugo Hurter, the widely known author of the "Compendium Theologiæ Dogmaticæ" and the "Nomenclator Litterarius" who this year begins his fifty-second year of consecutive teaching. The number of students of theology at Innsbruck this year is 374, a record number. Of these 263 belong to the secular and 121 to the regular clergy. 148 of the total number are subjects of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, while 236 hail from the following countries: Australia, Belgium, Ecuador, England, Germany, Holland, Italy, Mexico, Roumania, Russia, Sweden, Switzerland, Spain, Turkey, United States of America. The last contributes over 40. Seventeen of the whole number belong to the Greek Rite. Among the regulars in attendance are members of the Society of Jesus from fourteen provinces, viz.: Austrian, Hungarian, Italian, Belgian, two provinces in Spain, Holland, England, Ireland (Australian mission), German and Mexican, and three provinces of the United States, viz.: Maryland-New York, Missouri and California. They form a truly cosmopolitan community.

FROM LANDS AFAR

Bosnia and Herzegovina

From what has already been stated concerning Bosnia and Herzegovina in the last number of AMERICA, it will be seen that these countries have had an extremely chequered history and that if any one has a right to possess them it is most assuredly Croatia. All Austria's possessions are represented in the Reichsrat, the separate countries have no autonomy; their "Landtagen" are mere tools of the central government, their laws being subject to its approval. Urdelj has no Landtag. Croatia and Slavonia are autonomous regarding such internal affairs as religion, education and justice. They are under the control of a governor acting as Viceroy and responsible to the Croatian parliament. All other affairs are in common with Hungary excepting military and diplomatic matters which are regulated by the central government. Croatia and Slavonia send delegates to the Austrian parliament and to this body the Governor of Bosnia is responsible.

In a recent issue of the Vienna Vaterland it was justly said, and the statement may apply to Servia, that Hungary could as reasonably claim Lower Austria as Bosnia and Herzegovina, since Matthias Corvinus temporarily ruled in these lands also, but he it remarked, Matthias Corvinus acknowledged the independence of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The following historical facts are worthy of note: On January 1, 1527, the Croats chose a Hapsburg, Duke Ferdinand, for their king at Cetinje in Bosnia. The Croats were free and the election took place in their country. The rights, therefore, of this dynasty are incontestable and will remain so as long as Croatian kings of Hapsburg blood exist. Ferdinand was acknowledged in Hungary in 1538, but only in 1551, after the death of King Yelm Yapolja, who went over to the Turks, did he take possession of that country. The Croats of Bosnia, as well as of Croatia, Slavonia and Dalmatia, freely chose their first Hapsburg ruler and from that time the Hapsburgs have always claimed these lands. In their coronation oaths, they have repeatedly emphasized their determination to free them from foreign control and sworn to incorporate them with their dominions. Bosnia and Herzegovina had been under Turkish rule for four hundred years when, in 1878, a Hapsburg, Franz Josef I, freed them. The Austrian emperor, by this action, was but fulfilling his oath and the traditions of his race, and when having ruled in Bosnia and Herzegovina for thirty years he recently annexed them, he was merely exercising his right, for all the Hapsburgs, from Duke Ferdinand down, had claimed these provinces.

The act of annexation was the concern of no foreign government, neither Servia's nor Hungary's; hence, the aged Austrian monarch put aside all outside interference in the matter and was ready to maintain his action at the point of the sword, with all the more reason that, for thirty years, the Sultan had been only the nominal ruler of the countries in question. The annexation was a mere formality. Charles VI (1711-1740) had no sons and thus there was danger of the extinction of the Hapsburg dynasty and the loss of its possessions; for this reason, therefore, he desired that on his death his female descendants should be acknowledged as his legitimate successors. The Croats were the first to accept this law, on March 11, 1712, even before the law was written (1713). In this manner came about the so-called "Pragmatic Sanction," accepted by Hungary in 1723. According to this law, only such princesses as ruled over Austria, Steiermark, Kärnten, etc., and resided in Austria were eligible for the office of ruler, and it was in virtue of the "Pragmatic Sanction" that Maria Teresa, daughter of Charles VI, became the acknowledged Queen of Croatia. Only in virtue of this sanction are the Hapsburgs the rightful rulers of Bosnia and Herzegovina, because Bosnia and Herzegovina are integral parts of the Croatian kingdom and chose Hapsburgs for their rulers.

At the peace of Campo-Formio, 1769, Austria received back Dalmatia, another integral part of her Croatian possessions, while at the Berlin Congress of 1878 she was permitted to occupy Bosnia and Herzegovina—a superfluous permission, since they justly belonged to her and she had never abandoned her claims. Now comes the principle of nationality of which we hear so much to-day. In accordance with this principle, Germany and Italy agreed that all Croatian lands should be under Austrian rule, for Austria could show a just title to their possession. These then are the reasons that induced the Austrian monarch, Franz Josef I, first to occupy and then to annex two of the Balkan provinces. In his recent proclamation to the Bosnian people we find the following passage: "Bearing in mind the ancient bonds between us and our glorious ancestors on the Hungarian throne, we now strengthen these bonds. . . ."

The existing relations between Croatia and Hungary arose in 1868 and the present conflict between the two countries is the old one. The election of the Hapsburg Ferdinand at Cetinje in 1527, the "Pragmatic Sanction" of 1712, law 42 passed in 1868, and the Coronation oath of every Hapsburg, from Duke Ferdinand down to Franz Josef I, as well as the principle of nationality, support the claims and political rights of Austria to the recently annexed provinces. The Croatian "Rechtsparter" at a sitting held on the 20th of October last, requested the incorporation of Bosnia and Herzegovina with Austria, as owing to the conflict between Croatia and Hungary no settlement could be arrived at. The conflict which began eighteen months ago is not yet ended and we cannot foretell its outcome. In 1878 the inhabitants of Bosnia and Herzegovina regardless of religious differences and inclusive of the Serbs, requested union with Austria, and shortly before the recent annexation, a deputation headed by Dr. Stadler, Archbishop of Sarajevo; presented a memorandum to the emperor expressing the same desire. Whence, then, we ask, the grievance and indignation of Serbia? Where are her rights? History does not speak of them, and before the occupation and annexation we did not even hear of them.

At the trials for treason in Montenegro held during the present year in Bosnia and Croatia, much light was thrown upon the action of Serbia. The following facts were sworn to by 345 witnesses: Serbia claimed not only Bosnia and Herzegovina, but also Croatia, Slavonia, Southern Hungary, Dalmatia, Montenegro, Sandzak, Old-Servia and Macedonia (these latter two Turkish provinces), and Bulgaria. It will be seen that Serbia has a good appetite.

These claims date from the rebellion of Servian troops (1875-1878), led by Peter Mrkonjic, the present King of Serbia. Mrkonjic was an assumed name. The ideal of Greater-Servia was widely propagated by Peter Karagjorgjevic, alias Mrkonjic. Not only did he seek and gain support in Bosnia and Herzegovina, but also in Croatia and Slavonia. The realization of the dream of Greater-Servia was begun when Peter I ascended the Servian throne, after the murder of his predecessors. The entire plan was arranged and diligently agitated in 1906 and 1907, till the plot was discovered in Montenegro, where an attempt was made to assassinate Prince Nicolaus, King Peter's most dangerous rival. The claims of Servia rest merely upon greed and the false principle that anyone belonging to the Greek schismatic church must be a Serb, whether Wallachian or Gypsy. At the high treason process at Zagreb even Servian peasants stated that in many districts the name Serb was scarcely known a few decades ago, but now-a-days Servian historians speak of a Servian heaven, Servian angels and even of a Servian god! No wonder then that according to a Servian census there are 25,000 more Serbs than Turks and Catholics together.

Let us hope that foreign countries will soon learn to know this noble nation and still nobler dynasty. It is incomprehensible that England should sympathize with Servia, when some years ago, after the murder of its rulers, she would have nothing to do with King Peter for permitting the assassins to go unpunished—they are still unpunished, by the way—and in the recent crisis should have been willing to resort to arms to aid Servia against Germany and Austria at the cost of justice.

The Prime Minister of England has promised the National Council of Federated Free Churches to do away with denominational education in the next Parliament. Thus its policy in this matter will be one of the points on which the Government will appeal to the country in the coming elections.

CORRESPONDENCE

Restitution Through the Confessional

A remarkable case of restitution of stolen money through the confessional took place recently in Trent, the capital of the Italian portion of South Tyrol, known as the Trentino, and the meeting place of the famous council of the sixteenth century. On August 30th, last, it was discovered that the sum of over 300,000 lire had been stolen from the Banca Cooperativa of Trent. In spite of rigid investigation and search by the police no trace could be found of the thieves, and the excitement grew very intense as the incident was made capital of for political purposes. Employees of the bank had been imprisoned on suspicion, but no evidence against them was forthcoming. On November 3 the director of the Banca, Signor Ciani received a note from a well-known historian, the Reverend Marc Morizzo of Borgo, requesting him to call on important business, which turned out to be none other than the turning over to the director of a sealed package, containing one-half of the stolen money. This package had been received by Father Borgo from another priest coming from another country, who in turn had received it from a penitent with the request that it be restored to the Banca Cooperativa, "in order that the innocent might not suffer, financially or otherwise, for the guilt of a few." Nothing further could be told by the priest first named without violating the seal of confession. The case is very striking and edifying and a consoling example of the power of the Sacrament of Penance.

Australia's Third Catholic Congress

MELBOURNE, OCTOBER, 4, 1909.

The Third Australasian Catholic Congress was inaugurated with solemn High Mass in St. Mary's Cathedral, Sydney, on Sunday, Sept. 26th. Bishop Gallagher of Goulburn, New South Wales, preached the sermon, which dealt mainly with what the Catholic Church did in the past for civilization and progress and what, in the same great cause, she is accomplishing to-day. In the afternoon, the Hon. John Hughes, K.C.S.G., Vice-President of the Legislative Council, New South Wales, occupied the chief place at a banquet in the Sydney Town Hall; on his right sat his Eminence, Cardinal Moran, and on his left the Most Rev. Dr. Redwood, Archbishop of Wellington, New Zealand. Of the large number of other prelates who were present, several spoke in support of the facts mentioned by the president and the Cardinal to set forth the remarkable record of the Catholic Church in Australia and New Zealand.

The official opening of the Congress took place on the following day. A commemoration ode, composed and recited by the Rev. M. O'Reilly, C.M., preceded the delivery of an inaugural address by Cardinal Moran. His Eminence spoke of the relentless and unceasing war which the world waged for the destruction of the Church. Secret societies and Freemasonry avowed their aim to destroy all supernatural religion, and to put an end once for all to God's kingdom upon earth. By secularism in education the child was withdrawn from the Redeemer that his mind and heart might be moulded in conformity to the world's aims, and his affections alienated from the Creator. Divorce and a hundred other foul agencies were employed to banish from the Christian home the peace and piety that religion commended. Pleasure and wealth, selfishness and enjoyment of life were made the idols of the passing hour. The latest enemy of all, Modernism, entered the field, and, whilst insidiously offering a friendly embrace to Christian teaching, it secretly gathered together all remnants of long exploded errors, and fashioned them into a new engine for the corruption of divine truth. It might be asked, how was the Church to repel the fierce attacks thus made against divine truth? What was her assurance for victory? He replied that her equipment was precisely the same as in the early centuries. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, our Faith." Some of the means which the Church summoned to her aid at the present day were: enlightenment, abounding charity, peace, religious education, Christian homes, union of the clergy and faithful, and chivalrous enthusiasm in promoting every good cause of piety and religion. Their statesmen with one accord foreshadowed a glorious future for the Australian continent. It was the aim of the Catholic Church, by pursuing the paths of charity, piety, and religion, to keep pace with Australia's progress, thus to enhance, sanctify and ennoble it.

A paper contributed by his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons described the wonderful growth of the Church in the United States during the past century; and another by John E. Redmond, M.P., dwelt on "Ireland's Hundred Years' Battle for Faith and Fatherland." During the week the sessions were devoted to the discussion in the several sections of the Congress, of the various social, educational and religious questions included in the program of the proceedings. On Wednesday in answer to a cable message expressing loyal devotion to the Holy See and imploring his blessing the Pope sent this reply:

"The Holy Father most cordially imparts to the Catholics of Australasia assembled in the Third Australasian Congress, his apostolic blessing as an earnest of Divine assistance, and heartily wishes the Congress every success."

At one of the sessions Cardinal Moran proposed an amendment of the State secular system of primary instruction, and suggested the adoption of the plan by which the requirements of Catholic schools are met in Holland. He gave the following details:

"In Holland there is a uniform and compulsory system for all Dutch provinces, and the State system is practically secular.

"The erection and maintenance of Government schools devolves on communes (that would be our municipalities and shires). The payment of teachers and expenses of administration devolve on the Government.

"For the erection of schools the Government contributes one-fourth and the municipalities three-fourths.

"New arrangements to meet Catholic requirements would be (a) when 20 heads of families in any district agree to demand a denominational school their request must be acceded to; (b) such denominational schools receive the same amount of Government aid for erection as State schools. i. e., one-fourth of the outlay, but it is spread over a certain number of years, say, five years; (c) teachers in denominational schools are on same footing as in the State schools as regards salary, pension, etc.; (d) salaries vary with the grade of the school and the number of students; (e) Government inspection fixes the grade of each school according to the standard attained by the children; (f) teachers for any branches not fixed by the State must be paid from private sources."

On Sunday, October 3, several addresses, couched in terms of affectionate regard and admiration, were presented to the Cardinal, congratulating him on the completion of the silver jubilee of his arrival in Sydney. The Cardinal, in reply, referred at length to the history of the Church in Australia, and went on to ask the donors of the rich gifts to devote them as a jubilee fund towards the furnishing and equipment of the missionary college of St. Columba and to the completion of St. Mary's Cathedral.

The final resolutions adopted unanimously by the Congress were as follow:

"1. This Congress, speaking in the name of the Catholics of Australasia as loyal subjects of the Crown, emphatically protests against the inclusion in the Royal declaration by the Throne of opprobrious epithets regarding a most sacred doctrine of our holy faith.

"2. As Catholic citizens, bearing our share of the burdens of taxation, we assert our claim to a due proportion of the funds allotted to education, and we trust that our statesmen will be able to evolve a plan or system which will meet religious difficulties as it has been satisfactorily met in Canada, in the United Kingdom, in Ireland, in Prussia, in Holland, and in other countries composed of mixed denominations.

"3. We think that Catholic charitable institutions in New South Wales and some other States, carrying on works of public beneficence, labor under a serious grievance in being excluded from a share in financial assistance from public funds."

The next Congress will be held in Wellington, New Zealand.

The Education Question in France

PARIS, NOVEMBER 8, 1909.

Your readers know that to the letter of the French bishops on the duties of Catholic free parents, M. Doumergue, Minister of Public Instruction answered by a circular, when, after accusing the bishops of undue interference in the affairs of State, he rejects their intervention and encourages the Government teachers to abide by the decisions that he will continue to give them. It is certain, however, that, although the men in power affect to treat the bishops' action as of no importance, it has had an echo throughout the country. There has not been, and never will be, a general rising of parents against the irreligious tyranny of the State, but in many places the conscience of indifferent and lax Catholics has been touched and partial efforts are being made to make a stand against the evil influence that is gradually driving French children to Atheism. The poorer and more ignorant class of parents were not aware that the abuse made of the word "neutral" gave them certain rights and that, even from a legal point of view, they are justified in protesting against open manifestations of Atheism that are contrary to neutrality. Here and there, little children have shown fight and bravely refused to learn their lessons out of the prohibited books and, in some cases, the embarrassment of their teachers was great as, although they can expel the small offender for a time, it is difficult to do so permanently.

Mgr. Amette, Archbishop of Paris, has just issued a letter to the curés of his diocese on this vital subject. It is written in calm and dignified language and victoriously refutes the accusations to which the letter of the French bishops gave rise on the part of their opponents. He disclaims any wish to attack the Republic. "Those who pretend that we cannot blame the Atheistical schools without attacking the Republic," he aptly remarks, "thereby imply that the Republican Government is identified with the cause of Atheism and irreligion. We prefer not to allow this and we ask the Republic to apply in its schools the principles that it professes: respect for liberty of conscience." He then goes on to point out the duty of parish priests and of Catholic parents in present circumstances; in the diocese of Paris especially, only a small number of poor children are educated in the private or free schools founded and supported by Catholics. The immense majority are unavoidably obliged to attend the Government schools, which are infinitely more numerous. Hence, he impresses upon the parish priests that their strenuous duty is to watch over this portion of their flock, the weakest and the most exposed. Fathers and mothers have the same obligation. "A child," continues the Archbishop, "does not cease to belong to its parents and, because it is at school, its parents' rights and responsibilities are untouched. If a school master inflicted upon your child a treatment that injured its health or endangered its life, who would venture to say that you had no right to interfere? And, when the child's soul is perverted by an evil teaching, parents are to remain passive and silent? Nature, no less than religion, protests against this theory."

The Archbishop concludes by solemn words of warning and reminds his readers that the teachers who deliberately seek to undermine the faith in the souls of children and the parents, who if able to do otherwise, expose their offspring to this peril, are to be excluded from the Sacraments of the Church. In order to give a practical result to his letter, he exhorts the parish priests to secure the services of voluntary catechists, who may help them in their task of giving the little pupils of the Government schools the religious instruction that they so sorely need. Towards these little ones "you must multiply proofs of care and devotedness," he says, in order to enlighten their minds and "make them love the Church." He also advises his priests to band the men of their parish together; the close alliance that binds the Freemasons and free-thinkers in France is the secret of their power, the Catholics are beginning to learn from them the strength of union and the "parochial committees" suggested by the Archbishop may be of untold use in the struggle that every day becomes more tense. The future of France as a Catholic nation depends upon its final issue and surely this is enough to urge true believers to prompt and steady action.

That the bishops' letter has produced some effect in the enemies' camp is proved by the fact that one hundred thousand school teachers, in the pay of the Government, who belong to the "Federation des amicales," have decided to attack the bishops before the law courts of the country. Several archbishops and bishops have already received the summons, in which they are charged with having injured the character of the Government teachers and thus caused them notable prejudice. For this offense, they are each one expected to pay five thousand francs. The other members of the French Episcopacy will receive a similar document and some of the authors of the incriminated books are also ready to attack the bishops before the tribunals. "War is declared," said Mgr. Dubourg, Archbishop of Rennes, to a correspondent of the Matin, who sought an interview with him on this occasion. "It is a religious war. . . . its battlefield is the school of each parish. In this painful struggle, where the souls of our children are at stake, I may assure you that the bishops of France are ready to suffer all things, they cannot and will not draw back." He then went on to assure his visitor that the letter expressed the individual convictions of each one of the bishops: "If one of us is condemned," he added, "we must all of us be condemned, for we have committed the same offense. . . . The French Episcopacy will be found to form a compact group, ready to defend the sacred rights of conscience."

The Archbishop then expressed the wish that is uppermost "in the minds of all those who are anxiously watching the development of events before the next elections. "We are more numerous than our adversaries," he said, "and, if we wish it, we may be the strongest. Let us follow the example of our enemies; they submit to a discipline of iron. Although they think differently on most questions, they know, in moments of crisis, how to sacrifice their private feelings and how to be united, for the time being, on the grounds of anti-clericalism. I implore my flock to follow the same line. . . . I say to them: it is your right to be royalists, imperialists or republican in politics, but it is your duty, first of all, to be, above all things, Catholics."

That the spirit of the French bishops is braced up to resistance is clear: the Bishop of Mende, enlarging on the letter that he signed together with his colleagues, has lately caused the following note to be printed in the Semaine religieuse of his diocese. It clearly states the duty of parents:

"If there are two schools in a town or village, one Catholic and one neutral, parents are obliged, unless they have a special permission to do otherwise, to send their children to the Catholic school. In places, where there is but a Government school, they may send their children to it, if its teaching is strictly neutral and if they carefully provide for the religious instruction of their children outside school hours. If, however, the school is openly irreligious, their duty is to withdraw their children, at whatever cost and inconvenience."

AMERICA'S readers may easily imagine the pain, suffering and material damage that the atheistical and tyrannical policy of the Government will entail upon hundreds of simple, hard-working people, those whom their position prevents from having their children educated at home, and who have no school at hand, but one where atheism is professed.

The suit brought by the school teachers against the bishops proves what was stated in a previous letter: the extraordinary influence and power possessed by this class of men and women. The schoolmaster is a sovereign, says the Echo de Paris, commenting on recent events. He forgets the words addressed to the teaching body by Jules Ferry, who was certainly no "clerical": "You are not the apostles of a new Gospel; the law does not make you philosophers, nor theologians"; and he considers himself as a lay pontiff.

AN ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

Catholic Activity in Hungary

Early in the present year the Masonic Lodges resolved upon an open fight against the Catholic Church, and the manner of conducting the fight forms the subject-matter of their meeting. The old slanders and false reasoning are to be revived. On the 12th of February last, the following resolutions were adopted by the Comenius Lodge: (1) Agitation must be renewed to bring about the secularization of church property. (2) A united anti-clerical propaganda must be carried on. (3) A special anti-clerical weekly must be founded. (4) State control of all teachers' training colleges must be secured..

By February 26, more than 7,000 crowns had been contributed towards these ends, and one of the lodges had founded a newspaper for young people in which anti-clerical teachings are advanced. The Hungarian Catholics, however, have not been slow to take up the gauntlet. At the Catholic Assembly held at Szeged last August, preparations were made for the threatened strife. A second Kulturkampf is expected; indeed, a storm is needed to clear the atmosphere, and strength will follow persecution.

The Bishop of Székesfehérvár declared that the salvation of Hungary rests with the people, not with the upper-classes, and the present situation convinces us of the truth of the bishop's words, witness the "Volksverein" and the reorganization of the press. The progress of the former is especially reassuring; within the last eighteen months between 15,000 and 20,000 members have been added to the gallant phalanx, and we have every confidence that the interests of Church and society will be staunchly safeguarded by Hungary's "horny-handed sons of toil." In a stirring speech at the Catholic Assembly, Andreas Kunas, a farmer, spoke as follows:

"Catholic Volksverein, condemned to death by the Social Democrats, I salute you! You represent the well-being and prosperity of the nation. Our enemies tell us that we interfere with their plans for cooperative production, that we hinder the building-up of their revolutionary schemes, that they intend to show us no mercy, that we must go to America. We know, however, that the small farmers are the backbone of the State, hence, we refuse to yield to the false reasoning of the Social Democrats; we will not allow ourselves to be extinguished; we will cling close to Christianity which alone can help us to secure and maintain our rights and to preserve our families and Fatherland. For this purpose have our bishops and leading laymen founded the 'Volksverein.'

"The Left ascribes our union to treacherous collusion with Austria, but with scorn we cast the dishonorable suspicion from us, and stoutly deny the charge. The Left, the representative of Godless liberalism, is our enemy, and would gladly use us to draw its burning chestnuts from the fire, but we are wary and will not be its tool. The Hungarian agriculturists will find help and security in the 'Volksverein,' and their moral and material welfare will be strengthened by united effort in its ranks."

Franz Leli, also a farmer, excited the admiration of his listeners by his telling and eloquent speech, in which he described the past suffering of the Hungarian people. He suggested the establishment of a Press Sunday, by which he meant that the bishops should set apart certain Sundays for the collection of working funds for the press.

The suggestion of the speaker was accepted and the bishops were later approached on the subject of instituting "Press-Sunday." We feel confident that the "Volksverein" will succeed in its efforts regarding Catholic journalism, for it has Faith and Freedom for its watchwords, and as the brave Tyrolese, now celebrating the centenary of their liberty, succeeded in routing the enemy in their glacier-shadowed valleys, so will the Volksverein lead the Hungarian people to victory.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

One Motive for Thanksgiving

Among other things for which we should be profoundly grateful this Thanksgiving is the conclusion of the football season. Twenty-six lives crying to heaven for vengeance should be enough to disquiet the inconsistent votaries of the game—the sightseers who witness it, and the press men who advertise it—who all deplore its brutality and yet encourage the precocious executioners. The cool and sober season of reflection may quicken their consciences. If they cannot value the moral, or rather immoral enormities of the game, perhaps they may appreciate the loss of the national resources in the young lives so wantonly sacrificed. The pretended advantages of the game as a moral discipline impress one less as its actual fascinations disappear. It does not teach fair play. How can it, when the aim of every player is to outplay his opponent at all costs, even to his serious injury? It does not teach bravery. The mass play is too commonly a shield for cowardice in players who would not face an opponent singly. It does not teach honor. What eleven would decline to avail itself of the betrayal of another's proposed tactics or signals. It fails to inculcate self-restraint; for no one can take part in it without overstrain. It does teach disregard for human life, and it fosters the spirit of brutality, which is its all too frequent, if not its predominant feature. It were bad enough if all these traits were to be developed under any other auspices than those of our colleges. Now that they have become inseparable from the game as played at present, the heads of our scholastic institution cannot afford to dignify an inhuman sport by overlooking its abuses. No sane person thinks of abolishing football; but neither can any sane person tolerate play which is so frequently an occasion of homicide.

Twenty-Third Street Men

The Young Men's Christian Association is, we are often told, an organization entirely undenominational. It gathers into its branches young men of all the religious sects, and opens its "associate membership" even to Catholics. Its directors claim that it antagonizes no religious belief, that it welcomes to the use of lecture halls, classes for study, the library, gymnasium and the employment bureau, every young man who seeks self improvement and who feels the need of a friendly hand to help him in his difficulties.

If this be the true character of the Young Men's Christian Association we are at a loss to understand the purpose underlying the presentation of some of the reading matter in a recent Y. M. C. A. bulletin. We refer to Twenty-third Street Men, a four-page paper "published occasionally at 215 West Twenty-third street, New York, by the Twenty-third Street Branch, Y. M. C. A." It circulates among the 3,615 members of this local branch and among thousands of other members in New York City and elsewhere.

In the November issue of this representative bulletin, under "Quotations from the Writings of Authorities on South America," we read that "Millions in Brazil look upon the Virgin Mary as their Saviour. To them Christ is practically numbered among the Saints," and more stuff of like import too stupid to reproduce. Then follows another quotation in which it is stated, "The Superstition and Idolatry" of these millions in Brazil "are hard for a North American to understand. They are hinted at by an inscription which I copied from the pedestal of a Statue of Christ on the Cross in Santiago, which translated reads as follows: 'By permission of the Archbishop of Santiago, an indulgence of eighty days which may be applied to the dead, will be granted to anyone who will say an Ave Maria, or the Creed before the Statue of the Crucified Christ.' Who will say that Protestant schools and churches are not needed in such a Country, where the highest ecclesiastical authority grants indulgences to any dead scoundrel whose friends will say a 'Hail Mary' before a stone image of Mary's Son, whose authoritative word concerning salvation was, 'He that believeth in the Son, hath everlasting life.'"

This offensive paragraph coupled with the fact that the writer of it is Francis E. Clark, the name of the Founder of the United Christian Endeavor Association, would alone give us good reason to believe that the Y. M. C. A. is not the undenominational organization it pretends to be, especially when Catholics are concerned. We have no quarrel with the Y. M. C. A. Let them prosecute their good work among Protestant young men, but let them cease to proclaim their good will towards all men, irrespective of race, creed, color or condition, so long as Catholics are made the object of ridicule or calumny.

Our chief object in noticing Twenty-third Street Men is to warn Catholics that they should not suffer the delusion that the Y. M. C. A. is non-sectarian, or bears no animosity towards their Faith. Catholic young men who allow themselves to be duped by the Y. M. C. A. and join the Association for the sake of the advantages which membership holds out to them, should remember that all these worldly advantages are purchased dearly if they must swallow insults to their Faith and associate on terms of friendship with those who are bent on depriving them of their Christian heritage. We have had no thought of answering the calumnies contained in the references quoted by the editors of the Y. M. C. A. bulletin. Cardinal Newman did not hesitate to say that "the most overwhelming refutations of the calumnies brought against Catholics do no good at all with the Protestant community." But we are of the opinion that the time has come when our young men should cease to ally themselves with those who despise them for their religion and who, if they could, would rob them of the precious jewel of their Faith.

Judge Grosscup on Religion in Education

The growth in this country of sentiment in favor of religion in education is gratifying to Catholics, not merely because they welcome even such tardy recognition of a principle which they have been defending from the first, but because they see in the developing sense of this need in our school training a very probable solution of the problem of an equitable distribution of the school tax. Judge Grosscup, of the United States Circuit Court, is among the latest of the open advocates of religious training in the school. In a recent interview the distinguished jurist, while declaring himself entirely optimistic concerning the religious side of life in the United States, frankly admitted the existence of "one great danger and decided drawback to the fullest possible influence of religion in this country." This danger and drawback he affirmed to be "the exclusion of religious teaching from the schools."

Unhappily Judge Grosscup in his further urging of "certain remedial possibilities which suggest themselves," brushes aside as "scarcely practicable at present" the distribution of the school tax in equitable proportion among denominational and non-denominational schools alike. Such a measure would certainly make possible the teaching of religion in schools; and it is one which experience in other lands has proved to be as feasible of application as it must be admitted to be in accord with the fundamental law of religious freedom among ourselves. Catholics can be patient, feeling as they do that the instinctive love of justice that prevails in the land will in time satisfactorily solve the problem. Meanwhile it is with no half-hearted assent that we subscribe to Judge Grosscup's final word: "The consequence of the ardent desire for neutrality as between the various denominations is that the government is actually taking a stand against religion, or at least that is how it works out in the end. The result of the unfortunate situation is that at an age when children are having their character and mentality made up they are not given any of the benefit of religion. The rising generation is thus losing religious training at the time it is most needed. Some method should be found by which religious instruction will be a part of the school system."

Vocation Teaching

Years ago when Dr. Eliot, then President of Harvard, startled the educational world with his sweeping defence of electivism in secondary school and college work, a very common objection was urged against him. In a college or university the student who is aiming at a certain profession, so the objection ran, can usually exercise enough caution and common sense to elect courses bearing in some way on his chosen life-work; but in the high school the pupil is very apt to choose his courses without due thought or a due appreciation of his own weaknesses. There has come under discussion of late a new plan for meeting this difficulty. The fact that so few pass from the elementary to the high school, and fewer still to the college or university, has led to a desire among educators so to constitute every school as to have it stand ready to give a general, practical training for life, without any regard to the pupil's high school or college intention. The child, so it is argued, who is going to leave school at the end of his elementary or of his high school course should get from his work at school some practical, paying equipment. If the child had some way of finding out early what he wished to do, and of choosing the right school courses to obtain this end, his chance in the race of life would be improved. Manifestly the difficulty referred to above is in existence here: the child himself is incapable of the election of courses this plan supposes. Hence the suggestion of late frequently heard among educators and quite fully developed by a writer in the November Atlantic Monthly: In every high school there should be a carefully trained vocational expert, who, not incidentally merely, but entirely and exclusively, shall give his attention to assisting the youth with whom he comes in contact to choose their life work wisely. One is not prepared to render off-hand judgment regarding this latest development of pedagogic theory. To arrive at that knowledge of individual aptitude and desire which will help the teacher to advise and guide his pupil in the resultant choice of his life work, has ever been held to be an essential feature of the personal influence a Catholic teacher is encouraged to exercise. The new theory may be, in its way, a forced tribute to the Catholic teacher's solicitude regarding vocation. Or again it may be a veiled reaction against the most readily recognized evil attending the spread of electivism in school programs. Most educators of to-day, whilst finding in the elective system a certain justification in the varying abilities, desires and aptitudes of different individuals, would favor its restriction to university or at least to more advanced college students. Or, finally, the projected vocation teaching may be a last attempt to hamper the rights of pupil and parent alike and to restrict the freedom of choice which belongs to them, in order to add the finishing touch to that state-control of school work which is too often advocated. The latest development, whatever spirit it may possess, is worth watching.

The International Congress on Tuberculosis

What an immense amount of work a modern International Medical Congress involves will probably be best appreciated by those without personal experience of these gatherings by a perusal of the five volumes of the "Transactions of the Sixth International Congress on Tuberculosis" which have been just delivered to the members of the Congress. Formally there are five volumes, but as the first volume is divided into two parts of over 600 pages each, and the fourth volume into two parts of about 500 pages each, and, as there is an additional special volume, altogether the work is in eight stately volumes which constitute a library of our present day knowledge of tuberculosis. All of the vexed questions in this most important of diseases that attacks the human race are here discussed. The question of the relation of animal to human tuberculosis has practically a large volume to itself. The prophylaxis of the disease has another volume. Tuberculosis in children and surgical tuberculosis make a third volume. It is conceded that the conclusions thus far reached are not absolute, but there has been a magnificent accumulation of knowledge with regard to "The Great White Plague," and it has been placed in a form that makes it available to all the world.

It is generally conceded that this Sixth International Congress of Tuberculosis was one of the most successful international medical congresses ever held. Most of the success of it is due to the magnificent executive ability of the president of the congress, Dr. Lawrence W. Flick, of Philadelphia, whose personality dominated the preparations and stood out strongly during all the proceedings. He has accomplished more perhaps than any other in solving the practical problems of tuberculosis in this country, and his contributions to the subject have made him well known and thoroughly respected by European authorities. They looked to him with confidence, they appreciated very well how thorough was his work, and he was able to secure more contributions and more widespread interest than has ever been given to a like congress before. He himself would say doubtless that the success of the congress was very largely due to the untiring efforts of an efficient committee of arrangements created by the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, and to the executive committee consisting, besides the President, of Dr. Livington Farrand of New York, Dr. John S. Fulton of Washington, and Dr. Joseph Walsh of Philadelphia.

Those who are interested in tuberculosis will find information on every possible phase of the subject in these volumes which are handsomely gotten up, carefully printed, and arranged so that consultation of various subjects is comparatively easy. They are the enduring memorial of the work that was accomplished and reflect honor on those who are mainly responsible for the success of the congress they represent. A better idea of the labor involved in completing these so perfectly will be obtained when we call attention to the fact that the papers are in five languages and that the printing and proof-reading of these had to be carefully overseen to avoid serious mistakes. It is the successful issue of works like these, after the completion of a thoroughly organized and well conducted congress, that constitutes the best proof that America is coming to hold her proper place in the world of science as well as in that of enterprise, invention and manufacture. We have here a monument of American thoroughness and nice attention to detail that will do much to gainsay what is sometimes over strenuously urged against our tendency to live and work too fast in the United States.

The Gates Coal & Coke Co. published an advertisement in the Pittsburgh Observer. Its directors then appealed to priests to invest in its securities on the score that the newspaper representing the bishop of the Pittsburgh diocese approved of its scheme. Circulars headed A. M. D. G. were sent broadcast to market the stock and bonds of this company "of the priests, by the priests, for the priests." Some of these circulars bore a signature with initials appended very much like those in common use among Jesuits. Meanwhile the Observer had expressed regret for having admitted this advertisement, and later published the notification of His Excellency Mgr. Falconio, forbidding priests from taking part in the scheme. Ventures of this sort are so often deceptive, if not fraudulent, and they are thrust upon priests with so much annoyance, that they should be excluded from the mails.

A special cable despatch announces that Abbé Bremond has made public retraction of his conduct, and of his explanations of the same, on the occasion of the late George Tyrrell's funeral. It will be recalled by readers of AMERICA that, contrary to the express orders of the ecclesiastical authorities, the abbé recited prayers at the funeral and went out of his way to pay unwarranted tribute to the Anglican Church. Apparently he was not aware at the time of what is now clear, since the publication of his friend's letter to Bishop Herzog of the Old Catholic Church. The manifest duplicity of the Modernist mind has brought him to his senses. He has repudiated his tendencies to Modernism. He is no longer under suspension, and he has been absolved from all censures.

LITERATURE

RECENT FRENCH LITERATURE.

Among the recent contributions to French literature, the novel deserves special attention not only on account of its vogue among the majority of readers, but also because it has had the good fortune to produce some delightful pieces of art. "Pierre et Thérèse" is the work of the psychologist and moralist, recently elected to the French Academy, Marcel Prévost. (M. Prévost, "Pierre et Thérèse," Paris, Lemerre.) This new novel is the work of one who knows the human heart. About the dominant moral conception of this novel, many incompatible suppositions have been made. Did the author wish to show the victory of altruism over egoism? or the power of love? Did he intend to develop Brunetière's assertion that at the origin of all great fortunes there is something that makes us shudder? Is the work a protest against the Nietzschean doctrine of the superman? or perhaps a plea against divorce? It may be all this and much more.

René Bazin, well known to the readers of this review, who has just given us one more masterpiece, "Le Mariage de Mademoiselle Gimel" (Paris, Calmann-Lévy), is also a realist. His realism is sweet, delicate and dignified, exact however, and at least as faithful to truth as many of the productions of the naturalistic school. To these great names let us add Edouard Rod's. Mr. Rod sincerely believes that the writer has a mission to fulfill. His novel, "Au Milieu du Chemin," published a few years since, may well be regarded as a program. He thinks—rightly, in my opinion—that every novel is a philosophical treatise, every writer a moralist. It is the conception of marriage, already defended in some of his earlier novels, that Mr. Rod defends to-day in "Unis" (Paris, Charpentier.)

Recent French poetry also furnishes us numerous charming volumes, so numerous, indeed, that it is a real task to limit one's self to a few of them in a brief review article. The great poets of yesterday, Sully-Prudhomme and Coppée are with us no more; but there seems to arise a new generation that promises to be by no means inferior to these illustrious predecessors. In a review like America particular mention ought to be made of Victor Kinon, the Belgian Catholic poet, at times monotonous, with a real talent, however, always amiable, the author of "L'Ame des Saisons," (Brussels, Ve. Larcier), a big volume fraught with true emotion and fervent prayer.

In the field of literary criticism, let us mention a volume added to the series "Collection des Grands Ecrivains Français"; the volume on Molière by Georges Lafenestre (G. Lafenestre, "Molière," Paris, Hachette). The great dramatist was still absent from the superb gallery which contains Paris's "Villon," Fouillée's "Descartes," Deschamps's "Marivaux," Larroumet's "Racine" and fifty more splendid portraits. It is there now, a Molière worthy of Molière, a true, vivid and definitive picture.

A word also about Joseph Vianey's volume on Leconte de Lisle (J. Vianey, "Les Sources de Leconte de Lisle," Montpellier, Coulet), a poet born under a tropical sky, exotic, pessimistic, irreligious, who passed through Christianity, however, and even founded a Catholic review. It is the Indian, Finnish or Polynesian legends sung by Leconte de Lisle that Mr. Vianey has sought for and compiled. Henceforward, no serious study of the author of the "Poèmes Barbares" can be made without Mr. Vianey's book.

Those interested in French history will find in "Le Dernier Effort de la Vendée" by Vicomte Aurélien de Courson (Paris, Emile Paul), a faithful and pathetic account of this last rebellion of Vendée which forms one of the most curious pages of the history of Louis Philippe's reign. They will also appreciate the volume entitled "Gambetta par Gambetta," by P.

B. Gheusi (Paris, Ollendorff). It is a collection of letters by the orator of the Third Republic. It will throw a new light upon the qualities and the defects of the man.

Passing now to philosophy, we shall first mention Albert Schinz's "Anti-Pragmatisme" (Paris, Alcan). This work has a special interest for us, because it is written by one of our college professors, and deals with American life and philosophy, which are thoroughly familiar to the author. Some of Mr. Schinz's conclusions are very questionable. His work is likely to lessen the immoderate enthusiasm with which Pragmatism has been welcomed in this country.

The distinguished French publicist, George Fonsegrive, has collected in his volume "Essais sur la Connaissance" (Paris, Lecoffre), some important philosophical studies which he had published these last years. Thomistic in the main lines of his philosophy, with a tendency to subjectivism, Mr. Fonsegrive has been for many years one of the champions of Catholic ideals in France. More strictly Thomistic is Georges Michelet, professor in the Institut catholique of Toulouse, the eminent author of "Dieu et l'Agnosticisme Contemporain" (Paris, Gabalda). He is, moreover, a Scholastic who has mastered modern philosophy and discusses all contemporary agnostic systems side by side with the fundamental truths of Scholastic theism.

An important work on the religion of primitive races has been published by Mgr. Le Roy (Le Roy, "La Religion des Primitifs," Paris, Beauchesne). The author, who has been for twenty years a missionary on both coasts of Africa, is no doubt more competent than anybody else to treat the question. His sympathy for the savage, which he does not take the trouble to conceal, does not detract from the merit of the work, which must be placed on the same shelf as those of Tylor, Reville and Reinach.

Recent workers in the field of history of philosophy have directed their attention to the philosophical systems of the last century. We are glad to welcome the solid work of Pierre Tisserand on Maine de Biran (P. Tisserand, "L'Anthropologie de Maine de Biran," Paris, Alcan). It possesses a great interest, in spite of the important studies of Couailhac and Michelet on the same subject, published some years ago. Maine de Biran (1766-1824), as is well known, was the great representative of the psychologico-spiritualistic school and a consistent adversary of pantheism and traditionalism.

Mr. F. Palhoriès (F. Palhoriès, "La Théorie idéologique de Galluppi dans ses rapports avec la philosophie de Kant," Paris, Alcan), has studied the epistemological theory of Galluppi (1770-1846), an Italian philosopher of the transition period, who endeavored to find a middle path between Kantism and sensism; but whose philosophy according to Mr. Palhoriès, is nothing but a juxtaposition of heterogeneous elements, an inconsistent sensism or an incomplete intellectualism.

JOSEPH LOUIS PERRIER.

Conflict and Triumph. A Drama in Three Acts. By ELIZABETH GAGNIEUR (Alba). Montreal: Canadian Messenger Press.

Early Christian Hymns. By DANIEL JOSEPH DONAHOE. New York: The Grafton Press.

"Conflict and Triumph" has for a sub-title "a drama in three acts." It might be more properly styled a dramatic cycle in three parts. For intense genius would find it difficult to sustain so long a recital and to bring it within the compass of a single drama, even if it is intended only as a reading for the closet. Moreover, the three acts have each the scope of a drama; combined they could make a trilogy after the models of the Attic stage. And while there is mention of the Greek, let us here say that the "machinery" of Miss Gagnieur's drama is Aeschylean. The titanic characters and the colossal settings of Aeschylus, especially in his religious plays, do not raise heads to a level with the personages in "Conflict and Triumph,"—the Veiled King, World, Idolatry, Lucifer, Imperial Rome, Ecclesia and the attendant choruses of angels.

It is a pity, in the consideration of this drama, with its wealth of material and the stupendous labor spent upon it, to question for a moment its serviceableness. But it was not written for the mere printing; therefore we ask, how shall it serve? We have said enough to show that it deserves a multitude of readers. A hindrance to such an effect will, we think, come from the bulky form of the work, from its being, as the sub-title insists, a drama of a single piece. It would be more inviting for the reader who starts the book to know that at one sitting he might reach the completion of some episode. And if a dramatic manager wished to play it as a Mystery, he would assuredly find insuperable difficulty in reducing it to proper length. Again the individual speeches and choruses, are for the most part, too long. Shakespeare and Milton had the genius to sustain long speeches in verse; others on this side of them, with Tennyson, will cultivate brevity. A vivid metaphor (and such is lacking in this work) will stand for twenty lines of diluted expression. And finally the rhymed pentameter couplet had its day with Addison and Pope and the other formalists of the Queen Anne period of letters; it has not swung back to our appreciation. But these are only practical observations on "Conflict and Triumph"; may they prove chimerical, is our own wish. For we would desire a wide world of readers for this new contribution to the poetical history that sings from Genesis to the Apocalypse.

It is not too late to hail as a new addition to our hymnology the translation of celebrated religious hymns, by Daniel Joseph Donahoe, rather is it advantageous to renew attention to this worthy book. Our first word, then, on the volume is praise. We know that a spirit of sharp criticism might prefer to compare the translations with their originals, and find, at times, some deficiency in the matter of accurate renderings; or it might stand them up in parallel columns with the translations of such skilled workers in the craft as Neale, Littledale, Newman and Caswall. But this, we feel, is not the spirit to bring to Mr. Donahoe's volume. His renditions of these old hymns are to be best appreciated by being read in themselves, without reference to the originals,—not that they fail to render with almost literal exactness the lines of the old writers (indeed for the most part they keep quite close to the text)—but because their chief excellence is their breathing the spirit of the old hymns; and again—a point to be noted well—their purpose is to win an appreciation for these literary treasures from American readers, for here is an audience that sorely needs an acquaintance with the Church's song.

Mr. Donahoe's volume of "Early Christian Hymns" will serve to give our people a relish for this portion of our ecclesiastical treasures. In Brittany, in the Tyrol, and in Ireland, much of the daily song of the people seems like snatches out of these beautiful hymns. It would be a far healthier atmosphere for us, too, if we cultivated such a spirit of song rather than the very questionable ballads of our theatres. The little biographical notes prefixed to the hymns of the original writers are very instructive. We had wished Mr. Donahoe to give us more of Sedulius, who is daily growing into notice, now that he is quite accurately believed to have been an O'Shiel from Ireland, and to have been a poetical influence with St. Hilary and St. Ambrose, names that head the list in Mr. Donahoe's volume.

LEAR.

Patrology: The Lives and Works of the Fathers of the Church. By OTTO BARDENHEWER, D.D., Ph.D. Translated from the Second Edition. By THOMAS J. SHAHAN, D.D. St. Louis: B. Herder.

This book is a translation of Dr. Bardenhewer's excellent work on the Fathers of the Church which was published by Herder as one of the volumes of his Theologische Bibliothek, first in 1894, and again in a revised and enlarged form in 1901. It has been generally praised by eminent Patristic scholars, both for the accurate and concise treatment of its subject and for the fulness of its bibliographical information; and by putting within their reach a manual which contains all the best results of later Patristic study and research the author has laid students of theology under a great obligation. The book begins with the Apostles' Creed, and carries the reader down to St. Damascene in the East and St. Gregory the Great and St. Isidore in the West; giving a brief sketch of the lives, writings and doctrines of the Fathers, and adding in smaller type copious references with regard to disputed points and questions. The character of such a book makes it obviously impossible to give a more detailed account of its contents.

Dr. Shahan, the translator, has long since taught us to welcome any work which he sends to the press. His accurate, painstaking scholarship, his wide learning and his devotion to the best interests of the Church, have long been generally acknowledged, and, having been honored by the Holy See in his appointment to the Rectorship of the Catholic University, his name predisposes us to regard the present volume with special favor.

The book, however, is its own best recommendation; Dr. Shahan tells us that "such competent judges as the modern Bollandists agree that the 'Patrologie' of Dr. Bardenhewer has no superior for abundance of information, exactness of reference, and conciseness of statement." It has long been a matter of regret that this book, although it had found its way into both French and Italian, had not yet appeared in English. Being the Professor of Church History in the Catholic University, Dr. Shahan has had special opportunities for judging of the utility and even necessity of such a manual in the Seminary and the ministry. He therefore undertook the laborious task and carried it out in a way that leaves nothing to be desired. That his judgment was correct and his performance excellent, the flattering letters of approbation which he has received from many of the archbishops and bishops of the United States bear witness.

The attacks that are being made on the Church to-day by Protestant and Rationalist, as Archbishop Messmer observes, are largely based on the writing of the Fathers. Hence a priest or even a layman who would defend religion and give a reason for his faith, should have at least some acquaintance with these. This Dr. Shahan has made possible for him by bringing out a volume that Herder has printed with great care. The index deserves especial notice. We have therefore to thank Dr. Shahan for having done his difficult task so generously and so well. It is due to his efforts that we have accessible in the vernacular a comprehensive sketch of the actual condition of Patrological knowledge and research. We hope the translation will have a wide circulation; we know that all who make its acquaintance will give it a hearty welcome.

Le Cantique Des Cantiques. Commentaire philologique et exégétique par P. JOÜON, S.J. Professor à la Faculté orientale, Université S. Joseph Beyrouth. Paris: Beauchesne. Price, 5fr.

Father Joüon was last year one of the lecturers on Old Testament Exegesis, in the Biblical school that for the past seven years has been a part of the flourishing Jesuit University of Beirut. He has given us a scholarly and sober treatise on the Song of Songs. Naturally enough the question of the method of interpretation of Canticles receives most prominence; the question is vital in any treatise on this beautiful, yet puzzling work. The author devotes about a third of his commentary to the examination of the various schools of interpretation of the book.

Outside the Catholic Church, the students of the Bible have gone pell-mell the way of Rationalism in the matter of interpretation of Canticles. They have expressed no horror at the hardihood of men like Drs. Cheyne and Sanday, Canons of Christ Church, Oxford, and Professor Haupt of Johns Hopkins University, to whom the Song of Songs is nothing more than a collection of love-ditties—older, to be sure, but no more inspired than such lofty flights as "Believe Me if All Those Endearing Young Charms," "Comin' Through the Rye," etc. To Rationalists and most Protestant Biblical scholars, the Song of Songs is to be interpreted in a non-figurative sense. It is a collection of erotic songs that celebrate the marriage of Solomon with the daughter of Pharaoh or some such event that took place even later than the time of the great Wise Man. They refuse to admit the possibility of the inspiration of these love-songs, or to allow any allegorical meaning to the book. There is for them question only of a group of love-ditties pure and simple, and of the occasion and circumstances of these. A quotation from Dr. Sanday will bear me out in this seemingly rash criticism. Dr. Sanday is a Canon of Christ Church, a fellow of Exeter and perhaps the most conservative, or, rather, the least rash of Oxford Biblical Professors of to-day. No Anglican heresy-hunter has ever taken this exegete to task. The Bampton Lectures for 1893, from which I quote, aroused no comment of disapproval from the Ecclesia Major Anglicana to which those lectures are dedicated. What, then, does Dr. Sanday think of Canticles? He says:

"The Song of Songs is just an Idyll of faithful human love, and nothing more.....Its place in our Bibles is due to a method of interpretation, which is now very generally abandoned. What are we to say to such a book? There can be no question of inspiration, as we have so far understood it, even in the case of Ecclesiastes." ("Inspiration," Bampton Lectures, 1893; London, 1894, p. 210.)

Dr. Sanday had already said that the inspiration of Ecclesiastes meant only this, that there is room in heaven even for the pessimist. Since he allows the inspiration of Canticles in no sense whatsoever, how does he explain the presence of the Song in the canon of the Book of Common Prayer? By admitting that canonicity in the Anglican Communion does not mean inspiration. The Song of Songs is not inspired: it is the canon merely "to show that nothing human is foreign to Scripture. Nihil humani a se alienum putat." That is, according to Dr. Sanday's methods of interpretation, and to the meaning aliquid humanum has in connection with the book for most non-Catholic interpreters, the Songs are in the Anglican canon merely to show that even lust is not foreign to Scripture. But there is no need to follow Protestants in a low estimate of the moral tone of this book taken in a purely material sense. Father Hontheim, Professor of Old Testament exegesis in the Jesuit College of Valkenburg, who has made a study of its metrical structure and cast it into a series of metrical chants, insisting that the love of which it is the expression is honorable marriage love, finds that the setting, though Oriental and Semitic in character, is pure and worthy of being the vehicle of its inspired meaning. How do Catholics interpret Canticles? According to that method which Dr. Sanday says "is now very generally abandoned." Father Joïon, following the tradition in this matter, sees only a figurative meaning in the great Song. The only meaning intended by God, its author, and therefore its literal meaning, is the union of God with his people Israel. This union is a type of the union of Christ with His Church. A few Catholics, as Bossuet and Calmet, deem the literal and inspired meaning to be two-fold—the non-figurative union between the lover and the beloved together with the figurative or allegorical union of God with Israel. Father Joïon rightly objects to this opinion as opposed to Jewish and Christian tradition and unworthy the Holy Spirit. The story and sentiments apart from their allegorical setting, lose their inspired setting and meaning. Father Joïon assigns the book to some learned Jew of rather recent times. The translation is clear, scholarly and smooth. The notes are not at all oppressive, but invite one to read on.

WALTER DRUM, S.J

Geschichte der Verehrung Marias in Deutschland während des Mittelalters. Ein Beitrag zur Religionswissenschaft und Kunstgeschichte, von STEPHAN BEISSEL, S.J. Freiburg im Br. B. Herder. (History of the veneration of Mary during the Middle-Ages in Germany.)

The German nation surely contributed its share towards the fulfilment of the prophecy pronounced by the Virgin-Mother, "henceforth all generations shall call me blessed." The noble arts of poetry and oratory, of sculpture and painting and architecture devoted the works of their beginnings, their progress and perfection to the honor and praise of the "Mother of beautiful Love." But they were ever controlled and guided by the Teaching Church, which received them into her liturgy or at least admitted them to render remote service in her public devotions. Father Beissel is an art-historian, having spent his whole life in the special study of architecture and sculpture. Hence these arts receive perhaps the lion's share of his attention. One of the oldest monuments of Germany's veneration to Mary is the Palace Chapel of Charlemagne at Aix-la-Chapelle, which is still admired and in which for many centuries the German kings were crowned. But the productions of the other arts are by no means neglected in his able volume. The accounts of legends, of pilgrimages and other manifestations of popular devotion fill many an interesting chapter, and Father Beissel certainly knows how to combine historical correctness with tact and prudence, whilst a spirit of devotion prevades the whole book.

He promises, as a continuation of the present volume, another work without national restriction, a history of the veneration of Mary after the close of the Middle Ages. The present book with its nearly three hundred beautiful illustrations is a masterpiece of the bookmaker's art. The price, seven dollars, is reasonable.

Reviews and Magazines

The Irish Ecclesiastical Record is giving increasing space to scientific articles, for which a sufficient motive is supplied by Rev. H. V. Gill, S.J., in "The Frontier of Physical Science": "The connection between chemistry and physics is becoming closer every day and even metaphysical speculation seems a natural element of modern 'natural' philosophy. Daring theories have been formed and new facts are being discovered which in turn open up new regions to the explorer. We come into contact with speculations which are concerned with the constitution of matter and which bring us to the frontier between physics and metaphysics; which shows incidentally that there is a great temptation for the physicist to deal in metaphysics, and the necessity of the metaphysician being at least well acquainted with the facts of physics." Father Gill's article is a masterly exposition of the latest marvels of radio-activity and the light they throw on ions, corpuscles, atoms, and the ultimate composition of matter. Phases of the same subject are examined by Dr. Coffey in "The New Knowledge and its Limitations." The editor devotes over thirty instructive pages to Maynooth's parliamentary history. The British parliament, assuming the Irish grant with the Union, debated the amount annually from 1800 to 1845 when Sir Robert Peel raised the endowment, which had varied between £8,000 and £13,000, to £26,000, and made it perpetual. The speeches made by ministers of that day contrast favorably with the utterances of many of their successors; Lord Macaulay's is a classic indictment of Protestant spoliation. The Peel grant continued to 1869 when Maynooth was disestablished with the Protestant Church. Its subsequent period of complete independence has witnessed a continued growth in prosperity and influence. Other articles of interest are "The Words of Joan of Arc," by R. Barry O'Brien, B.L., and "Philosophy and Religion," by Rev. T. J. O'Mahony, D.D.

"The Business of Citizenship in New York City," written before the late election for the November Review of Reviews, is impartial enough to have been written any time. Mr. W. H. Allen recognizes the considerable advance that has been made under the present city government, and points out the necessary steps to be taken in efficient accounting and budget-making. The incoming administration must proceed to locate "not leakage but leakages, not incompetence but incompetent employees, not profitable lines of effort but profits." Its action in the direction of municipal ownership, construction and operation of subways, or otherwise, will influence the rest of the country. As Director of the Bureau of Municipal Research, Mr. Allen advocates the line of reform mapped out by his organization—a series of instructive articles deal with the history, construction, actual position and future possibilities of aeroplanes and dirigible balloons. It was chiefly manual skill that enabled the Wright brothers to succeed where Langley, Maxim and Lilienthal had failed. Aeroplanes will be of little practical use until they become capable of encountering ordinary winds and can never be of much service in war unless for scouting purposes. But the Zeppelin air-ship has already attained high speed with control, duration of flight and carrying capacity. It will soon have met every obstacle. Its range will be only limited by its size, and we shall have before long Dreadnoughts and Mauretanas of the air.

Mr. Irving Babbitt has an interesting paper on "Racine and the Anti-Romantic Reaction" in The Nation for November 18. Mr. Babbitt has always stood for the restraint and moderation of classical models and he sees confirmation of his own views in the present trend of literary events in France. "With the spread of impressionism," says Mr. Babbitt, "literature has lost standards and discipline and at the same time virility and seriousness; it has fallen into the hands of aesthetes and dilettantes, the last effete representatives of romanticism, who have proved utterly unequal to the task of maintaining its great traditions against the scientific positivists."

We wish Mr. Babbitt had not marred his excellent paper by referring to the "easy-going and Jesuitical type of Christianity" current in Racine's time. We feel that the writer has what is called an "animus" and will just as readily talk about Jesuitical fanaticism and bigotry in his next paper if he thinks it will serve his purpose. If Mr. Babbitt has studied history at all he must know that Jansenism is a discredited system. To praise it at the expense of its more rational opponents does not serve any good purpose either literary or historical, and only makes us suspicious that the writer is ready to play fast and loose with truth at the suggestion of his prejudices.

In the Contemporary Review for November we are treated to a battle of giants in the domain of Shakespearian criticism. The article "Is Shakespeare Self-Revealed?" by Edward Dowden is an answer to Dr. Sidney Lee who, in a paper entitled "The Impersonal Aspect of Shakespeare's Art," has denied that we can discover anything about our greatest poet in his dramatic works. Mr. Dowden bases his argument on the principle that the imagination, no matter how gifted it be, cannot supply all the data for the artistic representation of emotion and passion without the aid of personal experience. He proves this major premise of his argument by interesting references to Sir Walter Scott, Balzac and Goethe, and draws the conclusion that the inner soul of Shakespeare and much of his character and most intimate experience can be deduced from his plays.

LITERARY NOTES.

The third instalment of the "History of the Society of Jesus in North America," by Rev. Thomas Hughes, S.J., is announced for appearance in January. It will consist of the original documents used by the author as the ground work of his history and will cover the half century ending in 1838, forming Part II of the documentary exhibits which have already appeared in Volume I, Part I, of "Documents."

We have read advance sheets of the preface and table of contents of this second collection of historical material and we are inclined, as a consequence, to be of the opinion that the new contribution to Father Hughes' "History" will excite more interest than either of its predecessors. The author's foreword is something of a prologus galeatus, in which he deems it proper to justify his candor in upsetting some preconceived historical ideas: "If the interests of history are to be served, or the course of error stemmed, we may not ignore what we do not like, nor need we blush at old sheets that blush not, nor are we at liberty to retire with the instinct of self-preservation from facing that which we fear."

The preface also prepares us for new light upon the person, character and work of Archbishop Carroll.

Rev. Miguel Saderro Masô, S.J., seismologist to the Manila Weather Bureau, has just published an important catalogue of the strong earthquakes felt in the Philippine Islands during the last half century. These seismic disturbances, fifty-five in number, vary in intensity between the degree seven and ten of the Rossi-Forel Scale, five of them attaining a maximum intensity. The year of maximum activity was 1897. The most notable district marked is Mindanao, and especially the Eastern part of the island.

A "Life of St. Ignatius Loyola," written by the late Francis Thompson, the manuscript of which was discovered among his effects, after his death, will be published next month. It has been revised by the Rev. J. H. Pollen, S.J.

EDUCATION

"The pendulum has already swung too far in the way of instructing men to do one thing for themselves, instead of educating them to do great things for the world by being great men" is the manner in which Senator Root, speaking at the installation of the new President of Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., uttered his protest against the intemperate specializing in college work which is destructive of the aims of pure scholarship. Other notable utterances of the occasion lead one to rejoice at the evident strength of the old ideal that teaching, the upbuilding of mind and character, is to be regarded as the chiefest function of the American college, despite the many factors which have led critics to a different contention. President Taft, an honored guest on the same occasion, "decried the idea that the man to head an institution of learning was one who knew the value of a dollar and how to get it. The college president first of all is a teacher, that is his profession. If he is to do his duty by his institution he must understand how teaching should be done;—unless he is a teacher he will not be fit to select men and to build up a faculty to do the teaching." Dr. Shanklin, the new president, congratulated his hearers on the fact that Wesleyan University had "refused to fall in line with that mischievous 'scrap-heap' educational fad, the extreme elective system, which is now coming to be recognized as such even by many who until recently held it." A similar satisfactory note is struck by President Butler, of Columbia University in his annual report to the University trustees recently published. Dr. Butler has never before spoken clearly his protest against what he terms "the impossibility of the educational and mechanical being reconciled." To quote the report: "It is vitally important to be on guard against the mechanical, the bookkeeping and the accounting element in education. Nothing is easier than to permit students and teachers alike to gain the impression that before obtaining a degree or an academic honor one has only to complete so many subjects, to attend so many hours or to win so many points. Machinery for measurement and record is necessary, no doubt, but it is often more necessary that this machinery be not allowed to dominate the teaching or to gain control of the imagination of the teacher and the taught. There are those now busily instructing the public, who seem to believe that . . . if they can only have access to treasurers' reports and registrars' statistics and rearrange them in some new and occult fashion like men on a chess board higher education will be at once reformed and rise to new planes of achievement. These are delusions of the mechanically minded. There is really only one fundamental problem in higher education, and that is to find the teacher." Happily we are in the midst of a salutary reaction against certain excesses in recent school methods. The pendulum is evidently swinging back.

An interesting situation developed recently in New York City. Pending the building of the new St. Gabriel's school, the request had been sent in to the Board of Education for permission to occupy an old Public School now unused for school purposes. The Committee on By-laws and Legislation, to which the Board of Education referred the request, made answer that the board had no right to give over to schools of any denomination or private schools such old buildings unless leased for a nominal consideration. Whilst the matter was before the committee, a "non-partisan" protest against the concession of the privilege requested appeared in one of the city papers, the writer basing his objections on "the injustice that would be done thereby to taxpayers' children," so many of whom are now on part time school attendance because of lack of room in the public schools.

The protest called forth a capital answer, and suggested an equitable consideration which it is well not to overlook.

"In answer to a non-sectarian protest, I would like to remind 'F. W. L.' that the children attending parochial schools are also taxpayers' children just as well. Does our friend realize that the Catholic parochial schools have saved the city in the aggregate several millions of dollars, and that each year taxpaying Catholics are contributing to the erection of additional schools for the education of their children? If there are over 47,000 children now on part time, think how many more there would be if all parochial schools would to-morrow close their doors.

"True, our friend is fundamentally right in his contention, but a spirit of fairness must lead him to admit that, even if it were to come to pass that this unused public school building were turned over to parochial school purposes, free of rent until next May, even that would be but a slight return for the taxes annually paid by Catholics toward secular education of which they do not care to avail themselves."

The Outlook of Nov. 20 gives a lengthy notice in praise of Dr. William T. Harris, praising the late Commissioner of Education of the United States as one who "was not only a veteran in the service of education in this country, but had long been a leader in that field, and had very widely and deeply influenced education." No doubt Mr. Harris rendered many valuable services by his educational reports. One may, however, fairly question whether his influence was always productive of good in the interests it touched. The late Commissioner of Education used to defend a system of training in which from the beginning respect for authority was eliminated,—the child, according to it, was to be trained not to depend upon the authority of the parent or teacher in its gropings towards knowledge but to lean upon its own faculties in its quest. It may be that Dr. Harris failed to perceive the necessary ethical sequence of such a policy in a child's training, but it requires no great study to appreciate its certain results. In the Los Angeles Convention of the National Education Association a resolution was adopted deploring certain tendencies showing themselves in school children of the day. Mention was made of a tendency to disregard constituted authority; of a lack of respect for age and superior wisdom; of a weak appreciation of the demands of duty; of a disposition to follow pleasure and interest rather than obligation and order—and it was affirmed that the condition "demands the earliest thought and action of our leaders of opinion." It does not need any great strain of thinking to explain the existence of such tendencies, where the saving grace of submission to authority is excluded from the scheme of principles to be insisted upon in forming the minds of the young.

At the meeting of the trustees of the Catholic University, Washington, last week, among the measures considered was the establishment of an institute of pedagogy in which Catholic women, belonging to religious orders, may derive the educational advantages of the university. According to the plan the university will not erect the building or finance the venture in any way. The members of the religious orders will do this. This foundation will be a normal school for the training of teachers in the convents, colleges and Catholic parochial schools.

Building operations have begun on a new wing which will include a large assembly hall in Brooklyn College. This college, which is not yet three years old, has already nearly 400 students on its roll.

Notre Dame University has organized a students' club for the study and practice of aerial navigation.

SOCIOLOGY

The National Negro Business League in a recent meeting at Louisville, Ky., invited Booker T. Washington to lead a movement for duly celebrating the semi-centennial of Negro Emancipation in 1913. He has in consequence written a letter to the Macon Telegraph and other Southern papers asking for the co-operation of the Southern people; otherwise he will take no steps in the matter. The fact that a million negroes living mostly in the South are materially and morally a hundred years in advance of any similar group of negroes elsewhere is as creditable, he says, to the white as to the negro. The masses of the negro people are better off in the South than elsewhere and the celebration should emphasize what the whites have done to uplift the negro in slavery and freedom as well as what he has done for himself, and also how both can best secure the same end in future.

The Charity Organization Society has issued its report for 1908-1909. It speaks of crowded tenements in the Bronx and Harlem and a lack of playgrounds for children who are thus compelled to use the streets. It recommends a general hospital in upper Manhattan and a broadening out of the work for the extirpation of tuberculosis. 8,172 needy families have been cared for during the year; more than 70,000 visits have been made, and nearly $85,000 dispersed in charity. More than 750,000 persons visited the International Tuberculosis Exhibit maintained by the Society and 3,000,000 leaflets were distributed. Dr. Edward T. Devine has established a National Labor Exchange.

The Sisters of Charity in Spain number 6,542. They conduct two hundred hospitals, twenty insane asylums, forty homes for foundlings, and two hundred and forty-eight homes for the aged and refugees for the young. They have 56,000 children in their pay schools, 15,591 in free schools and 880 in night schools. In addition, they have charge of some military hospitals and prisons.

The State Conference of Charities and Corrections has been in session at Albany. A resolution was adopted calling for the establishment of a farm colony for vagrants. A bill for this purpose was lost in the Senate Finance Committee at the last session of the Legislature.

The Board of Supervision of Monroe County have voted $75,000 for the erection of a tuberculosis hospital. The State Charities Aid Association is continuing its campaign of instruction in Western New York with great success.

ECONOMICS

The rice crop of the United States was over six hundred million pounds in 1908. Before 1885 it seldom reached one hundred million pounds and only twice before 1900 did it reach two hundred million. The imports during the last twenty years have ranged between one hundred million and two hundred million pounds a year and, despite the increased product, have been over two hundred million pounds yearly since 1906. The exports have averaged for the last three years less than thirty million pounds a year with a tendency to diminish. Hence domestic consumption is increasing even in excess of the increase of population. The States producing rice and their percentage of the crop of 1908 are as follows: Louisiana, 52.8; Texas, 41.8; South Carolina, 2.2; Arkansas, 2.1; Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi and North Carolina producing the remainder.

The liquid respirator, the invention of Mr. G. Claude, marks a telling advance in rescue work. The liquid is contained in a metal tank and efficiently sealed off with glass wool. A heat insulation insures an evaporation lasting some two to two and one-half hours. The oxygen supply is generous, the twelve litres of liquid oxygen being reduced in two hours to twelve hundred litres of gas, a rate of six hundred per hour, which is fully 80 per cent. in excess of the demand occasioned by hard manual labor.

The disagreeable and deleterious odors permeating public buildings where large numbers congregate are destined to be a thing of the past. They are to make room for the ozone lavishly supplied by a new ozone generator. The apparatus was successfully tested in the Chicago Public Library, and it was found that not only was the comfort of the readers and employees enhanced but all books, papers and periodicals on shelves and tables were fully sterilized.

The cotton exported during October reached the value of $88,883,350. Never before did the value of the export of a month reach $80,000,000. The value of cotton exported for ten months of 1909 was $328,526,885. The highest figures ever reached for the same period were $316,693,265 in 1907.

Official figures show that the American-built turbine engines, with which the new battleship North Dakota is equipped, require less fuel than the reciprocating type. At a speed of 19 knots the big ship will be able to cover 4,000 knots on a single coaling, while at a 21½ knot clip she will be able to cover 3,000 knots.

SCIENCE

Dr. Louise G. Robinovitch is reported to have revived, on November 18, before the New York Edison Co. directors, a cat and a dog that had been pronounced dead by competent physicians. The death and resuscitation were both effected by electricity. Both animals were declared dead after an electrical application of one minute. The cat was resuscitated in three minutes and the dog in five. The facts, if correctly reported, would show that the ordinary medical death-tests are not exhaustive and that judicious application of electricity can often restore animation when life is apparently extinct. The Edison company hope to find an effective way of reviving employees when apparently shocked to death in the discharge of their duties. Dr. Robinovitch, having restored a woman who was pronounced dead from the sudden deprivation of morphine, is confident that resuscitation can be effected in cases of shock other than electric.

Dr. Jonnesco, dean of Bucharest University, has been demonstrating in London the use of the new anesthetic, stovaine, which he had already used in 700 operations in Bucharest. On November 18 he removed a mass of tuberculous glands from a man's neck, using as sole anesthetic 3 centigrammes of stovaine and 5 of sulphate of strychnine, which he injected into the spinal column at the base of the neck three minutes before the operation commenced. The patient felt no pain and talked rationally throughout, and when the three-inch wound was bandaged, walked from the operating room unaided. Strychnine is employed in combination with stovaine to neutralize the depressing influence on the heart.

Prof. Timothy Leary, of Tufts Medical faculty, announces a new vaccine, called pneumonococcus, for the treatment of pneumonia. The statistics offered are rather encouraging. Of thirty-four unpromising patients twenty-eight answered the treatment whereas only two deaths occurred in forty-nine cases of ordinary pneumonia treated with the vaccine injection.

An instrument has been perfected by Mr. Stephen L. Field, a nephew of the Cyrus W. Field, of the first Atlantic cable fame, by means of which a quadruple message can be despatched over a single cable. The system has been installed over the cable reaching from Key West, Fla., to Havana, Cuba, and is meeting with success.

The National Forests in the United States and Alaska cover about 194,500,000 acres and the cost of their administration for the current fiscal year is $4,646,000.

The National Medical Academy of Mexico offers $7,500 in prizes for research work in typhus fever. Of this sum $5,000 will go to the discoverer of the cause of typhus or of a curative serum, and $2,500 to the students whose work is judged most useful towards such discovery. The competition is international and closes in February, 1911.

A conference of delegates, representing the leading governments of the world, has met in London for the purpose of considering the proposition of a common system of a map of the world. Col. Grant, director general of the British Ordnance Survey, was appointed chairman of the conference.

The Royal Society of England has awarded the Copley medal for research in astronomy to Prof. George W. Hill, of New York. Prof. Hill, as a mathematical astronomer, is not second even to the late Simon Newcomb.

The volcano Mt. Salores, which some two hundred years ago covered Garachico with lava, has broken forth again and threatened the safety of the Island of Teneriffe.

Photographs taken at the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, reveal the presence of three new minor planets in the neighborhood of Mars. They are of about the fifteenth magnitude.

PERSONAL

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the consecration of Pope Pius X was observed at the Vatican with great simplicity. The Holy Father celebrated Mass in his private chapel to which were admitted only his own sisters with whom he afterward breakfasted. He received many messages of congratulations and good wishes and gave audiences to Cardinal Mery del Val, the prelates of his household and several visiting bishops.

A movement has been started in California to erect a memorial to Peter Burnett, the first governor of that state. He became a convert to the Faith and later wrote the well-known book, "The Path Which Led a Protestant Lawyer to the Catholic Church." "Through him," says Brownson, "California has made a more glorious contribution to the Union than all the gold of her mines, for truth is more precious than gold; yea, than fine gold."

Press dispatches from Lima, Peru, state that while the Bishop of Cuzco was passing with his secretary through the streets in a carriage an anarchist threw a bomb at the vehicle. The bishop was killed instantly, and the secretary terribly injured. The murderer made an unsuccessful attempt at suicide before he was arrested.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Several events of general interest to Catholics have taken place during the past fortnight at the National Capital. Chief of these were the services commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the dedication of the Church of St. Aloysius, where the presence of the President of the United States, Mgr. Falconio, the Apostolic Delegate, and his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons made the occasion memorable. An account of the celebration with a summary of the speech of the President appeared in the last issue of AMERICA. The closing religious function of the jubilee took place on Monday, November 15, when the Right Rev. Owen B. Corrigan, D.D., Auxiliary Bishop of Baltimore, officiated at a solemn pontifical Mass of requiem for the deceased clergy, benefactors and members of the congregation. Mgr. James F. Mackin, rector of St. Paul's Church, Washington, D. C., delivered the sermon. The first imposing religious service held within the walls of St. Aloysius' was the dedication of the church, which took place on Sunday, Oct. 16, 1859, in the presence of President Buchanan, Senator Douglas and other notables. Thousands attended the ceremony. Archbishop Hughes, of New York, preached at the High Mass and Father James Ryder, S.J., a noted pulpit orator of the time, at the vesper service.

Announcement was made last month of the signal honor conferred upon the Very Rev. Lawrence F. Kearney, O.P., by the Elective Congregation of the Dominicans of this country, whose unanimous vote re-elected him for the third time to the office of Provincial of the Dominican Order in the United States when they met at the College of the Immaculate Conception, in Brookland, October 10. It was the first time in the history of the Dominican Order in this country that a priest was elected to the office for four successive terms. According to the constitution of the Dominican Order, re-election to the office of provincial is dependent upon a dispensation granted at the will of the Master General of the Dominicans. It very rarely happens that the necessary dispensation is granted for more than one re-election. Recent dispatches from Rome announce that the Master General will invite the Dominicans to make choice of another for the office of provincial for the ensuing term, and it is rumored that Father Kearney will be promoted to an important post of the Dominican Order that will afford a wider field for his abilities.

St. Anthony's Church, Youngstown, Ohio, which has an Italian congregation of which the Rev. Emmanuel Stabile is in charge, presents an example of zeal that is notable. A new building is in progress and sixty of the men who are bricklayers give a week's service each gratis. Father Stabile has a school in which there are now 110 children taught by four sisters. He was once a professor in a college in Florence, Italy, and forwarding his credentials to that effect to the minister of public instruction of government in Italy, he claimed assistance for his parish school under a clause of the Italian constitution that provides financial aid for any school in other lands in which the Italian language is taught. The answer was favorable and a yearly contribution is to be sent to him through official channels.

On the afternoon of November 16 the Holy Father received in private audience the Rt. Rev. Louis S. Walsh, Bishop of Portland, Me., who presented a report of his diocese and expressed himself as highly gratified that his audience should fall on the Holy Father's jubilee, thus enabling him to offer the greetings of the American Episcopacy. The Rev. John O'Dowd, of Portland, and the Rev. P. E. Bradley, of the Portland diocese accompany Bishop Walsh.

Archbishop Glennon has cordially approved of "Arbeiterwohl," the Catholic workingmen's organization recently started in St. Louis, Mo. "The laboring man," he says in his letter of approval, "will find in its guidance the sound principles of faith and duty applied to the social questions of the day; while his true rights as a man and as a Christian will be faithfully expounded and protected."

The rich collection of precious bronzes and silver work, sacred vestments and vessels included in the treasury of St. Peter's, Rome, was, on November 1, placed on public exhibition in a new apartment specially arranged for that purpose. Heretofore the collection has been secluded in a comparatively small room behind the sacristy. The new arrangement puts it in two halls of easy access to the public.

The Church of St. Leo, in this city, of which the late Father Ducey was pastor, will be made a home of perpetual adoration, and the rectory will be used as the home of the Sisters of Maria Reparatrice, an order of cloistered nuns who have recently arrived in this country from Rome

DRAMATIC NOTES.

"Strife."—The New Theatre.—The third production at the New Theatre is a play by John Galsworthy indicative of its title, depicting Capital and Labor with locked horns in dire conflict. Originally the scene of the play was laid in England, but to bring the subject matter home to American audiences, it has been transformed to an American environment. Six hours are supposed to be consumed in its action between the hours of noon and six in the afternoon of the seventh of February. A strike has been in progress for several months at the Ohio Tin Plate Mills in southeastern Ohio; the strikers have been reduced to the last extremity of distress and are facing actual starvation. Two extreme and antagonistic personalities dominate the situation, Mr. Anthony, president of the company on one side, David Roberts, leader of the strikers, on the other. Each believes he represents an invincible and necessary principle. The President, who has triumphantly conducted the company through four previous strikes, refuses to grant a jot or tittle of the men's demands, holding that to yield in the least would be to capitulate absolutely. He takes the ground that Capital must be the master dictator to Labor, the commander and not the follower whose first duty is to obey. In his view, to yield to a single point is but to open the way to further demands, which in the end would destroy Capital, put Labor in full possession and so wreck the economic and social order. David Roberts, a masterful and fanatic agitator, would sweep Capital entirely from the field, declares that it is simply an economic blood-sucking monster unjustly feeding itself fat and replete upon the body and soul of the laboring classes. His has been the dominating spirit throughout the strike and has held the men resolute in their resistance, even when the Union abandoned their cause on the ground that some of their demands were unreasonable.

When the play opens the men moved by the acute distress of their wives and children are beginning to waver, and the directors of the company, realizing the great loss sustained by the stockholders and the possible if not probable wrecking of the company, are inclined to compromise. Against all concessions on the part of the company the President obstinately holds out and against any yielding on the part of the men Roberts as stubbornly argues, whipping them into line by his fiery harangues and fanatical appeals. Better starve and die, he avers, than yield an inch; they are fighting the great and sacred cause of Labor and Humanity against the tyranny of Capital; and martyrdom, if necessary, in such a cause is glorious, the stepping stone to labor's final emancipation from the power which has so long held it in thrall. The issue of the struggle in spite of Anthony's obduracy and Robert's obstinacy, is a compromise on the very lines proposed at the opening of the conflict, the men yielding in part and the company conceding in part; the moral being as stated in a prefatory note to the play, "that it is only by mutual and fair-minded concession, that the enormous suffering and financial waste involved in such conflicts between capital and labor can be avoided."

The dramatic interest of "Strife" is very tense throughout, and the audience held in suspense as to the solution up to the moment before the curtain falls. In the characters of Anthony and Roberts two extremes meet, each actuated by a motive which from either's point of view seems an inviolable principle, and rather than yield which either is prepared to go down to destruction. Both are beaten—for both absolutely repudiate compromise—holding tenaciously to the justice of their bigoted stands even to the bitter end and through the humiliation of their overthrow. The theme is painful and the dramatic action without an iota of relief throughout. In this lies the chief defect of the play, for humor is as essential to drama as tears and intense emotion. The element of the comic in one or two minor characters is so slight as to be practically lost. The concluding speech of Harness, the Union representative, as the curtain falls, is flippant and rather a shock in view of the tragic result of the bitter struggle where human lives have been at stake. His comment on the result of the deadly antagonism between Roberts and Anthony, "that makes the fun of it," strikes a jarring discord and detracts lamentably from the dignity of the situation. It is needless to say that in the hands of The New Theatre Stock Company "Strife" finds an admirable interpretation. It is by no means a great play, and in some ways is not a satisfactory presentation of the subject. Its solution of the problem is inadequate and its moral built upon a sense of expediency rather than of justice. Nevertheless it is above the ordinary and presents its subject matter in a serious way, dramatically well put together and stimulative of much reflection upon a practical problem of the hour.

It gives me pleasure to tell you that I consider AMERICA the best edited paper we now have.—Rev. C. Waszke, Derby, Conn.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

In his address at the dedication of Loyola Academy, the first completed building of the new Jesuit University of Chicago, Archbishop Quigley presents a clear statement of the contentions of the Church regarding the present day educational work and of the position Catholics defend.

In prefacing his address Archbishop Quigley declared the Catholic Church had been in constant warfare with false doctrines since its inception. "And this fight has not ceased up to to-day," he said. "It has only changed in character. The church stands for the same thing—the truth—but her enemies have deserted their former positions. We are battling against a new learning now. Present day universities, outside the church, are teaching a learning denying the existence of God, the existence of any moral law, or any immortality of the soul, and of resurrection after death. This doctrine is gradually permeating down to the masses. It is weakening civilization and unless checked civilization will go and we shall become pagans again. If the world is to be saved it must be by the parochial schools and higher schools where learning and religion will be taught together and the truths of the Catholic church be given to the young. Governments have separated themselves from religion, but no man has the right to make laws to bind me and you unless he has authority from God. If he does they can never be enforced except by the police and the army. There is more respect in this country for the laws than in Europe, because the people here have a Christian conscience that respects the lawmakers as representatives of God."

The editor of the Louisville Courier Journal, himself one of the most respected members of the body he criticizes, does not mince words in telling the newspaper fraternity what he thinks of their tendency toward sensationalism. In an address to the members of the National Press Club of Washington, following a reception given in his honor on his return from his recent trip to Europe, Mr. Watterson had this to say regarding the personal relation of the newspaper toward the public:

"Pretending to be the especial defenders of liberty, we are becoming the invaders of private right. No household seems any longer safe against intrusion. Our reporters are being turned into detectives. As surely as this be not checked we shall grow to be the objects of fear and hatred instead of trust and respect. Some one ought to organize an intelligent and definite movement toward the bettering of what has reached alarming proportions. I say this in your interest as well as the interest of the public, and the profession, for I am sure that you are gentlemen and want to be considered so, whereas the work you are often set to do is the reverse of gentlemanly. "It subjects you to aversion and contempt—brings you and a high and mighty calling into disrepute—by confusing the purpose and functions of the newspaper with those of the police and the scavenger. I have been proud of that calling all my life, and when I go to my account I want to see a clean and honored flag flying from the masthead."

President Taft, speaking at the opening session in Washington, D. C., on November 11, of the Laymen's Missionary Conference for Missions to non-Catholics, paid another tribute to the work in the Philippines of the once much maligned friars.

"The Philippine Islands themselves," he said, "are an example of what ancient foreign missions could do. They are the only people, the only race, in the Orient that are Christians, and they were made so 300 years ago by the earnest effort of Augustinian and Franciscan friars. They led them on, taught them the agricultural arts and induced them to lead a peaceful and religious life. . . . And that which they wrought has been to our great advantage in working out the problem that we are set to there—the problem of teaching them self-government. They are a Christian people and they look to Europe and America for their ideals, and they recognize those ideals. And that makes it possible to instill in them the principles of civil liberty and the freedom of our institutions."

Longmans, Green and Co. advertise a little volume which will appeal to teachers alike by its simple elegance of make-up as by its clever sketching of certain homely truths which in the developments of current normal training are too frequently overlooked. "The Quick and the Dead" is written for teachers by "Two of them," and as it emanates from St. Mary's Hall, Mount Pleasant, Liverpool, we may presume that it is the work of teachers connected with the excellent Training School for Mistresses conducted there by the School Sisters of Notre Dame.

The suggestions made are not concerned with the talent or endowment of preparation in one who aims to qualify for the task of teaching; they presuppose that the teacher possesses the needful scholarship and consider only its impartment. They deal with such questions as charm of voice and manner, readiness as opposed to mere preparedness, mere mechanism in the classroom, and the enthusiasm that overcomes the drudgery that every teacher must face.

The pleasant style in which the homely truths the booklet teaches are presented will surely win it place in the esteem of those for whom it is intended.

The fourth annual exhibition of the books of the year in the galleries of the National Arts Club, Gramercy Park, closed this week. It was interesting mainly from the point of view of those who can afford luxuries in binding and are interested in book-plates. An attractive feature of the exhibition was the collection of the various editions of "The Catholic Encyclopedia." The sample volume of the Vatican Edition (three thousand dollars a set!) is, perhaps, the best example of rich modern book-binding in the galleries.

OBITUARY

Right Rev. Mgr. R. A. McAndrew, for twenty years rector of St. Mary's Church, Wilkes-Barre, Penn., died suddenly of heart disease on November 17. He was born in Wayne Co., Penn., in 1851. Only four weeks ago, on October 28, he was invested with the insignia of a domestic prelate.

The Rev. John B. Tabb, the poet-priest, died November 20 at St. Charles' College, Ellicott City, Md., where he had taught English for many years. He was born March 22, 1845, on his father's estate in Amelia County, Va., and was taught by private tutors. During the civil war he entered the Confederate service and became captain's clerk of the Robert E. Lee, one of the successful blockade runners, commanded by Lieut. Wilkinson. In June, 1864, he was captured and sent to Point Lookout where he remained a prisoner till the following February. After the conflict he studied music in Baltimore, later teaching at St. Paul's Episcopal school in that city, and at Racine College, Wisconsin. Becoming a Catholic in September, 1872, he entered St. Charles' College where he was graduated in 1875, and ordained in 1884. Ever since his senior year in 1874 Father Tabb was a member of the faculty of St. Charles' as instructor in English. Father Tabb was for many years a contributor of poems to the current magazines. He published "Lyrics," "An Octave to Mary," "Rules of English Grammar," "Poems Grave and Gay," "Two Lyrics" and "Quips and Quiddits." His brief verses, full of originality and often of humor, made him known to a large and appreciative class of readers. About eighteen months ago the poet-priest was stricken with blindness; in spite of this calamity he never lost his equanimity, nor that playfulness and joyousness of spirit that were his chief characteristics. The following stanzas on his blindness were written by him for the Atlantic Monthly, August, 1908.

"Back to the primal glories
Where life began,
As to my mother's womb
Must I a man
Return:

Not to be born again
But to remain;
And in the School of Darkness learn
What mean
'The things unseen.'"

The death of Richard Watson Gilder on November 18 removed an important figure from American literary life. Mr. Gilder was born at Bordentown, N. J., on February 8, 1844. In 1870 he came to New York and assumed the post of managing editor, under Dr. J. G. Holland, of Scribner's Monthly Magazine, which had just been started. On the death of Dr. Holland, Mr. Gilder was made editor-in-chief, and, when the name of the magazine was changed to The Century, continued to remain in charge up to the time of his demise.

Mr. Gilder belonged to the broad type of the literary man such as George William Curtis represented in his lifetime. His position as chairman of the Tenement House Commission under Governor Flower, his close political and personal friendship with Grover Cleveland, and the active interest manifested by the presence of his name among the officers of various organizations devoted to philanthropic, social and educational purposes, are indications of the wide extent of his interests outside the field of letters.

The late editor of The Century will probably be remembered longest for his poetry. He was a writer of graceful and musical verse and left the impression of intimacy with the refined amenities of life. But he never succeeded in capturing the popular favor or in giving that virile expression to universal themes which raises a poet from the ranks of the coterie into the cosmopolitan regions of genius.

The Rev. Dr. Michael Augustine McManus, rector of the Church of St. Aloysius, Newark, N. J., died at the church rectory on November 16. He was an earnest temperance worker and gave much time and effort to the Irish patriotic cause. Mr. McManus was born in Paterson. He was a member of the Diocesan examining board and of the Bishop's Council.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

THE FAITH IN ALBANIA.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA of July 3, 1909, I found the following statement: "She (Austria) is now meditating another happy coup . . . Austria is planning a central seminary in Scutari. . . ."

This was true more than fifty years ago, for we celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the "Collegium Pontificium Albaniense" on the 10th, 11th and 12th of October of the present year. All the archbishops and bishops of the seven dioceses of Albania (except the Bishop of Pùlati, who could not come) were present to honor the jubilee of the Central Seminary; four of them are pupils of this Seminary, and Mgr. Primus Dochi, the Abbot of the Miridites, was the second pupil who entered it in August, 1859. His Holiness Pius X, granted for this occasion a plenary indulgence to all the faithful who would visit the Seminary's Church during the triduum of festivities. Each day of the triduum a solemn Pontifical Mass was celebrated in the presence of the Albanian Episcopate, the Austrian Consul (who was delegated by the Austrian Minister of Foreign Affairs to officially represent him) and many former pupils of the Seminary who had come from all the dioceses of Albania.

In the sermons by the officiating bishops much was said about the good produced by this institution during these fifty years, and all expressed the sense of their warmest gratitude to the Holy See, who in 1853 at the request of the Bishop of Scutari, Mgr. Guglieturi, opened negotiations with the Austrian government for the foundation of a central seminary; to the Society of Jesus, to whose care it was entrusted, and to the Emperor of Austria, Francis Joseph I. For, it is due to His Majesty's vigorous action that the seminary after having been once reduced to ashes and again pulled down by the Mussulmans, could be rebuilt and reopened in 1859, the Emperor bearing two-thirds of the expense.

The Austrian government paid first for fifteen seminarists, then for twenty-four; but on this occasion the Minister of Foreign Affairs wired from Vienna that it will increase this number. Propaganda pays for ten pupils; the remaining eleven are paid for by their bishops. The seminary was built originally only for twenty-five seminarists, but it has long been evident that an enlargement is necessary. The Emperor of Austria gave this year 12,000 kronen for this purpose, promising the same amount for next year. His Holiness Pius X gave 10,000 francs. With this substantial help part of the building has been raised amidst all kind of difficulties from the Mussulmans. To finish it more money is wanted and I hope that some charitable soul across the Atlantic may be moved to help such a good work, in a country where all the blessings of true civilization can come only through the action of the Catholic clergy.

Scutari, (Albania), October 26, 1909.

CHARLES VILLAVICENCIO, S.J.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

AMERICA is really filling a long-felt want, to use a much-abused and over-done phrase. The Catholic cause here needed nothing so much as a weekly organ of this kind and class. I have been advertising AMERICA for the last three months and telling priests and others who are, or were reading such publications as the Literary Digest, that now they have no longer an excuse for subscribing to such things of so low a moral tenor and of so nondescript a general character. I look with impatience for every number and am delighted with every one. Some articles have given me so much pleasure that I should have to exhaust all the superlatives in my vocabulary to say one-half of what I felt when reading them. AMERICA is not merely high-class; it is "classic" and facile princeps in its class.—Rev. Father Walter, O. S. B., Beatty, Pa.

I believe it is the general opinion in St. Louis that AMERICA is at the top, yet each new issue is an improvement on the last. Of four lawyers in my suite, three are subscribers and constant readers of AMERICA. The fourth would be if he would take the time to peruse a copy. One of my friends, a journalist by profession, was not satisfied with the first number of AMERICA. But he kept in touch with the succeeding numbers, and now he is a subscriber and of the opinion above given. I must have every issue of AMERICA, as I expect to subscribe until my death. When I shall have bound the one hundredth volume of AMERICA, I shall be content to rest.—Alphonse E. Ganahl, St. Louis, Mo.

Put me down as a subscriber to your excellent Catholic paper, AMERICA. It is the very best I have yet seen, and it shows not only intellect, but good taste in its size and outline, whilst it is thoroughly Catholic. I hope it will always be as attractive as it now is. It is my beau ideal of what a Catholic paper should be. Wishing it every success.—Rev. Patrick Geraghty, P.P., Galway, Ireland.

Though a good friend of AMERICA, I have to confess that it does not go abreast with the culture of our present times. Indeed, it is our custom to print first, then to correct, and at last to think. AMERICA sticks too much to the principles of the dark ages, when people were used to think, and to print only after a careful correction.—Rev. Father Dereszewski, P.M., Pittsburgh, Pa.

No praise of ours can add to the centupled encomiums so justly bestowed on the thought and literature expressed in AMERICA; nevertheless it is opportune to say that the more we read its telling pages and hitting arguments, the more we wonder how the Catholic reading public did without it so long.—Sister St. Ignatius, Montreal.

On behalf of my wife, children and myself I send to AMERICA our sincere congratulations, and wish it every success, and I am sure nothing would tend more to make our home complete than the keeping of this most valuable and wholesome paper. I earnestly hope the day is not far from us when AMERICA will find its way into every Catholic home at least.—Hon. William J. Peach, Granite, Md.

I avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate you on the great success of your publication and to assure you that I eagerly look forward for each number of AMERICA, which I consider a very interesting and instructive reading for priests and seminarians.—V. Rev. J. Rainer, Rector, St. Francis, Wis.

Were I forced to curtail expenses, it would be absolutely the last that would be given up. I look for its coming with greater avidity than ever I had for any magazine, and each number only increases my admiration of it.—Rev. M. A. Dorney, Barrington, Ills.

I have been keeping an eye on the periodical from week to week; and now that you are entering upon the second volume, I want to tell you that in the language of your last editorial, you have compelled my support.—Rev. A. E. Drufner, Cincinnati, Ohio.

I am very much pleased with the contents of AMERICA, and hasten to encourage so worthy an enterprise by being a subscriber, and I trust a constant reader.—Rev. John P. Kehoe, Gananoque, Canada.

May God reward you and your people with prosperity and energy to follow the plan you have proposed in establishing AMERICA. Long may it live!—Rev. John Pujol, Oxnard, Cal.

I hope it will flourish and always keep its present high standard. I know nothing more needed to-day than just such a paper.—Mary E. Moran, Oakland, Cal.

CHRONICLE

Nicaragua.—The commanding officer of the Des Moines reports to the Navy Department that two gunboats of Estrada's revolutionary forces are maintaining an "effective blockade" off the Nicaraguan port of Greytown. It is further reported that the revolution is spreading and that the provisional government is extending its sway into the interior of the country. These facts have a bearing on the question whether the Government of the United States should accord the rights of belligerency to Estrada.——President Zelaya, in explanation of the execution of the Americans, Cannon and Groce, has declared that the men had openly allied themselves with the revolutionary forces and that when captured they were treated as any other revolutionists would have been treated. Judge Advocate-General Davis holds that forces engaged in insurrection within a State are entitled to belligerent rights when the insurrection has reached the stage of an organized rebellion.

The Alabama Elections.—A campaign of extreme bitterness came to an end on Monday when the voters of Alabama cast their ballots on the question of constitutional prohibition. The proposed amendment, which provides that "the manufacture, sale and keeping for sale of alcoholic and malt liquors and other intoxicating beverage shall be forever prohibited" in Alabama, was defeated. Both of the United States Senators and five of the nine Congressmen openly advocated the rejection of the amendment. Its adoption was championed by the Legislature, by various organizations, and by the Governor of the State. Though the amendment has failed, the State still has the distinction of possessing the most drastic of prohibition laws. The "amendists" circulated the Alcohol article in "The Catholic Encyclopedia" as a campaign document. The writer in summing up his views states: "Alcohol in health is often a curse," but the anti-amendists were able to finish the quotation with: "Alcohol in disease is mostly a blessing." As the amendment prohibited the use of alcoholic beverages in all cases except for sacramental purposes, the Encyclopedia article was claimed to be "a strong argument against the proposed amendment."

Indian Schools.—In the report of the Secretary of the Interior, Ballinger, a very interesting chapter is devoted to the consideration of Indian affairs. "My personal visitation to some of the non-reservation Indian schools," he says, "convinces me that certain of them should be abolished. It is my purpose to abandon at the end of this school year such of these schools as are not sufficiently promoting the public service, and where retained, in such instances as possible, to concentrate the energies of the department on the development of agricultural and industrial schools in order to give the Indian the means of learning how to support himself by farming and by the exercise of the simpler trades; and, for the Indian girls, a domestic training in harmony with the station they must naturally fill. The development of the district or day school should be the ultimate aim of the service; a school similar to the system in white communities throughout the country. It will be necessary to extend the system of day schools, each having its demonstration farm, to maintain instructors in hygiene, domestic science, and farming, and, in general, to guide the individual progress of these people. All governmental effort should be with the aim of fitting the Indian to manage his own affairs, and this is the pronounced policy of the department."

The Naval Academy.—Under a new regime of stricter discipline fewer midshipmen are to be graduated at the Naval Academy, Annapolis. For some years the number of graduates had to keep pace with the increase of the American warships. Now that these requirements have been met, a higher standard of discipline and instruction will be insisted on.

Forest Fires in New York.—The fire-fighting system inaugurated this year to check the forest fires in the Adirondack and Catskill Counties of New York State shows remarkable results. Over 250 fires have been reported with a total loss for each of the Sixteen Counties in the forest reserve approximating $1,618; last year the average loss for each county was $40,249. Observation stations and a paid fire-fighting force during the danger season are the chief factors in the new fire protective system.

Cook's Records.—The steamship United States sailed for Copenhagen having on board the secretary to Dr. Frederick A. Cook, Walter Lonsdale, who took with him the records and report by which the explorer hopes to substantiate his claim that he reached the North Pole. On reaching Denmark, the records will be immediately placed in the hands of the authorities of the University of Copenhagen, who are to pass upon them. The secretary expects that the university examining board will make public their opinion of the records by the first of the new year.

Porto Rico.—Cable communication between Porto Rico and the outside world was resumed on November 25 after an interruption of two weeks.—Antonio Gaudier, former Assistant Postmaster of Mayaguez, Porto Rico, was sentenced to three years in the penitentiary and fined $1,500 for embezzling postal funds.

Alaska.—A Federal board of experts has submitted a report on the preservation of the fur-seal fisheries of Alaska from threatened destruction. When Alaska was purchased by the United States 4,000,000 seals frequented the rookeries; now there are only 200,000 and the number is diminishing. England and the United States are bound by treaty not to kill the seal within certain limits and during the closed season. Fishermen of other nations have no such treaty and they are mainly responsible for the wanton destruction. The board of experts recommends that Japan be bound by treaty to prohibit its subjects from killing seals outside the three-mile limit and that an international agreement be entered into to protect the seals and other mammals of the sea that are becoming extinct.

British Columbia Elections.—The General Election in British Columbia on November 25 resulted in an overwhelming victory for Premier McBride and the Conservative party. Out of forty-two seats thirty-eight went straight Conservative. Only two of the remaining four were straight Liberal, and two Socialist. Five Socialist candidates in Vancouver lost their deposits, which implies that the number of votes they polled was very small. Besides the vote for members of the provincial legislature, the people were invited to vote for local prohibition of the liquor traffic under the form of a referendum. The votes cast were not sufficiently numerous to reach the necessary fifty per cent. of the total vote.

The Archbishop of Paris and the Bakers.—A cablegram of November 28 to the Courier des États-Unis of this city announces that Mgr. Amette, Archbishop of Paris, has intervened in favor of the men who work in bakeries. He protests against their being obliged to work at night. His Grace declares that the Church has a tender solicitude for the workingman and teaches the rich their duty to their less fortunate brethren. This intervention of Mgr. Amette in the labor question has produced quite a sensation. M. Bosquet, one of the leaders of the General Confederation of Labor, has invited the Archbishop to attend a meeting in the Labor Exchange (Bourse du Travail) and defend the interests of the journeymen bakers. This invitation has not caused less astonishment than the protestation of the Archbishop.

The King of Portugal in Paris.—Last Sunday King Manuel II of Portugal, who had arrived in Paris from London the previous day, went to hear Mass at La Madeleine, where thousands of Parisians cheered him on his arrival and departure from the church. The Government officials, who had welcomed the King to Paris, do not seem to have accompanied him to the church. In the evening His Majesty was cordially toasted at a banquet given in his honor by President Fallières at the Elysée. On Monday the presidential party took the young king to Versailles and in the evening to the Opera. On Tuesday the latter breakfasted with the President at the Château de Rambouillet, then joined in a great hunt, and afterward spent the evening at the Comédie Française. On Wednesday King Manuel visited the monuments of Paris, and lunched at the Portuguese Embassy, all of whose members were presented to His Majesty by the Count de Souza-Rosa, Portuguese Minister in Paris.

Great Britain.—At the second reading of the Budget in the House of Lords on November 27, Lord Lansdowne moved that "the House is not justified in giving consent to it until it has been submitted to the judgment of the country." As was foreseen, Lord Rosebery though disapproving of it utterly, did not wish to come into conflict with the House of Commons. He therefore recommended that it be allowed to pass, prophesying that the country would be weary of it in six months and at the next election would sweep its authors out of power. Lord Cromer, formerly financial administrator of Egypt, and Lord Balfour spoke in the same strain. The Archbishop of Canterbury recommended the bishops to abstain from taking part in the matter. The Bishop of Hereford expressed himself in such a way as to indicate that he would support the Government. On the Government side the Lord Chancellor denounced the motion of Lord Lansdowne as revolutionary. The position of the Unionists is that, while they do not pretend to a right to interfere with the recognized prerogative of the House of Commons to determine under ordinary circumstances the means of providing for the revenue, they are bound in the extraordinary circumstances which they claim now exist, when the Government has prepared a Budget on principles of taxation not only dangerous but hitherto unknown, to protect the right the country has to determine whether such principles are to be admitted or not. The whole question should therefore turn on whether these are what the Unionists assert they are, or not. A technical objection is also made that the Budget includes measures of legislation, as for example the taxation of unimproved land and the licensing clauses, equivalent to the Licensing Bill that had been rejected. The debate was concluded November 30, when Lord Lansdowne's motion was carried.—The death of one of the members for Portsmouth makes a by-election possible. Lord Charles is the Unionist candidate. This is a direct challenging of the Government's naval administration in the chief naval port of the Kingdom. The late member was a supporter of the Government, which would receive in the election of Lord Charles a severe blow. Many of the navy are supporting him. It is probable, however, that the contest will not take place, as the rejection of the Budget will bring on a general election. In either case Lord Charles is to stand for the constituency.—Lord Amphill brought up in the House of Lords the grievances of the Indians of South Africa but did not receive much encouragement from the Government.—King Manuel of Portugal has been received by the King with more than usual splendor.

Ireland.—Archbishop Walsh of Dublin, Chairman of the National University Board, has written a letter analyzing the parliamentary endowment of that institution. He shows that the claim of an additional grant of £82,000 to the Dublin, Cork and Galway universities is unfounded. The net additional endowment of all three is only £56,000, the difference of £26,000 having been cleverly withdrawn by an artifice of the Treasury. His Grace declares that the Dublin institution is miserably financed, "Cork is hard hit and Galway is bankrupt."—The Land Bill which has finally passed the Lords is deemed unsatisfactory, the principle of compulsory sale being the only redeeming feature. Some have attacked the Irish Party in this connection, but it is generally agreed that they made the best bargain possible. Mr. Redmond addressing a Dublin meeting, which ratified the party's attitude on Land Bill and Budget, declared that the Budget taxes on Ireland were £535,000, but that in four years they had saved to Ireland by grants and reductions £2,800,000. He admitted the Budget was unjust to Ireland. "There never was a just Budget to Ireland since the Union was carried, and never will be so long as we, a poor country, are tied in financial partnership to the richest in Europe. So long as we are compelled to share in England's wars and Dreadnoughts, every Budget must be unjust to Ireland. The only remedy is the separation of the financial interests of the two countries, that is, self-government for Ireland." In regard to the coming general election Mr. Redmond has cabled to Mr. T. P. O'Connor who has been working successfully for the Party's interests in the United States: "No such opportunity has been offered Ireland since Grattan moved the declaration of independence. . . . Convey to our friends in America our deepest gratitude for their sympathy and aid. If Irish Nationalists abroad and at home act unitedly in this supreme hour, victory is assured." Mr. Redmond also declared that the Irish Party will require "an official declaration from the Liberal leaders that Home Rule will be one of the issues" presented to the electorate. In Ireland the Nationalists expect to win every seat in Leinster, Munster and Connaught except Trinity College, and eighteen of the thirty-three Ulster constituencies. The Sinn Feiners have disbanded as a political party owing to lack of popular support.

Roman News.—The twenty-fifth anniversary of the Holy Father's consecration was celebrated November 16 by solemn High Mass in the Church of St. Apollinare where he was raised to the episcopate by Cardinal Parocchi. There was no formal celebration, nevertheless the German Emperor sent an autograph letter of congratulation. The municipality is preparing to celebrate in 1911 the fiftieth anniversary of the proclamation of Rome as the capital of Italy. To do this with what it considers fitting solemnity it contemplates ruining by additions Michelangelo's piazza and group of buildings on the Campidoglio. On the other hand it has resolved to complete the entrance to Santa Maria degli Angeli according to his plans. Mr. S. Walker O'Neill, Chamberlain of Cape and Sword, has given a handsome hall and library to the new Young Men's Club of St. Michael. It was opened on November 14.

Germany.—The recently chronicled victories of the Socialists in the elections of representatives of the Reichstag and Landtag in Saxony, Baden, Coburg and other provinces have been followed by notable successes in the municipal elections recently held in Elberfeld, Barmen, Elbink and Lübeck.—The Würtemberg Association of Manufacturers in its last meeting determined to appoint a commission to investigate the effect of the new Payne Tariff upon German export trade. The material gathered by the commission will be referred to the Government for use in its dealings with the United States regarding impending changes in the politico-commercial relations between Germany and the States.—Passing through Breslau Emperor William interrupted his journey in order to pay a visit to the Prince-Bishop, Cardinal Kopp in his episcopal residence.—The press has published the chief features of the naval estimates prepared for the annual budget to which reference was made last week. The shipbuilding and armament requirements are estimated at $60,875,000, an increase of $5,950,000 being necessitated by a final appropriation for three battleships and a cruiser now being built. The sum of $3,750,000, an increase of $1,250,000, is asked for submarine construction and experimental work. The expenditure for guns is estimated at approximately $19,000,000, an increase of $2,500,000.

Austria.—The conference between Emperor Francis Joseph and representatives of the Hungarian Cabinet, of which mention was made last week, failed to achieve the happy results generally expected. The political situation disturbing the dual kingdom was carefully gone over and the proposed concessions that were hoped would satisfy both Austrians and Hungarians were thoroughly considered. The representatives sitting in the conference could come to no conclusion and Dr. Wekerle, Count Audrassy and Francis Kossuth returned to Budapest to face the old situation. Since then, Kossuth, the present Minister of Commerce in the Hungarian Cabinet, has addressed an important word to a delegation of his constituents. He affirmed that he has ever been a firm believer in the need of an independent Bank of Hungary. An obstacle to its organization, he went on to say, lay in the veto-power of the King, and as this kingly prerogative was a constitutional right the obstacle seemed irremovable. However, he was of opinion that a recognition of his Majesty's veto in no manner signified a recognition of absolutism. As for himself, if he could not win the desired concessions from the Crown, he was determined to resign and attach himself to the Opposition.

Chile.—The Alsop case, which has been a source of irritation to the United States and Chile for upwards of twenty-five years, is on the eve of settlement by recourse through mutual agreement to the arbitration of the King of Great Britain. The Alsop Co. of New York and Connecticut advanced considerable sums to the Bolivian Government in 1874, receiving in return certain valuable concessions including a part of the customs duties collected at the port of Arica. Before the company had recouped itself the port and adjacent territory became, through the fortunes of war, a part of Chile. Although in 1885 Chile assumed the obligations of Bolivia to the Alsop Company, nothing has thus far been done towards satisfying the claim, which now amounts to $1,500,000.

Argentina.—To mark the centenary of Argentine independence, the Catholics of Irish blood contemplate the raising of a monument in honor of Almirante Guillermo Brown, an Irishman by birth, who took an active part in the public affairs of his adopted country. He was the first admiral of the Argentine navy.—On Sunday, October 10, the Most Rev. Archbishop of Buenos Aires blessed the corner-stone of the new Irish Girls' Home. On the initiative of Very Rev. Canon Anthony Fahey, the Home was opened half a century ago and placed in charge of Irish Sisters of Mercy, who still conduct it. The new building will be completely modern in all its appointments.

Colombia.—The Congress has refused a concession for the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Darien. The reasons given are the still undefined boundary between Colombia and Panama, the opposition of some of the Colombian States, and fear of the possible action of the United States. The plan in itself was considered feasible.

Various Countries.—Some sanguine politicians hoped that the introduction of the federal constitution in SOUTH AFRICA would bring about a readjustment of political parties in which the racial lines would gradually disappear. It seems that they must prepare for disappointment. The Boers in each colony are preparing to unite more closely than ever.—Fresh cases of cholera are reported in HOLLAND. The disease is occurring more frequently in Eastern Prussia.—The plague has broken out again in Guayaquil, ECUADOR; during the last two weeks of October there were sixty-six cases and twenty-three deaths. There has also been one death at Asuncion, Paraguay.—The President has appointed W. Cameron Forbes, Vice-Governor General of the PHILIPPINES, to succeed the retiring Governor-General, James Smith. The latter's resignation took effect on November 11.—In San Juan, PORTO RICO, before an audience which quite filled the Municipal Theatre, Col. G. R. Colton was formally inaugurated Governor of the island in succession to Regis H. Post. Bishop W. A. Jones, diocesan head of the Catholic Church in Porto Rico, made the invocation, and the oath of office was administered by Chief Justice Hernandez of the Supreme Court. The new Governor's inaugural address was favorably received. President Taft telegraphed his congratulations.—The Emperor of JAPAN bestowed the grand Cordón of the Rising Sun upon Field Marshal Lord Kitchener.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Making of the Northwest*

Given an interesting theme, it is not so hard to make an interesting book. Professor Lyman having chosen a most interesting theme, has given us a most interesting book. The history of the Columbia River is the history of the Hudson Bay Company in the West and of its triumph over its rival, the Northwest Fur Company. It is the history of the failure of John Jacob Astor's Pacific Fur Company, of American and English exploration, of the contest between England and the United States for the possession of the Oregon country, and of the incoming of the Americans, which settled somewhat earlier than otherwise would have been the case, that the land was to be no longer a preserve of fur-bearing beasts, but was to become the abode of men. It is the history of gold, of cattle, of grain, of fisheries; of the building of homes and the founding of cities in one of the fairest regions of the earth.

What the scenery of the Upper Columbia must be, one can easily conjecture, when he learns that after rising in British Columbia and flowing north for more than a hundred miles, the river breaks through one of the ridges of the Selkirks to turn abruptly southward and pass within forty miles of its source; that its first large tributary, the Kootenay, separated from it by another range of the Selkirks, follows an opposite course flowing southward past the source of the Columbia about three miles away, until it also forces a passage through the mountains and turns northward to join the greater river just before this crosses into the United States to roll through nearly a thousand miles to the sea. Thus in southwestern British Columbia there is an elliptical tract some one hundred and twenty miles long by forty wide, enclosed by these two rivers that flow, now north now south, in bewildering confusion, filling with their waters the narrow mountain valleys to form the Kootenay and Upper and Lower Arrow Lakes.

The writer saw Portland first in 1860. Then it was little better than a collection of shanties on the left bank of the Willamette. It is now on both banks of the river a city of more than one hundred thousand souls. Seattle was but a couple of rows of such shanties along the beach. Tacoma and Vancouver and the growing towns of the interior had then and for years afterwards, no existence.

When gold was discovered on the great northern bend of the Columbia in the early 'sixties, it took days to reach the district from New Westminster, the capital of British Columbia, traveling by steamer on the Fraser, by stage, by steamer on Shushwap Lake and by trail into the mining camps; while to the Southern Kootenay country the more convenient route was the more circuitous one taking sometimes three weeks for its accomplishment, by way of Puget Sound and the Lower Columbia to Portland, and thence by steamers up the Columbia to Kootenay Lake. To the dwellers on the coast those places now distant but one or two days' journey, were almost as remote as were to Bryant in the first years of his century

"The continuous woods

Where rolls the Oregon and hears no sound Save its own dashing."

All these things Professor Lyman tells with an enthusiasm worthy of his subject. He shows us the pioneers of the land, among them Burnett, afterwards first Governor of California, who closed a long life with a holy death, in San Francisco not so many years ago; and head and shoulders above them all, physically and morally, John McLaughlin, once supreme in it as Chief Factor of the Hudson Bay Company, a sufferer for conscience' sake, losing the Company's confidence for favor shown to the Americans, receiving from these ingratitude and even worse, and dying in obscurity and comparative poverty, while his more politic lieutenant, James Douglas, became Governor of British Columbia and a Knight Commander of the Bath.

Lastly the author tells of the commerce of the Columbia; of the growth of steam navigation from the days the Beaver, at whose launching in 1836, William IV himself presided, was the first, and for long the only steamer in the Pacific. We fear he mistakes in saying that she is still afloat. England preserves the Victory, Nelson's flagship at Trafalgar, a memorial of one of the greatest triumphs of war. New York did not preserve the Clermont, as a memorial of one of the greatest triumphs of peace, just as Glasgow did not preserve the Comet. And British Columbia, even less wise, cared nothing for the Beaver, the forerunner of the great steamships that plough its seas. Leased to the Admiralty, the little vessel was engaged for some years in the survey of British Columbian waters. Then she was sold and used as a tug until, cast away at the entrance to the port of Vancouver, she was allowed to go to pieces. Besides the Beaver, we meet once more in Professor Lyman's book the famous little 'Forty-nine, well known to every Big Bend and Kootenay miner, and we greet again the river captains, the Ainsworths, the Thompsons, the Reeds and many others who taught the men of the Fraser, the Skeena, the Stickeen and the Yukon the perilous art of navigating the fierce rapids of the turbulent rivers of the West. He tells us, too, of the fisheries of the lower river, of the grain fields in the Walla Walla and Palouse countries, of the orchards and cattle ranges of Kootenay, of the great mines of Rossland and Nelson and of all the growing towns, the things that have made the region of the Columbia what it is to-day and give the promise of all it is to be.

There are a few errors in the book. Thus a view said to be of Mount St. Helens, is clearly of Mount Hood. On the map at the end of the volume Lardo, at the head of Kootenay Lake, is called Lytton, and the real Lytton, on the Thompson close to its junction with the Fraser, is not shown. In the smaller map on the upper corner, the Dalles are called the Dallas. These are slight blemishes that do not detract from the merit of a most readable book. There are also one or two things displeasing to Catholics; for example, the remarks on the identification of the San José with the "Beeswax ship." As in his treatment of another matter Professor Lyman shows clearly his desire to avoid offence, we have no doubt that when we assure him that the use of candles in the Catholic Church is not for the purpose he supposes, he will take steps to modify this passage in the second edition we wish him most cordially.

The New Royalists in France

II.

We have seen in the preceding article, "France of To-day," AMERICA, Nov. 13, that the political future of France does not seem to be promised to the Plebiscitary Republic nor to the Empire, that is to say, to none of the régimes that might be the more or less legitimate heirs of the Revolution. If a political reaction does take place, it will act on lines diametrically opposed to the principles of the Contrat Social. In other words, this reaction will be a counter-revolution.

Many symptoms reveal, in the mental attitude of that French public which reads and thinks, a kind of growing disaffection toward the Revolutionary legend. It is well to know that for a long time a very powerful official prejudice had taken root, which consisted in confusing the cause of Science with that of the Revolution. In the universities of the French state, in the institutions of public instruction, the Revolution was justified, glorified. True, this cult, this Revolutionary idolatry, fostered in young minds, was more literary than scientific in character. The poets, particularly the Romantic poets, were those who encouraged this fetichism. Victor Hugo and Michelet, for instance, saw in the Revolutionary period a fertile subject suited to their impassioned rhetoric. After the last eye-witness had disappeared it was easy for them to describe Revolutionists as personages sometimes epic, sometimes idyllic, but inspiring sympathy always. It might even be said that this defence of Revolutionary men succeeded in creating not only the Republican state of mind but even the régime itself. Had not this influence of lyricism on public opinion manifested itself once before in favor of Napoleon III? It is artists such as Raffet and Rude; poets such as Beranger and Victor Hugo himself, who paved the way for Napoleon III by exalting the illusive memory of Napoleon I. Like the cult of the First Empire, the cult of the Revolution had a lyrical origin and was of a sentimental nature.

This false idealism, in the name of which not only were all the institutions of the Revolutionary period justified, but the excesses, the massacres and the follies as well, resulted in causing the men of 1793 to be looked upon as supermen to whom the ordinary rules of morality could not be applied.

This prepossession existed even among historians of repute and for a long time it kept honest minds from seeing men and facts of the Revolution as they really were. The reaction against the classical spirit thus manifested itself, beyond literature and art, in the domain of political realities. In this way official science became the government's ally and trained for it young generations enthusiastically docile.

However, a few years ago people began to discover that this exaggerated admiration was anything but scientific. Documents and men were studied more closely and consequently the worth of revolutionary ideas and principles was questioned. Economists such as Le Play, historians like Taine and Fustel de Coulanges, pointed out that a Revolutionary legend absolutely contrary to facts had developed and that the type of Revolutionaries such as they were known through the lyrical historians was purely conventional and imaginary. Taine especially furthered the cause of the counter-revolution. His chief work, "Les Origines de la France Contemporaine," was written on the morrow of the Commune, when he was still under the impression of the horror that overwhelmed him at this outbreak of demagoguery. Thoroughly honest-minded, he carefully sought in the Archives for the trace of every fact and every personage.

He revealed in their crude reality those whom he called the sacred crocodiles, those about whom it had been possible to convince the credulous public that they were philanthropists, that several of them had genius, that they devoured only the guilty ones and that if occasionally they devoured too much it was unwittingly, in spite of themselves, or else through self immolation sacrificing themselves for the public good. The influence of Taine's book was all the greater in that the writer was known as a thinker having laical tendencies, and even, as they would have said in the seventeenth century, having "libertine" tendencies. Thenceforward the Revolutionary cult began to lose a great many of its worshippers. The Republican régime, which appears as a derivative of Jacobin theories, fell under suspicion. The entire question was then to discover whether the vices and perils of this régime belonged to the very essence of every republican government or were only accidental. If the first hypothesis were adopted one became almost necessarily monarchic.

One of the first thinkers to draw this conclusion most powerfully was a young writer, M. Charles Maurras, who, in his "Enquête sur la Monarchie," (Paris, 1909. Nouvelle Librairie Nationale), gathered together the arguments which militated in favor of the monarchical idea. This very important work, conceived and written with a captivating vigor of logic, very soon became the manifesto of the young Royalist party. But this party, what was it in itself? At the time of the fruitless attempt at a Restoration in the years following the Franco-German war the Royalist party was, as we know, divided into partisans of the Bourbons and the Orleanists. The Comte de Chambord, as has been said in the preceding article, was too honest, too chivalrously loyal to his principles to submit to the tricolor flag which he looked upon as a sacrilegious legacy from the Revolution. On the other hand, the Orleanists did not seem to realize quickly enough the necessity of dynastical union and discipline. When they became reconciled with the legitimate branch it was already too late and the opportunity was lost. The monarchic doctrine sustained an irreparable loss in the Comte de Chambord, a personality superiorly armed for action and thought. But, in compensation, it gained considerable advantage by becoming incarnated in one and the same family, that of Orleans which, more yielding, more adapted to the concrete realities of a bourgeois epoch, was more likely, so it seemed, to suit the people. And in truth it does seem that with the coming of the son of the Comte de Paris, the young Duc d'Orleans, monarchical ideas gained in practical realism. To be enabled to judge of the personality of the present pretender the impartial historian must draw his inferences not from the Duke's actions (as an exile, action is forbidden him), but on what he says and on the action of those in whom he puts his trust. The document we alluded to above, "L'Enquête sur la Monarchie," gives us precise information on this point.

The most intimate friend, the confidant and the political representative in closest touch with the Duc d'Orleans, is M. André Buffet, a young man full of energy and moral courage, who saw himself condemned to exile a few years ago by the Higher Court for plotting against the safety of the States. M. Buffet has very clear ideas concerning the future monarchy, the expression of which we borrow from an interview he had with the author of "L'Enquête." (M. André Buffet has died since this article was written; but of course his views remain.—ED. AMERICA.) We learn through this report and through the personal observations of M. Charles Maurras that the conception of the monarchy has been greatly modified in the sense of political realism since the last Bourbons. Henceforward the notion of divine right is no longer the basic principle of the Royalist system. The Neo-Royalists wish to rest solely upon arguments altogether deduced from facts. Their quarrel with the Republican doctrine is its vague mysticism and the abstract nature of the notions upon which it is based. They look upon the monarchy as the political remedy necessary for France; to which, they say, the Republican régime is fatal. According to them, what constitutes the beneficial character of the monarchy is that it places itself above parties. M. Buffet says: "Among the truths which the Duc d'Orléans has, so to speak, found in his cradle, the one which is perhaps the dearest to him and which he received from the Comte de Paris who inherited it from the Comte de Chambord, can be summed up in this axiom: 'There is not, there must not be any Royalist party.'"

M. Buffet means by this that Royalism exists as an opinion, as a movement. The future King of France will have to oppose all factions as being so many obstacles to the unity of the country. But this very unity must be able to adapt itself to the broadest local and provincial liberties. Indeed, one of the principal features the monarchists point out in the régime to come is that it will be a decentralizer. The Republic, they claim, stifles every initiative, all vitality in the provincial groupings. It will be to the interest of the monarchy, on the contrary, to encourage both.

Another friend and confidant of the Duc d'Orleans, the Count of Lur-Saluces, says on this point: "The military order excepted, every grade of all the orders of hierarchy, political, administrative, judicial and civil, must be decentralized; that is, must carry with it a certain amount of liberty as to power, of authority as to the public, and of responsibility in regard to both."

The reorganization of the family is another pivot of the monarchic doctrine. In the present Republic the sovereign State does not allow individuals to make their last will and testament as they choose. Thus the father is dispossessed of his authority. Many fair-minded people consider the obligation of equal division of property as detrimental to the morality of the family. It does, in fact, hinder the father from recompensing or punishing his children. But there is one point especially upon which the monarchy will have no difficulty in granting more liberty than the Republic. Where education is concerned the régime of to-day has committed the gravest of sins by robbing the father of responsibility for the education of his children. Royalty will first have to give back to the head of the family the right corresponding to his charge as an educator. (Pierre Lhande, S.J. "Autour d'un Foyer Basque." Paris Nouvelle Librairie Nationale. In this work the author studies the disorganization which the Republican laws upon last wills has caused in Basque families.)

But one may wonder what guarantee the Monarchy will offer that it wishes to act and will act for the good of the country. Here comes a curious argument of the new Royalists. They claim, indeed, that the King and in general dynasties themselves by the very fact of seeking their own private interests serve at the same time the interests of the public. Thus, according to the Positivist formula which is claimed as their own by the modern Royalists, "personal impulses are enlisted in the service of social affections."

LOUIS CONS.

Christianity and Christian Socialism

(Conclusion.)

Churchliness is in the eyes of Christian Socialists the worst corruption of Christianity, far more ruinous than even dogmatism and sacramentalism. The Church, it is asserted in the first place, is not identical with Christianity, nor is it a divine, but merely a human, transitory institution. Rev. E. E. Carr in a review of Lafargue's "Philosophical Studies" remarks: "At the very beginning Lafargue makes the inexcusable error of identifying the Church, especially the Roman Church, with Christianity itself. This is both unscientific and unfair. (Christian Socialist, April 1, 1907.) Not long after the same reverend gentleman wrote: "Churches, like all other human institutions, rise and fall like the trees of the forest." (Christian Socialist, June 1, 1907.)

Professor Rauschenbusch tries to explain how the Church as an organization came into existence and developed by an essential change of Christianity. "The primitive churches set out with an organization as democratic and simply patriarchal as a Teutonic town meeting. By the beginning of the second century they were passing under the limited monarchy of a single bishop, and the limited monarchy tended to shake off all limitations and thrust down all competing forces. In ever widening areas monarchical organization grew up, and this tendency finally culminated in the absolutism of the papacy, in which all power flows from the head downward. The clergy became a hierarchy graded on monarchical principles. At the same time the laity were gradually ousted from all rights of election, and self-government, which they had originally possessed, was reduced to the helpless passivity of a subject population under a bureaucratic despotism. This slow revolution was due partly to ambition and lust for power inherent in human nature, but mainly to the assimilating influence of secular institutions." ("Christianity and the Social Crisis," pp. 190, 191.)

Such a Church organization was contrary to the spirit of Christ. "Jesus," says Professor Rauschenbusch, "had emphatically repudiated the principles on which political government is usually run: 'ye know that the rulers of the nations lord it over them. Not so shall it be among you.' But the Church duplicated in its organization the aristocracy and monarchy of the world, and therewith prepared a home for the despotic spirit within the edifice dedicated to democracy. (Ibid., pp. 191, 192.) In the same strain W. H. Watts writes in the Christian Socialist, Aug. 1, 1907: "Jesus knew that every brutal autocracy that has ever tyrannized humanity has been founded in hero worship. There is no place in his economy for King or Pope."

Thus fundamentally opposed to Christ, the Church, we are told, has never seriously accepted his life, nay she has obstructed, and utterly perverted Christianity.

First of all she has perverted morality. "Christian morality," says Professor Rauschenbusch, "finds its highest dignity and its constant corrective in making the kingdom of God the supreme aim to which all minor aims must contribute and from which they gain their moral value. The Church substituted herself for the kingdom of God and thereby put the advancement of a tangible and very human organization in the place of the moral uplifting of humanity. By that substitution the ethical plane of all actions was subtly but terribly lowered." "It (the Church), made its own organization the chief object of social service." "An action was good or bad mainly because the Church said so. It was good always if it served the Church, for the cause of the Church was the cause of God." Churchly correctness took precedence of Christlike goodness. If sin profited the Church, even sin might be holy."

The Church, he further explains, made herself the chief recipient and her clergy the chief beneficiaries of Christian giving; consumed the strength of the ablest men in building up her own power; put herself first in opposition to the State, and later on, when reconciled with it, turned the ablest and choicest spirits away from it to monastic life and ecclesiastical careers; used her influence chiefly for her own financial and political interests, and to further her own aggrandizement, made herself a servile tool of it in maintaining social conditions hurtful to the people; always tended to keep alive and active the despotic spirit of the decadent Roman civilization and even now is animated with an instinctive distrust of democracy. "Christianity and the Social Crisis," pp. 180-186.)

Professor Rauschenbusch, notwithstanding the serious nature of his accusations, seems quite moderate and orderly when compared with some Socialist writers who, carried away by the highest pitch of an apparently moral indignation, know no limits in condemning the perversity of the Church. W. H. Watts thunders against her as follows: "Because of the Church's treason against her Master, society has been compelled to attain the ultimate goal of human progress through the long and painful progress of economic evolution, and the story has been written in blood and fire and tears, and Socialism is to-day preaching that part of the message of Jesus which the Church has so shamefully neglected." "Christian Socialist," Sept. 1, 1907.)

Rev. H. Kutter, pastor of the Reformed Church in Zurich, Switzerland, hurls a still stronger condemnation against the Church in the following words: "What does the Church in its security care for the real meaning of the Gospel? Long since it turned that meaning into a harmless exercise of worship and it neither can nor will understand that the Gospel is diametrically opposed to the spirit of this world. . . . The spiritual power of the Gospel, now that the Church has belied its own purpose, is used only to keep the people submissive; and thus under the patronage of the Church, the paradox has actually come to pass that a power which was destined above all to bring about the downfall of the existing order has been turned into its chief defence, and that the Gospel of the kingdom has become the strongest bulwark against the kingdom—the good news of the living God has become the indispensable ally of his enemy Mammon.” The preceding passage has been quoted from the Christian Socialist, Jan. 15, 1908, in which extracts are given from Mr. Kutter’s “They Must: a Frank Word to Christian Men and Women,” which, in R. Week’s opinion, is the first book unqualifiedly to set forth the identification of Socialism and Christianity. The Swiss Pastor has on account of this recent literary production, both in America and in Europe, come to be regarded as one of the principal prophets of Christian Socialism.

If in conclusion we recall to mind what Christian Socialists have uttered against dogma, sacraments, asceticism, and the Church, we ought not to wonder that they term historical Christianity a failure and demand a thorough reformation of it, a new form of religion in keeping with modern thought. But we must wonder at the brazen hardihood with which the same men made a special edition of the Christian Socialist, Jan. 15, 1909, to feign kind and benevolent regards to Catholics, to tell them that they have nothing to fear for their faith, because Socialism has nothing to do with matters of religious belief, nay, to assure them that they may become members of the Fellowship and at the same time remain true to their religion and loyal to their Church. Indeed, it seems as if the writers of the Fellowship firmly believed that assent to divine revelation has extinguished even the last spark of intelligence in Catholic minds so as to make them unable to distinguish the plainest falsehood from the most evident truth. Church Spoliation in Mexico

III.

Since 1857 Mexico has been living under a constitution decreed “in the name of God and by the authority of the Mexican people” by an “Extraordinary Constituent Congress.” It was not submitted to a popular vote for rejection or adoption. As originally proclaimed, for it has been subjected to many amendments, Tit. I, Section I, Arts. 5 and 25 bear upon our subject, for by their provisions religious orders were not recognized nor permitted to establish themselves in the country, and ecclesiastical corporations were forbidden to acquire land beyond what was needed for buildings actually in use or to be used for religious exercises.

While the Constituent Congress was sitting, revolt was rife in Puebla, and the Puebla clergy, who were believed to favor it, were mulcted by the government in the sum of one million pesos. The formality of a trial was dispensed with. Ignacio Comonfort began his term of four years under the new Constitution on December 1, 1857, with Benito Juarez, elected President of the Supreme Court, standing next in succession should a vacancy occur. Two months later, the new President, after having first imprisoned and then released Juarez, fled the country and the Zapotec Indian ex-seminarian assumed the presidential office which he retained uninterruptedly until his death in office in 1872. Every day of the Juarez régime brought trial to the Church.

Juarez was at Guanajuato when he became President. Unable to enter the capital where his political opponents had set up Zuloaga as President and were making arrangements for another constitutional convention, he proceeded by way of Panama to Vera Cruz, which was wholly devoted to his party, and there established his government. The harshest decrees against the Church were promulgated at Vera Cruz. The first was dated July 12, 1859, and was sufficiently drastic, as some of its provisions will show:

“Art. 1.—All property of whatsoever kind or description hitherto administered by the secular or the regular clergy, under any title, hereby becomes the property of the nation,” which meant, of course, Juarez’s government.

“Art. 5.—Religious orders, confraternities, sodalities, brotherhoods . . . are hereby suppressed.

“Art. 6.—The foundation of new convents, sodalities, etc., is forbidden. The use in public of the habits or garb of the suppressed orders is likewise forbidden.

“Art. 12.—Books, printed matter, manuscripts, pictures, antiques, and other objects belonging to the suppressed religious communities will be turned over to the public museums and libraries.”

By Articles 14, 18, 19, and 20, the convents of nuns were permitted to continue with incomes fixed by the Governors of the States, all moneys above that sum being confiscated; but their novitiates were closed and further professions forbidden. By Article 23, all who directly or indirectly opposed the execution of the decree rendered themselves liable to expulsion from the country or to prosecution on a criminal charge of conspiracy.

At the auctions which followed this decree, foreigners, and especially Frenchmen, were the most active bidders. Of course, the prices realized were ridiculously small. The father of José Limantour, present secretary of finance, was one of the heaviest purchasers. For two years Juarez was busily employed in auctioning off Church property as fast and as far as his territorial jurisdiction permitted, for the decree could not be enforced where the authority of the rival President Zuloaga was recognized. Eleven days after the first decree, it was followed by a second, which declared that the only marriage recognized by law was that contracted before a civil officer. Eight days later, a third decree reserved to the government the exclusive administration and care of all cemeteries, burial vaults, and the like throughout the republic. The Church’s consecrated cemeteries were thus opened to all comers, Jew and Gentile alike. The last decree from Vera Cruz was on "freedom of worship." By one of its provisions, civil and military officers, and soldiers in military formation were forbidden to assist in any official or public character at any religious services. By another, a testator in drawing up his last will was inhibited from making his spiritual adviser his heir or legatee. This last article was so amplified under President Lerdo de Tejada in 1874 as to include not only the spiritual adviser but also any priest who had afforded the testator any kind of spiritual assistance, the priest's relations to the fourth degree of kindred, and the members of the priest's household. This is the law effective in Mexico to-day. President Buchanan took a lively interest in the success of Juarez. Military stores were obtained in quantity through Brownsville, Texas, for the Juarist troops, and the enlistment of Americans, winked at by Washington, went briskly on. D. P. S.

Principles of Education

The National Educational Association has recently sent out the Declaration of Principles adopted at the Forty-Seventh Annual Convention held at Denver. Almost at the same time the Catholic Educational Association in its Bulletin Vol. V, No. 4, gives a brief account of its Sixth Annual Meeting, held in Boston, and declares its principles. It is interesting and instructive to compare both. The attendance at the Denver meeting of the National Educational Association, it is officially stated, was about 3,000 less than the attendance at Cleveland the previous year. The number in attendance was 5,375, whereas it should have reached nearly 15,000. This was owing to the fact, it is believed, that formerly the railway officials accepted membership in the National Educational Association as a condition for obtaining reduced rates. An active campaign is being inaugurated to increase the active membership.

The reading of the declaration of principles leaves a great void in the mind of the intelligent observer. We were used to expect some reference to the necessity of religious education. The Denver Convention goes back to familiar statements:

"A free democracy cannot long continue without the assistance of a system of State-supported schools, administered by the chosen agents of the people and responsible to the people for its ideals, its conduct, and its results. This system of State-supported schools must include elementary schools, secondary schools, schools for the training of teachers and State Universities, schools for commerce and industries, as well as for the professions."

Our free schools must advance along the lines of educational democracy in the sense that they must provide equal educational opportunities for all. More numerous high schools, better and more numerous schools for training of teachers, a merit system for appointment and promotion of teachers are demanded, and effective promotion of physical education by the United States Bureau of Education is advocated. School buildings and all school equipment should be at the disposal of the people for community interests and social betterment. The consolidation of rural district schools is endorsed.

It is not evident to all thinking citizens that a system of State-supported schools is essential to the continuance of a free democracy; it is essential to a free democracy that culture, religion and schools be promoted, as provided for in almost all the constitutions of the States of the Union. This means freedom of education whilst the advocacy of the State-supported schools in all its degrees and departments finally and of necessity aims at State-Socialism in education. We wonder why the college is omitted in the enumeration of the different departments. By eminent educators the American college is considered the most important factor in education, because it is the proper link between secondary and university education. Is the college omitted because this department is more than any other conducted by private associations and the donations of private patrons? Or is the college omitted with the intention to eliminate this essential factor from the American system and to connect, as the phrase goes, the high-school directly with the State university?

"To offer equal educational opportunities for all" reminds us of the slogan of Socialists who advocate equal economic opportunities for all. How can equal educational opportunities be advocated for all when, as the Commissioner of Education for the State of New York has recently demonstrated, in the cities of the Empire State, not more than one-third of the children finish the elementary school, and less than one-half of them go beyond the fifth or sixth grades, a very small per cent. attend high school and about one per cent. of high school graduates go to college?

Number 5 of the "Declaration of Principles" probably most of all engenders doubt and misgiving. "The common schools of our country must recognize more fully than ever the necessity of training our youth for citizenship." If citizenship means honesty, integrity, industry; if it means respect for authority and obedience to the law; if it means the safeguarding of liberty of conscience and of religion; if it means, as it certainly does, the sacredness of the home, then it is imperative to base this citizenship on respect for the Lawgiver, and on honesty, love and fidelity which will stand trials and temptations; then it is imperative to inject a profounder principle, viz., religion, as advocated by former Conventions of the National Educational Association.

In No. 13 of the Cleveland resolutions a strong reference was made to a tendency among the children towards a disregard for constituted authority, a lack of respect for age and superior wisdom, a weak appreciation of the demands of duty, a disposition to follow pleasure and interest rather than obligation and order. This condition demands the earliest thought and action of our leaders of opinion and places important obligations upon school boards, superintendents and teachers. In this year's resolutions no solution of this most important task has been attempted.

The National Educational Association in resolution number 11 gives its hearty endorsement to the work of the National Bureau of Education, the Carnegie Foundation, the General Education Board, and all associations, institutions and organizations that are working to develop and promote the educational interests of the country. In these associations, institutions and organizations must be included by every fair-minded American the great system of Catholic parochial schools, colleges and universities as represented in the Catholic Educational Association. The account of the Boston meeting of the Catholic Educational Association makes interesting and inspiring reading. Before quoting their resolutions let us remember that the magnificent work of Catholic schools is carried on with much less expense than the public system, with heroic sacrifices on the part of the people who support it by their pennies, with a self-devotion that can be found only in religious orders, and based on the invincible rock of religion, which alone can make good citizens because religious principles are instilled and practised.

The Catholic colleges form a vital part in this system; in fact, the Catholic College Conference was the nucleus out of which the Catholic Educational Association evolved. Thus we see the great factor of the college, so important in bringing order out of the educational chaos, stand out most prominent. This is not diminished by the fact that the Catholic college embraces generally the preparatory or high school department, because the line of demarcation between high school department and collegiate department has been closely drawn by most Catholic colleges, and is often manifested by the local separation of academy and collegiate departments. The high school as distinct from the college is provided for in most of the larger cities by the present flourishing schools. In smaller cities the problem is still awaiting a solution. This problem is a weighty one, as the Catholic boys and girls are in need of a Catholic atmosphere more imperatively in the secondary schools than in the elementary grades.

The resolutions, six and seven, are clear, strong, full of conviction, and calculated to bring forth from the living fountain of truth, according to the zeal with which they are carried out, blessings innumerable for the individuals, families, communities, for State and Church, for time and eternity. The fatherly interest of the Holy Father, Pius X, in the welfare of his children, is accentuated and emphasized by the spiritual leaders, the archbishops and bishops of the country, assembled in the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, on the subject of secondary and higher education. To any one who understands the meaning of true education, the work of our Catholic schools, especially the work of the Catholic Educational Association, must be a matter of serious and practical consideration.

FRANCIS HEIERMANN, S.J.

"In Re Savonarola"

In November when the failing light and the nip of the air after sundown warn of coming winter, the Doctor prepares his hall accordingly. There is a huge fireplace in it with massive iron dogs designed to accommodate hickory logs of generous dimensions and an ample chimney opening behind the mantle. Half a dozen wicker chairs—no rockers on them, for the Doctor says rockers are only a trifle less unhealthy than chewing gum—substantially built so that one can tilt them on two legs if one wishes and some small teak-wood tables (with the centre of gravity low) and plenty of brass ash-bowls scattered around furnish all the material requisites for comfortable enjoyment of those blissful moments when one sips one's coffee and tastes the first delicious whiffs of the after-dinner smoke.

The Rector was of our party that Friday evening, and had been the recipient of a lecture by the Doctor during dinner on the vast importance to the Church of proper cooking in sacerdotal households. The Doctor gave it as his professional opinion that between bad cooking and church debts the average longevity of New York priests was fully ten years less than it should be, and reducing this to a mere matter of dollars and cents in seminary costs, it was a very serious thing.

He proposed that someone should found a "cooking order" to be known as "Daughters of Martha" to meet the exigencies of the case. In vain the Rector pointed out that after thirty years of parish work, including the building of a church, school and rectory, he had been able to dine with the Doctor and hold his own, too. "That one happens to have been endowed by one's Maker with the digestion of an ostrich is cause rather for humble thanksgiving than for denial of obvious facts," was the Doctor's comment and more statistics followed.

The Rector is perhaps five and fifty years of age, tall, spare, rosy-cheeked, bald, incurably optimistic, tolerant to the verge of absurdity, a Doctor of Divinity in course at Rome, and a ripe scholar who next to his Breviary knows and loves his Dante. If there be one thing he likes better than another it is to unloose the lingua Toscana upon occasion and it is a curious thing then to see the modern, practical New Yorker gradually merge in the polished Italian with twenty centuries of finesse and culture behind him as the soft liquids and sonorous vowels roll forth. I know no more of either Italian or music than may become a gentleman after a couple of decades of opera-going, but when the Rector spouts Dante it sounds to me like the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing a Beethoven symphony.

The Doctor, as he stretched himself in his chair, kicked back into the glowing mass of ashes a burning hickory brand had fallen from the dogs and a shower of sputtering, crackling sparks whirled up the chimney.

"Poi come nel percoter dei civechi arsi Surgono innumerabili faville."

declaimed the Rector lovingly. "One of Dante's many beautiful images. For the benefit of our young friend Prout, I will refer him to the 'Paradiso'—I forget the number of the canto, but it's where the gathering spirits form themselves into the eagle—they rise as innumerable sparks when burning brands are struck. 'It's a pretty conceit.' (It took me an hour's search next day to verify the reference.) He murmured more verses to himself as one who tastes a sweet morsel.

"It has been at times matter of much regret to me," he went on rather dreamily, "that Dante did not compose his immortal work two hundred years later, after Savonarola died. I would much like to have had his view of that matter."

"Well, Padre," said the Doctor with challenge in his voice, and elevating his feet to a neighboring chair, "there's not much doubt as to what he would have done with Savonarola—is there?"

"We are on debatable ground," said the Rector judiciously. "Nevertheless, salvis salvandis, I should say that, after a prolonged sojourn on the mount, it's a pity that humility is so seldom in the reformer. Yet how else than through pride is the Devil to trap such a man?"

"Padre," and the Doctor wriggled impatiently in his chair. "You can't make omelettes without breaking eggs. I'm not prepared exactly to call Savonarola a martyr, but some day when I'm through with my long Purgatory and get into Heaven, it won't surprise me a bit to find that he's got a palm stuck through his halo."

"I'll grant the halo," said the Rector, "but as to the palm—"

"You know your Italy better than I do, Padre," said the Doctor doggedly, "and I certainly won't pretend to dispute with you in the streets of Florence, but if you really want to know where he gets the palm from, in my opinion it's because he was killed for mixing religion with politics."

This was where I really commenced to be interested, for mixing religion and politics in talk is like stirring sugar and chlorate of potash with sulphur in a mortar—you never can tell when an explosion may come.

"'Tis an easy way to get killed," said the Rector with a chuckle. "I believe one might almost compass the palm nowadays by that road! But I don't think the indictment read quite like that, Doctor, did it?"

"Maybe not, Padre—maybe not. But the indictment was what the other fellows said. I'm thinking of what Savonarola said. Just wait a moment till I get a book and read you something!"

He returned with a portly tome from his shelves, found his place, levelled his pipe at the Rector as though it were a revolver and read defiantly and with emphasis as follows:

"Savonarola taught his congregation that every vote entailed a solemn responsibility: he amplified San Bernardino's warning that a single bean wrongly given might prove the ruin of the State. The elector, he preached, must have in view the glory of God, the welfare of the community, the honor of the State:"—here he laughed out loud a most ironical "Ho! Ho! did you ever hear such nonsense, Padre?" and resumed—"he ought not to nominate a candidate from private motives, nor reject one who has wronged him; a candidate should be both good and wise, but if the choice lie between a wise man and one who is good but foolish, the interest of the State required the former: no man should be elected to an office by way of charity: his poverty must not be relieved to the detriment of the public service: the elector should not from temper or persuasion vote against a candidate or throw his nomination paper on the ground, nor yet support any who had canvassed him, nor even give a party vote—"

By this time the Doctor's voice, which had been rising in tone and volume, ended almost in a roar as he banged the leaves together: "There you are, Padre!—'Cambridge Modern History'—Volume I, page 163. Any man who got killed on that platform in politics is entitled to a palm. Shocking medieval nonsense, isn't it?"

There was much bitterness in the question. The Rector was silent a moment as the Doctor reestablished himself in his chair and restarted his pipe.

"I see your idea, Doctor. It is curious that the very next generation should have produced a Machiavelli, isn't it, to teach that one could hardly be both a good Christian and a good citizen?"

"Come back to Savonarola, Padre—I like him better, and answer me a simple question. Is what he says about the vote true, or not?"

"Doctor, you know your Moral Theology about as well as I do and can solve your own cases for yourself."

"Well—how about it—Fra Girolamo?" There was a moment's pause before the Doctor thus named him and the smile with which he did so was grim, and showed the teeth.

"Ah, Doctor!" There was a little sadness in the Rector's tone. "I am no reformer. The sæva indignatio is not in my make-up. I am answerable for my sheep, such as they are—I fear me I shall suffer much on their account some day. I may love some, but I must drive none away. Do you take me?"

We sat silent a little space, the Doctor chewing hard on his pipe, and the Rector staring into the fire. Then was I moved to speech.

"Padre! Why must we Catholics alone keep our politics and our religion apart? Other denominations can mix them all they please."

"My son," said the Rector benignly. "It takes at least two things to make a mixture."

And then we talked of other matters.

New Era of Politics in Belgium

LOUVAIN, NOVEMBER 19, 1909.

By a series of most astonishing manoeuvres, the whole face of the situation in Belgium has been transformed. With one stroke the Premier has swept away the importance of all previous considerations, and the whole country feels that a new era of politics has begun—whether for weal or for woe the future alone can tell. Briefly, the situation is this: the entire Left, Socialist and Liberal, has declared for the Government's bill, demands the suppression of substitution, and promises, in return, to vote for the ecclesiastical immunities; the Premier has accepted their help and promised to vote the suppression of substitution. On the other hand, the majority of the Right is against the bill—the rest, the Young Right, stands with the Government and the Left; and the world has been treated to the unprecedented spectacle of a Ministry governing with the help of the enemies of its own party—and this in spite of the resistance of the majority of that party.

The process of arriving at this result—unlooked for, to say the least, was varied and devious. It will be recalled that my last letter ended with the Catholic party in the deepest dejection; there appeared little hope for the Catholics ever to come to an agreement over one project and none at all for the Government to pass its bill; the division in the Right was radical, even the Cabinet was divided; the quarrels among the Catholics were bitter and deep; no one was willing to yield; in short, the outlook was as dark as it could be. The Premier had looked to the Right for help and found nothing there to lean on—all was unstable and confused. Then came a gleam of hope. On November 12th the Liberals in a private meeting decided that their aim was simply to overturn the Catholics—but they unmasked their batteries too soon. An imprudent word in the House revealed their design, the Catholics took alarm and for the first time in three weeks there was hope of an understanding. Enmities were forgotten for the moment and there appeared every chance for victory. This state of affairs lasted up to the 16th.

On the 17th came the news that the Left was in utter rout, and the Catholics were jubilant. But at this moment disquieting rumors were set abroad that some of the Catholics were making advances to the Left. Then on the 18th the Socialists came to the rescue of the Left. They declared themselves ready to accept the Government's formula, "one son to a family," provided the service were reduced to fifteen months. This, of course, was a complete reversal of their former policy. The next morning the Liberals in their turn declared themselves ready to vote the law, provided substitution was suppressed. Then the blow fell. That afternoon was a history-making one for Belgium. First of all, the Left, through its mouthpieces, offered its help to the Government on the conditions named. Then M. Woeste called for an explanation from the Premier. M. Schollaert then rose in the midst of an expectant hush. He said he was ready to receive all help anyone would give him, and that now that the ecclesiastical immunities were secured, he saw no reason why substitution should be maintained and would vote for its suppression. At these words the Left and some few Catholics applauded loudly. This was the sign for bitter attacks on him by MM. Segers and Woeste. He answered in a reply that brought the whole House to its feet. Amendments were then proposed by some united Catholics and Liberals reducing the service to fifteen months, and forcing Religious to three months' training in the Military Hospitals.

The first impression of the country at large was one of stupefied astonishment. The press of the Left was unanimous in its support of the Premier—the same press that a week before had been calling down vengeance on the clerical murderers of Ferrer! From the confusion among the Catholics these three ideas stand out prominent: that it is not a victory for the Government, but one for personal military service, a pet project of the Left; that it was the death struggle of Young Right and Old Right, and that the Young Right has won; and lastly there is the accusation that the Premier has been unfaithful to his promise of governing with the Right.

To this it is logically answered that in the Right there was nothing to govern with, and besides that the Government has not gone over to the Left but that the Left has come to it—the suppression of substitution being a concession necessary to bring about an agreement. Other factors in the country's present state of mind, are the disappointment among the Government's enemies in the Catholic party (they even threaten to destroy the law's effectiveness by future votes); the puzzle as to what the Left really intends to do, for few can persuade themselves that it means well for the Government; and last of all, are the jubilant declarations of the Socialists that it is a victory for them. Many also fear that the effect on the elections of next year will be disastrous and that the Right will never recover from the blow they assert has been inflicted on it. This much is certain—a new policy has been inaugurated and the Premier's position grows more difficult every day, for the future action of the Old Right is an unknown quantity.

Nothing remained but to vote. This took place on the 17th and following days. The formula of the Government was voted by an overwhelming majority, twenty-five members of the Right voting with Left against fifty-four Catholics. The next day personal military service—suppression of substitution—was voted by the same majority; the ecclesiastical immunities were also voted with the above mentioned amendment. The general vote will follow in a day or so; it is almost sure to be the same as the preceding votes.

The French Bishops and the Education Question

NOVEMBER 18, 1909.

It was stated in a recent letter that one hundred thousand lay teachers, belonging to a federation called "les Amicales," had issued a manifesto, in which they summoned the bishops of France before the law courts of the country. They profess themselves insulted by the recent circular, signed by the bishops, and are resolved to obtain legal compensation for what they consider a personal insult. There was nothing in the bishops' temperate and carefully worded letter to justify this outburst of indignation, which is generally considered as an attempt to frighten, not the prelates but the parents of the children, whose interests are at stake. Cardinal Luçon, Archbishop of Reims, was the first to receive the summons; to a newspaper reporter, he professed himself to be "honored" by the attack: "I can but be proud of being summoned to defend the rights of the Church," he said. "We are all of us decided to act as we have done whenever it is necessary and the threats of the lay teachers will not hinder us from fulfilling a sacred duty." He added that, as citizens of a country that calls itself free, the bishops were legally justified in voicing their protestations; moreover they are the ministers, not of a sect, but of the religion that is professed by the majority of the French people.

That the bishops of France, no longer the paid servants of the State, are prepared to pursue the struggle, may be gathered from the way in which each one of them explains and comments on the letter, that they all of them signed. Far from seeking to diminish the gravity and importance of the question in hand, they lay stress upon its different aspects. Mgr. Marty, Bishop of Montauban, insists that Christian parents are bound, under pain of sin, to send their children to the Catholic, rather than to the lay or neutral schools, at whatever risk or inconvenience. He adds that the children themselves are forbidden, knowingly, to use the prohibited class books: "These children are weak and they may find themselves in presence of commands that are contrary to those of the Church, but they, too, like their parents, must obey God rather than men." Mgr. Guilibert, Bishop of Fréjus, sums up the matter and reminds his hearers that the parents and children who consciously infringe the law laid down by their pastors, are thereby excluded from the Sacraments, but he feels tenderly for the lambs of his flock and impresses upon his priests that no harsh measure must be taken against a child, without the matter having been referred to his personal decision. The Bishop of Grenoble is no less clear in his statements: "If I have to appear before a tribunal," he says, "I will defend myself and read before the court certain passages from the books that we have condemned, passages that attack the truths that it is my sacred duty to defend." This attitude of the French bishops has an encouraging and hopeful meaning: in it we may trace the excellent results of an iniquitous measure: the separation of the Church and State. However brutal and unfair the conduct of the Government may have been when it broke with the Holy See, its evil action brought moral liberty and freedom of speech to the bishops and priests of France.

That the books condemned by the prelates fully deserve their censure is admitted even by the Temps, a Protestant paper, which is generally favorable to the Government. In a carefully written article, it owns that the "Manuals," prohibited by the Episcopacy, are not neutral, that they have dangerous tendencies, philosophical and anti-religious, utterly unfit for children from ten to twelve years of age. They contain passages like the following: "If God exists, noble actions must be agreeable to Him. . . . and if He does not exist, the duty of man remains the same." . . . "Those who believe in the existence of God go to church because they love Him, but they might abstain from going to church and please Him all the same." In the list of the different religions, Free Thought and Atheism are mentioned with the rest; a stress is laid upon the wars of religion and not a word is said of the civilizing influence of Christianity. The duty of patriotism, devotion to one's country is replaced by "humanity," "respect for human life." One book says: "We admire conquerors and look upon them as great men: they were often great criminals, the shame of history and the curse of humanity." Military service is described as "painful and irksome." In the hands of children, who naturally take these doctrines in a literal sense, they are full of dangerous meaning and calculated to sap the foundations of religious belief, respect for authority and patriotism. If the existence of God is not actually denied it is represented as doubtful and "Free Thought" and "Atheism," are quoted among the forms of belief or rather of disbelief that are generally accepted.

A pathetic feature in the contest is the effort made by the peasants, in certain districts, to fall in, at whatever cost, with the commands of their pastors. It has been said, with some reason, that whereas in many French towns a religious revival is perceptible, in the country villages, on the contrary, indifference is fast gaining ground. Nevertheless, there are instances of the bishops' protest having touched the peasants' slumbering sense of right and wrong. At Notre Dame de l'Osier in Dauphiné, children who declined to use the prohibited volumes, were expelled from school, but their parents backed them up and declared that they should not be permitted to return till the volumes were withdrawn. At Mouthe, in the département du Doubs, the little girls got hold of the books and burnt them, the school mistress then wrote to the father of one of them and complained that a child called "Andrée" came to school unprovided with a certain manual: "Andrée no longer has the book," wrote back the father, "she is a baptized Catholic and therefore obliged to obey her religious chiefs, the bishops. The book you mention having been condemned by them, Andrée may no longer use it." At Preueygel, département de l'Ain, the evil books have been burnt by the children. At Thaon, in the Vosges, a little boy called Pierre Martin, prompted by his father, refused to copy his lesson out of one of the condemned volumes; he was, in consequence, expelled from school during three days; on the fourth day he returned and again upon his refusal, was expelled for six days; fifty other children having done the same the number of pupils has considerably decreased. Whereupon the clergy of the place have written a joint letter to the deputy, M. Ferry, requesting him to interfere in the matter. The pupils' parents are determined not to send them back until the books are withdrawn and it is neither just nor wise to force these poor children to leave school and lose the benefit of a free education, when a slight act of justice would reestablish peace. The perseverance of the Catholic inhabitants of Thaon will probably carry the day and insure the withdrawal of the prohibited school manuals.

At Chassigny, in Saône et Loire, the mothers of the pupils sent a deputation to the Government school mistress, begging her to withdraw the books; she listened to them with contempt and insolently declined to make any change, whereupon the indignant mothers of Chassigny took the books and burnt them. In the "Loire Inférieure," where the faith is firmly rooted, the pupils' parents having burnt the "History of France" by Calvet, one of the prohibited volumes, the angry school master dictated a page of the book and ordered the children to learn it by heart, but the peasants would not give in, they destroyed the page to prevent their children from learning their lesson. In the mountainous district of the Jura, the books have been burnt in several villages by the pupils or by their parents and one school mistress, who declared that the "History of France, by Calvet, was an admirable" work, was taken to task by her pupils' mothers, who, upon her refusal to lay the book aside, withdrew their daughters from the school.

"Junius," in the Echo de Paris, whose able comments on current events here attract much attention, aptly remarks that the Government teachers, when they rose in indignation against the bishops, really served the cause they professed to attack. Their violent partizanship of the incriminated volumes proved how utterly fallacious is the religious neutrality, which in 1882 was established by law. By attacking the bishops, they proclaimed the fact that they consider themselves free to teach Atheism and they thereby destroyed the fable of the neutral schools.

Who knows if this may not be the beginning of a better state of things? Those who, so far, believed in the neutrality of the Government schools cannot henceforth close their eyes to the fact that neutrality does not exist and that the children who attend these schools are, under pain of being expelled, obliged to learn irreligion. In a country that professes to be free, where "Liberty" is everywhere written on the walls, this discovery may rouse earnest and sincere minds to action. The general elections are drawing near and any revelation that contributes to enlighten public opinion is of value in view of the approaching struggle.

AN ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

IN MISSION FIELDS

Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishops Ryan and Farley as incorporators of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions in a circular letter to the hierarchy of the United States draw attention to the small number of Catholics in the Government's Indian service.

"Fully one-third of the Indians of the United States are Catholics," says the letter. "Despite this fact, only a very small percentage of the Government employees of the Indian service are Catholics, and, unfortunately, a still smaller percentage are practical Catholics. If we were represented in the Government Indian field work by our just quota, the condition of our Catholic Indians would be vastly improved. The Government is in no way responsible for the condition to which we refer, as the civil service takes no note whatever of the religion of those who present themselves for examination.

"There are many exemplary and competent Catholics who find it difficult to secure positions, and there is no reason why they, particularly the young, should not seek employment in Government Indian work.

"We, the incorporators of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, earnestly appeal to Catholics to enter this department of the Government service.

"We earnestly request all bishops to make this, our desire, known throughout the pulpits of their respective dioceses. It should be duly announced that those who desire to take the civil service examinations can obtain full information for guidance by applying to the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, 1326 New York Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C."

Father Joseph Bernard, S.J., is in charge of the most northern Catholic mission on American territory. It is Our Lady of Lourdes, at Mary's Igloo, on the Kusatrim River eighty miles north of Nome, Alaska, and was founded in the spring of 1907. He lives in a shack 16 x 14 feet in which the temperature is often 70 degrees below zero. The first year he was there his provisions were so scant that he sometimes had to eat seal meat. He says it "tastes like a piece of veal soaked in castor-oil. It must be fried with much pepper and salt and eaten quickly while one's courage lasts." He has a team of nine dogs for his sleigh, which he uses to visit the eight camps attached to his mission. One of these is 200 miles distant from Mary's Igloo. To some he goes once a month, to others twice a year. The mission thus far has been supported by French alms.

The Codification of the Canon Law

ROME, NOVEMBER 18, 1909.

In conformity with a transitory provision of the Lex Propria issued last year on the reform of the procedure in the Roman Curia, there have been published some regulations for the official acts of the sacred tribunal of the Rota. They consist of a long list of directions to be observed in the application of the Lex Propria in cases which come before that tribunal, and are the result of the experience of the past year. This is the first step in the actual codification of the Canon Law. Although issued by the authority of the Supreme Pontiff, these regulations are purely provisional and subject to the modifications that experience may warrant. Similar directions will soon appear for the guidance of the sacred congregations affected by the Lex Propria.

On the eve of the opening of the Italian Chambers, there is a renewal to a certain extent of the opposition to the present ministry, the opposition taking anti-clericalism as its platform. The anti-clerical demonstrations in favor of Ferrer were not sufficient, however, either to disturb very greatly the public peace or to bring much uneasiness to the ministry now in power. The anti-clericals are sure to fail, considering the political distribution in the present Chambers, the feeling prevalent among the people and the economic condition of the country.

After the solemn inauguration of the Biblical Institute, there has been the no less solemn opening of the new Dominican University, whose class-rooms are now ready for students. The rooms for the professors and students of the Order will be on one floor, and those for students not of the Order will be on another. These are rapidly approaching completion. In the meanwhile the Biblical Institute is progressing. It now has at its disposal a grand place for its library, which includes not only all that could be desired in the way of books but also a museum of objects for furthering biblical science.

Retreats for Army Recruits in Germany

A new phase of the retreat movement has manifested itself in Germany, the holding of retreats for the recruits of the German army just before they enter upon their period of military service. The first attempt was made in 1905 in Viersen in the northern part of the Rhine province, when fifty men made their appearance. In 1907 this number rose to 600. Nearly 200 had to be turned away for lack of room. The success of these retreats in strengthening the exercitants against the many temptations and moral dangers incident to barrack life was so exceptionally great that Mgr. Vollmar, the army bishop, recommended all parish priests to prepare the recruits from among their flocks in this or some similar way for their entrance into the army. As a result, in twelve different places in 1908 such retreats for recruits were held during August and September; at least fifteen retreats were given in Viersen alone. The movement is spreading and the results show once more the enormous power for good that lies in the Spiritual Exercises.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

And If——

A father walking with his little son stopped short, turned back a few steps, and looked through a gap in the hedge by the roadside. "What are you looking at?" asked the boy. "I thought the field was on fire," was the answer. "Who set it on fire?" "Nobody," replied the father; "it was not on fire." The boy was silent for a few moments, and then propounded this unanswerable question: "If it had been on fire, who do you think would have set fire to it?" The father was silent. Less wise than he the sad spinners of what they call rational biblical criticism waste their brief hours of life in attempting to answer questions as unanswerable and unprofitable. "If Christ did not really rise from the dead, but lives in the Church only by His spirit produced in it in some inexplicable way by such a conviction of that unreal resurrection as prompted the apostles to preach a gospel He never gave them, in a way He never dreamed of, how did they reach that conviction?"

Loisy, who is represented by the father in the true story just narrated, is ready with an answer. "Probably by means of visions, for they certainly believed that they had seen Him rise from the dead." "If so, were these visions objective or subjective?" A writer in the current Contemporary Review hints that the answer to this had better be deferred until the Society of Psychical Research, by which such phenomena are for the first time being scientifically investigated, gives its report. But the small boys of biblical criticism are in no mood to wait, and Loisy is ready with his answer: "Probably subjective." The problem has now taken this form: "If Christ did not rise from the dead; and if the existence claimed for Him be but the persistence in the Church of His spirit introduced by the apostles, who believed they had seen Him alive and thus were impelled to undertake the propagation of a religion He never taught them, in a way He never dreamed of; and if the persuasion that they had seen Him risen was brought about in the apostles by means of visions; and if these visions were only subjective, the result of self-suggestion, how are they to be explained?"

The writer in the Contemporary Review has no humor, otherwise he would not have suggested that after nearly two thousand years of existence, the Church might await the ending of those purblind mewlings which the Society of Psychical Research calls scientific investigations, to receive a clear knowledge of its own fundamental facts. He proposes the hideous question, in simpler terms, it is true, than we have done, and undertakes in all seriousness to answer it. After looking it over carefully his conclusion is that it is unanswerable, not on account of its infinite absurdity, for he seems to tolerate all its hypotheses except the last, but because the facts can not be explained by self-suggestion, and thus he seems to find himself in an impasse. Were the subject not so tremendous, one might adapt to it the history of the wise men of Gotham, and stir up laughter at the farcical situations to which the wisdom of the flesh has brought its followers. But for us who, face to face with the glorious reality of the Catholic Church, hold the only sane position, that of St. Paul, "If Christ be not risen then is our preaching vain and your faith is vain," the matter is one not of mirth, but of unspeakable lamentation.

The Spanish Arms in Morocco

In theory, Morocco is an autocracy whose sultan, dwelling in lofty seclusion, rules from his inland capital with absolute sway throughout his dominions. Practically, the sultanate in its fulness is hardly recognized beyond the capital or outside the palace, while on the frontiers, especially to the east and south, it amounts only to the shadow of a great name. The defective institution and administration of government in Morocco is the true cause of the present war. Certain Spanish subjects or other merchants under the protection of the Spanish flag obtained trade concessions from the chiefs who were the recognized local authorities at the time; but as these chiefs gave place to others, the concessions were ignored and certain acts of violence and pillage were committed on helpless civilians. Then Spain came to the defence of her subjects. Some years ago, when the Sultan of Zanzibar confessed his inability to punish his so-called subjects on the mainland for outrages perpetrated on certain German subjects, the home government took active measures which resulted in what is now called German East Africa.

In spite of the traditional and proverbial attachment of the Moor to his own ways and customs, he has gradually reached a stage when his needs and his likes are to be satisfied only by the foreigner at his gates. There is not one really national industry that fully meets the wants or whims of the people. The Moorish taste must be consulted as to shape and color, but foreign looms supply the country with silk, woolen, and cotton fabrics. Glassware and delf, manufactured in Europe in accordance with Moorish notions of the beautiful and artistic, are among the chief articles of import. Even the Moor's playing cards are made in Marseilles and brought to his door. In exchange for the manufactured articles brought to his coast by the Giaour, he offers wool, skins, ostrich feathers, and dates, goods demanding little or no skill in farming and manufacturing.

Fifty years ago, the ports of Barcelona and Cádiz shipped nearly all articles of foreign manufacture used in Morocco, but the enterprise of English, French, and German firms has made such inroads on the trade that Spain has fallen to the fourth place. The Spanish troops in thus vindicating treaty rights and protecting Spanish subjects in their persons and property are engaged in keeping for Spain the small portion of Moroccan trade still in her hands, with the object of obtaining, if possible, more favorable trade conditions for the future. Egypt has been rejuvenated by European intervention. A European Mayor of the Palace might bolster up the rickety throne of the Sultan of Morocco to the common advantage of both foreigners and Moroccans.

The World's Classics

We have had many collections of "best literature" and "world literature" and "the literature of all time" and "the best things from the best writers" and all the other taking titles in recent years. One of the most recent of them being extensively advertised at the present time is "The Best of the World's Classics," arranged under the editorial supervision of United States Senator Lodge of Massachusetts. Of course it is quite impossible to crowd the best things from the world's classics into ten not very large volumes. It would be too much to ask that all of our favorite passages should be found in such a collection. It is not too much, however, to ask that there should be some due proportion observed in the selections made, so that an entirely false idea of the value of the contributions to world literature of various nations and times should not be necessarily given to readers. Out of these ten volumes one is devoted to Greece, another to Rome, a third to France, a fourth to France, Germany, Italy and other countries, and the remaining six volumes to Great Britain and America. If this is to represent for the general reader the comparative value of these various national contributions to the best literature then the aforesaid g. r. will have an egregiously wrong notion as to value in world literature.

For instance, from Spanish literature there are only a few pages from Don Quixote. Italian literature is almost as meagrely represented. Instead of characteristic selections from great Italian and Spanish writers we have page after page of English that has no real place in world literature and is only of interest because these men happened to write in what is our mother tongue. Lowell thought that the Spanish dramatists did some of the greatest literary work that had ever been done in the world. The Germans, who would surely have the right to hold the balance of criticism in this matter, thought that Shakespeare apart, Spanish Dramatic Literature was the greatest in the modern world and deserved to be compared with the work of the great Greek dramatic poets. The American reader of collections such as this who thinks that he is getting in touch with genuine world literature is only having confirmed that peculiarly false impression now so commonly and so complacently held, that the only things worth while talking about in the world's history have been done in comparatively recent years and that the Anglo-Saxon is responsible for most of it. The sooner we get rid of this false impression and cultivate proper humility as to our real place in human accomplishment the better it will be for the rising generation.

After seeing the world-literature collection that goes under the name of Senator Lodge one is of course reminded of ex-President Eliot's famous book-list. The Bookman, in August, commenting on ex-President Eliot's selection, said: "No one apparently has fallen down in admiration and amazement at the acumen of Eliot. Indeed we should say that such a list as this goes far to justify the retirement of Dr. Eliot from the presidency of Harvard University. If he really thinks that the perusal of these books 'would give any man 'the essentials of a liberal education,' then his judgment and discretion must have become altogether too bizarre to be trusted in anything. Of course an intensely individualistic New Englander would naturally make a somewhat peculiar selection of volumes; but no one would expect him to put forth such an absolutely freakish and unrelated hodge-podge as this." We would not care to say anything quite so strenuous as this of Senator Lodge's selection of the best of the world's classics, the occasion would scarcely justify it. The fly is not worth breaking thus, but unless we are to get away from some of this quite intolerant absorption in ourselves there is very little hope of our securing any genuine breadth of scholarship in America or any popular recognition of universal values in human accomplishment.

A few papers and one prominent preacher in the South have raised indignant protest because Mr. Rockefeller has donated $1,000,000 and appointed a committee of eminent pathologists to eradicate the "hookworm" disease in Southern States. They argue that there can be no microbe of laziness where so much energy has been displayed in war and peace; but the more sensible people recognize the fact, though it is not as widespread as is generally supposed, and welcome the gift as facilitating the removal of a condition which, being pathological in its cause, is detrimental but not dishonorable.

For some time past there has been in California what is called "The Landmarks Club." Its object is to preserve from decay the buildings of the old Franciscan Missions. In itself nothing could be more laudable. A despatch from Los Angeles states that the Club is preparing to act more vigorously than it has up to the present. The despatch tells how Governor Gillett, the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Los Angeles, and President Jordan of Stanford University, are most interested in the work. Nothing is said of the Archbishop of San Francisco, of the Bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles, or of the heads of the Franciscan Order. We are a long way from California, but the zeal of those men for the mission buildings seems to us akin to the devotion of Protestants for a St. Francis, largely the creature of their own imagination. If they will insert in each restored building a plate telling when and by whom it was founded, when and by whom destroyed, and who is now enjoying its lands, and inscribe on its walls the story of the death of those that were driven from it, and the fate of its native Christians, they will do a real service. Otherwise it might be better to let the buildings crumble to dust and be lost with the memory of those that built them.

The well-known German writer on naval topics, Count Ernest Reventlov, has published an article in the Deutsche Tages-Zeitung which has aroused considerable feeling in Germany. He declares it to be the evident purpose of England, in case war should be declared against Germany, to shut up the North Sea passage. He claims, however, that such a proceeding would be opposed to the agreements entered into during the recent conference on naval warfare, and he adds that any attempt to close up the North Sea straits would call forth an immediate protest from the United States and other neutral powers.

The action of Richard K. Campbell, chief of the U. S. Naturalization Bureau, in not only opposing the naturalization of Syrians but in trying by underhand means to influence judges to the same effect, is contrary to American principles and common sense. Holding that Turks, Syrians and Arabs are not whites, Mr. Campbell has instructed the United States Attorney in New Orleans and several other districts not only to oppose the petitions of the Syrians for naturalization, but by private conversation to induce the judges to deny such petitions. Passing over this unconstitutional interference with the judiciary, one wonders at the official who puts Syrians in the same class with Malaysians and Hindus. "White" is a racial signification, and racially the Syrian is as purely Caucasian as most Europeans and more so than some, e. g., the Finns and Hungarians, who are not Caucasian at all. The Syrians among us are only technically Turks. They have left the Turkish Empire because they were persecuted by Turkey for their loyalty to their religion. Most of those to be met with in the Southern States are Catholics, the heirs of ten centuries of heroes and martyrs; and Southerners, who are particularly nice in matters of color, always recognize them as white.

A cablegram from Manila to his brother, Judge Hendrick, of this city, announces the death, on November 29, of the Right Rev. Thomas Augustine Hendrick, Bishop of Cebú, who is thus the second of the American prelates whose lives have been sacrificed for the propagation of the Faith in the Philippines. Bishop Hendrick, as the readers of AMERICA were informed some time ago, worn out by the exactions of the duties of his immense diocese, had been ill for some months and had obtained permission to return to the United States to recuperate, leaving his see in the hands of his recently consecrated auxiliary. The relief, it is now evident, came too late to be of material benefit.

Bishop Hendrick was born in Penn Yan, N. Y., October 29, 1849. He made his college course at St. John's, Fordham, and at Seton Hall, taking his academic degrees of A.B. and A.M. at the latter institution. He was ordained priest in 1873, and was sent to St. Mary's Church, Rochester. Thence he went to Charlotte, N. Y., and two years later became rector at Union Springs, N. Y., remaining there fourteen years, after which he was transferred in 1891 to St. Bridget's, Rochester.

In the reorganization of the Church in the Philippines he was appointed by the Holy See Bishop of Cebú and was consecrated in Rome by Cardinal Satolli on August 23, 1903. He took possession March 6, 1904, and labored there with great success in restoring order and discipline in his diocese, which has an estimated population of more than two million Catholics. The parishes average about 10,000 souls, and after the war suffered chiefly from lack of priests, which Bishop Hendrick in large measure supplied, securing the services of Franciscans, Jesuits and Redemptorists—the latter from Ireland. There are now 135 secular and 123 regular priests at work in the diocese. The Diocese of Cebú was created in 1595 and since then twenty-two bishops have governed it.

During his career in New York Bishop Hendrick was one of the best known and most influential men in the western part of the State. He was active in public and charitable work in Rochester and for three years previous to going to the Philippines, was a member of the Board of Regents of the State University. Two years ago, while en route to Rome and the London Eucharistic Congress, he paid a short visit to his relatives and old friends here.

LITERATURE

The Blindness of Dr. Gray, or The Final Law. By CANON SHEEHAN, D.D. New York, London, Bombay: Longmans, Green & Co.

Canon Sheehan, having fortunately overcome long ago what he calls "that dread or shyness of writing which seems to be the damnosa hereditas of the Irish priesthood," has painted in light and shade, chiefly in light, nearly every phase of Irish life with occasional glimpses of foreign fields. His latest book goes over the old ground spreading out in kaleidoscopic panorama the various layers of society—priest and people, gentry and peasant, doctors, nurses, lawyers, students, Catholic and Protestant, secular and religious—but the point of view is altogether new. The change that is passing over Ireland in a period of transition is strongly, perhaps too strongly emphasized, and the troubled and often troublesome farmers of Doonvaragh have not the easy good nature of the author's earlier creations. Dr. Gray is the antithesis of the lovable Daddy Dan, and Father Liston, though akin to the "New Curate" in literary tastes, has not his practical grasp on life. When he leaves the world for a monastery to pray and do penance for his people one feels he has done better than would have been expected of an Irishman who lacks the sense of humor. In fact this book is sparing of that delicate humor of which Dr. Sheehan has proven himself a master, though the Hamlet scene shows that he has not lost the power but chosen to repress it. It is a story of the conflict of minds and passions which exclude for the moment the laughter and by-play of life.

Dr. Gray is the storm-centre. The pastor of "the united parishes of Doonvagh, Lackagh and Athboy" (a pathetic designation indicating that depopulation had reduced three parishes to one) enters with "a hard, domineering disposition doubly annealed under the teaching of a rigorous theological system that approached as near to Jansenism as orthodoxy might." His disposition was by nature kindly, but he had reduced his heart-beats to a syllogism. He held that "the slightest infraction of the simplest decree of God or man had its condign retribution, and he met every appeal to pity with the one inflexible sentence: It is the Law!" This unbending despotism "amongst an easy-going and flexible population made him feared and almost hated" and, given land disputes and local factions, trouble was sure to follow.

An American niece complicates the situation. An Irish-American was the hero of "Glenanaar," and Miss O'Ferrall, of Chicago, is the heroine of "The Final Law." Dr. Gray had banished her mother, his favorite sister, for an innocent indiscretion of youth, and at a time when there is a revolt against him in his parish led by a turbulent farmer named Duggan, he bans his niece because after taking wise counsel she consents as a trained nurse to accompany a consumptive young man to South Africa. Devoted to theological study he is gradually growing blind and he had hoped that his dearly loved niece would be the eyes of his old age, but her hopes and his had to fall before inexorable Law: he denounces her to his parish and resigns his charge.

Meanwhile their pastor's defence of his enemy, Duggan, and other touching circumstances reveal to his people that under a stern exterior he concealed a noble nature and warm heart, and "they never knew him till they lost him." Dr. Gray makes a similar discovery. He finds he had blundered during life by "mistaking the lower laws which serve to bind society together for the higher law which sweetens and strengthens all human life," that the fruits of his ministry would have been greater had he taken more deeply to heart: "A new commandment I give unto you," and that he too "never knew his people till he lost them."

But many tokens of their love flow in upon him in his retirement. Duggan kneels repentant at his feet and, having reformed, is married happily, though an American is ruthlessly killed off to make it possible. His niece having sent her charge to Heaven and married another of her converts, returns to read to him his Greek and Latin tomes, but he directs her to the Gospel of St. John—"It is now my theology, philosophy and poetry to the end"—recognizing that the testament of Love is the Final Law, "the last word that has been uttered by Divine and human philosophy." And so the reconciliation is complete.

"The Blindness of Dr. Gray" is not as lovable as "My New Curate," nor as finely analytical as "Luke Delmege," nor as deep as "The Triumph of Failure," nor has it the simple pathos of "Glenanaar," but, in spite of certain limitations, it is the most comprehensive picture of modern Irish life that has been written in this generation. Those who blamed Dr. Sheehan for exposing the seamy side of Irish character in former books will have more excuse for condemning him now. He writes to teach and warn and guide, and up-build the character of his people, not to please sensitive critics. But while it is true that the characters he selects for portrayal exist in Ireland as he has portrayed him, it is also true that they are for the most part exceptions rather than types, though the average non-Irish reader would gather the contrary impression. But even so no Irishman need take umbrage. Faith and reverence and a sense of justice are shown to be ingrained in the Irish blood; passion may cloud them for a while but in the end they are uppermost.

Happily the plot is so constructed and developed that, once commenced, the story must be read line for line to the end, where all problems are satisfactorily solved in the final appraisal. This is perhaps the best tribute one can pay to Dr. Sheehan's skill as a story-writer. Not that the plot is flawless; the real and the fanciful do not always fit well together, and to many the fanciful will seem more plausible than the real. Dr. Gray's intervention to save Duggan seems superfluous; not even an Irish jury, which except in political cases is noted for severity, would condemn him on the evidence. One might ask why Canon Patrick Sheehan gives such names to his Irish priests as Gray, Liston, Letheby, Delmege—and be answered: What's in a name? They are true Irishmen every one. One wonders too that he allows a young lady, however prudent and virtuous, to travel as sole nurse with a young man on a distant voyage, when trained male nurses could be easily procured in Dublin.

These are the afterthoughts of calm reflection but, while under the writer's thrall, one's sympathies follow as he leads. What he has said of Matthew Arnold is truer of himself. "He held his own art in reverence. He set out with a determination of saying nothing that would not benefit his race; of writing not one word that could be regarded as a blemish on his art." But art is the least of Canon Sheehan's merits. His sympathetic knowledge of the moods of nature and the human heart enable him to reach sublimities and fathom depths of emotion that were beyond Matthew Arnold's compass. It would be difficult to name another author who could write his third chapter, "The Accompaniment"—the old woman of ninety, blind, crippled and illiterate, accompanying the priest aloud as he says Mass in her little cabin, chanting in Gaelic, "which seems to have been formed to make prayer into poetry and poetry into prayer," a rhapsody of praise to the King of Kings, each wave of prayer ending with the refrain:

"The Love of my heart is Thy Heart, O Saviour dear, My treasure untold is to hold Thy heart in my fond heart
here;
For ah! it is known that Thine own overflows with true love for me
Then within the love-locked door of Thy Heart's inmost core Let my Heart ever guarded be!"

This and many another scene and incident recall a saying in "Luke Delmege": "Wherever you turn in Ireland you are bolt upright against God." It is at such a turn that "The Final Law" leaves Dr. Gray and his parishioners, and also their sympathetic and masterful chronicler. M. K.

Some Papers of Lord Arundell of Wardour, with a preface by the DOWAGER LADY ARUNDELL of Warbour. London, New York, etc.: Longmans, Green & Co.

The writer of the Acts of the Apostles found the Athenians unchanged in one respect from the time of Demosthenes. Inspired historian and pagan statesman both saw in their constant hunger to hear something new, a sign of weakness. We have our Athenians to-day who hold this trait to be a mask of strength. It is most unlikely that these will take up this volume; but should they do so they will immediately throw it down in contempt. It is old-fashioned, out of date. It contains nothing new. For the sober-minded this is just its value. It shows us the plain man of sound sense and transparent honesty taking practical views of politics; the nobleman keenly jealous of his rights and profoundly impressed with his consequent obligations; the Catholic free from all human respect, ready to defend the rights of the Church and of the Holy See, not only in sympathetic meetings, but also in Parliament where he could count his supporters on his fingers and saw against him statesmen, who had made the spoliation of the sovereign pontiff possible by their encouragement and support of his enemies. It is therefore a book for the ordinary man, conscious of his obligations as a Christian and as a citizen, to ponder over.

The Evolution of the Atmosphere as a Proof of Design in Creation, by JOHN PHIN. New York: The Industrial Publication Company.

Though the various theories of Evolution were primarily intended by materialists as an explanation of the origin and development of organic life only, they have of late also been urged to account for certain changes which take place or have taken place in inorganic substances. The author of this book shows the absurdity of trying to account for our atmosphere in any other way than by Creation. The physical and chemical constitution of the atmosphere offers an absolute proof of design which stands unaffected by any theory of Evolution. There can be no struggle for existence between oxygen and nitrogen. No instance of the survival of the fittest can be pointed out among the different elements which compose the air we breathe. There has been no series of experiments and no competition among innumerable atmospheres to determine which should envelop the earth and provide conditions necessary for the maintenance of life such as it exists to-day on the earth and has existed in past ages.

The author proves by arguments which are within the comprehension of anyone who has had a high school education, that the chances against such an arrangement as is found in our atmosphere having been brought about without intelligent design, are "as ten millions to one." He shows by an application of the mathematical "Theory of Probability" the absurdity of attributing the relative proportion of the chemical elements in the atmosphere to mere "blind chance" or to a "monistic mechanical process," as Haeckel would have it in one of his latest works, "The Riddle of the Universe."

It is surprising that in the work under consideration not even as much as a passing reference should have been made to any of the great churchmen who have written so ably in defence of this thesis. Moreover, in the author's opinion, many of our modern materialists are prompted to oppose Christianity by a "mere hatred of ecclesiasticism or priestcraft." (p. 180). To show the unreasonableness of such a hatred he says: "It is no opprobrium to theology, that avaricious prelates and bigoted priests have used their powers in unjust and cruel ways, and have committed acts at which enlightened humanity shudders" (p. 186). As "frightful illustrations of such terrible ordeals" through which humanity has passed, he cites the fires of Moloch and "the atrocities of the Middle Ages." The meaning of these insinuations is evident. They are altogether uncalled for, and the author can hardly expect "enlightened" and fair-minded readers to sanction his prejudice by recommending his work.

J. S. D.

A Primary History, Stories of Heroism, by WILLIAM H. MACE, Professor of History in Syracuse University. New York: Rand, McNally & Co.

Good books for children are as rare as books for children are abundant. Some juveniles picture to us youngsters so full of impish pranks in all winds and weathers, that if another chapter were added it would necessarily be on the demise of the heroes from physical exhaustion; others are so full of senseless drivel that they are enough to superinduce in the child an attack of salivation. And after all, they are mere story books, products of an imagination too often out of connection with the fly wheel of sober sense. But here we have a child's book with large, clear print and an abundance of attractive cuts, which sets forth the history of our country in plain words and simple sentences. The story moreover introduces the young reader to those great men who made and preserved the republic. Where there is so much to commend, it may seem over nice to object to a "viking or chief of the Northmen," (p. 2) when the least of those marauders was as much a viking as his robber chief. Soldiers and sailors and statesmen and explorers give variety enough for any boy's fancy. A real story book is here offered to the American child, a story book full of thrilling adventures, everyone of which inculcates patriotism by giving the young reader a better knowledge of his native land. A copious bibliography, suited to the youthful mind, invites to a fuller knowledge of the leading characters and the chief events.

Gradualbuch herausgegeben von DR. KARL WEINMANN. Ratisbon and New York: Fr. Pustet and Co.

This publication merits the attention of our choirmasters; not only as a judicious and very serviceable abridgment of the Vatican "Graduale," but more especially as employing a form of musical notation that ingeniously combines the advantages of the ancient and modern systems, and thus offers an interesting solution of an old and vexing problem. The difficulty experienced by most of our singers in reading plain chant arises not so much from the ancient note-forms, as from the four-line staff and the strange clefs it employs. On the other hand, our modern note-forms are acknowledged as essentially inadequate to express the real value of the ancient neums; hence their use in transcribing plain chant can never give full satisfaction. Dr. Weinmann has hit upon a happy mean. While discarding what is unessential, he has rightly retained the note-forms of plain chant, but has arranged them in convenient transposition on the familiar five line staff and in the familiar treble clef of modern music.

The practical limitations of ordinary choirs have furthermore determined the editor to substitute a simple form of recitative for the extremely florid melodies of the Graduals and Tracts. The full text of these chants is furnished in its proper place, and an easy method of reciting the same is outlined in an accompanying leaflet. Lastly, an interlinear translation of all the texts, titles, and rubrical directions gives effective aid towards an intelligent rendering of the liturgical chants and a fuller appreciation of their beauties. The language of Dr. Weinmann's book is German. We hope soon to see its English counterpart prepared for publication and used as a standard epitome of the Vatican "Graduale."

A Round of Rimes, by DENIS A. MCCARTHY. Boston: Little, Brown and Co.

Not only does "the Celt tread on the grave of the Puritan," he also treads with rhythmic feet the Puritan's literary paths. And he flourishes especially in Boston. There Boyle O'Reilly and Jeffrey Roche grew great in song, and now Denis McCarthy brings his Irish thrush from the banks of the Suir to warble by the Charles river. The New England climate has not dulled or thinned his note; he is nearer and truer to the old land than his more ambitious predecessors. His "Round of Rimes" compasses almost everything in nature and grace; he sings the green fields and the flowing river, the Mass bell and the Virgin Pure, but his song has freest tilt when his thoughts are in Erin:

"But, alas, the Irish mind of me
(I hope 'tis not unkind of me)

Is turnin' back with yearnin'
To the fields of Ballyclare,
For all the time the heart of me,
The better, sweeter part, of me
Was sobbin' for the robin
In the fields of Ballyclare."

In this mood he conjures "his little Irish thrush

To hush and sing no more:
My heart is full, my eyes are running o'er
Because your song
Recalls old days I thought were buried long."

But he was then troubled by one who "Though just like a queen she carries the head of her,
Just like a queen in the pose and the tread of her,"

was also "proud, stately and cold."

Yet another consoles him:

"She's not a queen, no, but she's got a way with her,
She has the mildness and sweetness of
May with her—
Sure 'tis a wife a man wants, not a queen!"

Doubtless he found her where "The blue of Irish skies is the hue of Irish eyes

And love dreams cluster and cling Round the heart and round the brain, half of pleasure, half of pain.

Ah, sweet is Tipperary in the spring!"

Probably under such inspiration he wrote
"A Song for the Flag," the best expression of the loyalty of the various races it covers that has yet been written:

"Here is our love to you, flag of the free and flag of the tried and true;
Here is our love to your streaming stripes and your stars in a field of blue;
Native or foreign, we're children all of the land over which you fly,

And native or foreign we love the land for which it is sweet to die."

Mr. McCarthy has prospered under the flag, but still

"What's the good of gold and glory when your life is dull and gray
And you're sighing for a valley far away!"

A "Round of Rimes" is pressed from the heart of Ireland with more than the art of Boston. M. K.

The Prison Ships and Other Poems.

By THOMAS WALSH. Boston: Sherman,
French and Company. Price, $1.00.

Our first instinct is to welcome this dainty volume in blue and white because it is the work of a Catholic writer. Mr. Walsh's name has become familiar by its frequent appearance in connection with meritorious verses in the best American magazines. Literary proficiency is not such a drug on the market among American Catholics that we can afford to ignore its triumphs, and we have always looked upon Mr. Walsh's success, such as it has been, with sympathy and satisfaction.

The present collection of poems—which,
if we are not mistaken, is the first to be published by the poet—takes its title from the opening ode read at the dedicatory exercises of the Prison-ship Martyrs' Monument in Brooklyn during November of last year. More than sixty poems, mostly lyrical, follow in a bright succession, touching on various themes and inspired,
some of them, by magical old-world places which the author has evidently visited and loved. The workmanship of the verses is careful and shows a sense of fine artistic values.

Poems. By "EVA OF THE NATION."
Dublin: M. H. Gill and Son.

"Eva," as Justin McCarthy well says in his preface to this little volume, "might be said to have been left a bequest to the care and protection of the Irish people," being a "living symbol of Ireland's noblest characteristics in poetical imagination and patriotic zeal." Through The Nation she thrilled her countrymen half a century ago; the thrill is still felt in these Poems, while her growth in power and breadth of view gives them a wider appeal. "Eva" is now the widow of another distinguished patriot of '48, Kevin Izod O'Doherty, and her friends have brought out the present edition so as "to make sure that her declining years shall be surrounded with such comfort and security as national gratitude shall offer." The collection deserves a wide circulation on its own merits.

The Unbidden Guest. By FRANCES
COOKE. New York: Benziger Brothers.

This is a well told story of love, religion and finance. The plot and the treatment are simple and direct, leaving the reader in no doubt as to where he should place his sympathies. The hero and heroine are perfect and the villains are equally thorough; but they are vividly and consistently drawn and the moral incidental to the story is excellent. Its 255 pages are handsomer bound, but $1.25 seems too high a price.

There is a popular delusion that all
Elzevirs are pearls of great price. Mr.
Andrew Lang states that the good Elzevirs do not begin till 1626, for it was in 1625 that Bonaventure Elzevir and Abraham, his nephew, went into partnership. However "no book can be wholly uninteresting," says the Boston Transcript, "that bears on its title page any of the phrases or symbols that indicate the work of the famous family of printers who reproduced the classic writers and pirated contemporary ones for a hundred years."

EDUCATION

During the last season football claimed a toll of 33 lives and 216 seriously injured. This is the largest number of deaths recorded in nine years. The deaths include nine college players, twenty-one high school boys and three members of athletic or semi-professional clubs. The injuries were divided among one hundred and seventy-one college and forty high school players and five from athletic clubs. Twenty-five suffered internal injuries; nineteen dislocated ankles; nineteen concussions of the brain, and nineteen fractured ribs. Fifteen legs and nine arms were broken, while twelve collar-bones were cracked. There were fifteen cases of torn ligaments and thirteen fractured shoulders.

The Marquette Association of New Orleans, organized by Rev. A. Biever, S.J., is actively engaged in completing arrangements for laying the foundation stone of Marquette Hall, the first building of the contemplated Catholic University. His Grace Archbishop Blenk has given his warmest approval to the project. Mr. Walter R. Stauffer, treasurer of the Association, announces that all but $25,000 of the $200,000 required for the first building has been secured. The University will be a development of Loyola College, St. Charles Ave., New Orleans.

Señor Barroso, minister of public instruction in the Moret cabinet, gives out in an interview that his department will be the battlefield on which the Right and the bodies making up the Left will contend. He mentions as a part of his program, which will meet with general acceptance, improvement in school buildings and school inspection, reform in the normal schools, increase of teachers' salaries, and defrayal by the State of the expenses of students who may be selected to pursue studies abroad.

At a dinner given in honor of the university crew of 1909, the President of Harvard University stated that athletics should by all means be encouraged at Cambridge. "Athletics and other things go together," said Harvard's president. "Athletic exercises never hindered the intellectual development of the Athenians. And while, as president of Harvard University, I am desirous of bringing about more scholarship, I am equally desirous of bringing about an even stronger devotion to athletics."

A chair of commercial Arabic has been recently established in the University of Barcelona by the Hispano-Moroccan Commercial Centre. The instruction is gratuitous. Professor Antonio Davoud, in taking charge of the class, which showed on the opening day an enrollment of over two hundred and fifty, enlarged upon the importance of a knowledge of Arabic for the commercial conquest of Northern Africa.

Frank White was appointed director of education for the Philippine Islands on November 29 in place of Dr. Barrow, resigned. Mr. White has been assistant director of education in the Philippines for several years. He was graduated from the University of Chicago in 1900 and went to Manila in the following year.

Bishop Mc Faul, on November 25, dedicated at Bordentown, N. J., a new convent for a community of Poor Clares who are an offshoot from the foundation in Evansville, Ind. The building was formerly occupied by the Sisters of Mercy, who moved recently to their new college and convent at North Plainfield.

At the recent annual meeting of the alumni of Detroit College, steps were taken in furtherance of a plan to merge local colleges of law and medicine with the institution, and thus establish it as a university.

The Alexian Brothers' hospital has been affiliated with St. Louis University, thus affording important scientific facilities to the educational opportunities of the institution.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The Rev. Dr. William T. Russell, at the Pan-American service in Washington, on Thanksgiving day, made an earnest appeal for peace among nations. "When the citizens of a Republic," he said, "cease to regard one another as children of our Father in Heaven, when the nation becomes an aggregation only of individuals, without unity, devoid of public spirit, with no ambition for the common weal, then is the Republic toppling into the abyss of anarchy and unchristian socialism. The more nearly a commonwealth realizes the brotherhood of man, the more truly it is a Republic; but a brotherhood is meaningless without a common father, who can only be God, the Father of us all. In proportion then, as the individual conscience of a nation is alive to its duties and obligations to the Creator and Preserver of all things, just in the same degree will it be sensitive of its duties and obligations toward every other member of the national brotherhood. The more God-fearing, the more religious the Republic, the more closely knit together are its component parts. So long as the Republic believes 'In God we trust,' so long will it continue to be 'E pluribus unum.'

"We citizens of the United States have reason to thank God that our Nation is a God-fearing, a God-trusting Nation. There is, indeed, no union of Church and State. 'This,' to quote the words of our President on a recent occasion, 'has been sometimes misunderstood by those who did not know our institutions as an indication that there was something hostile on the part of our Government toward, or some lack of sympathy with the Church of God. This is as far as possible from the truth; and I have always sought in assisting on interesting occasions like this to testify by my presence that there is nothing which the people and country of the United States so depend upon for progress and advancement of their ideals as the influence and power of religion.' We have reason to thank God, the giver of every perfect gift, Who rules from end to end mightily and disposes all things sweetly, both for what this celebration signifies and for what it promises."

In protecting the rights of American citizens in Nicaragua, the U. S. Government, it is conceded, should take the firmest attitude and insist upon due reparation if these rights have been violated. Yet "grievances which have no relation whatever with those rights," such as "the fact that a force of Nicaraguan troops crossed the Costa Rican boundary in order to effect a re-entrance into Greytown," should not, says the New York Evening Post, be unduly magnified. "In view of our own conduct in the affair of Panama only a few years ago, when a decisive violation of treaty engagements with Colombia, with ineffaceable consequences, was deliberately committed by our Government, over-insistence on this affair of the momentary invasion of Costa Rican territory would have anything but a pleasing look." With reference to the two Americans who were shot the New York Times observes that it is not yet established that these men had acquired "that status as members of a regular armed force that would have given them the rights of prisoners of war." It advises us "to be on our guard against error of procedure that would be harmful to our interests with our Southern neighbors. They have not forgotten, they never will forget, the international crime by which we separated Panama from the United States of Colombia. We do not want to give them further cause to distrust us and to be afraid of us."

SCIENCE

Meteor is a generic name for a minute body that traverses space with planetary velocity and comes in contact with the earth's atmosphere. Its high velocity, which may reach thirty miles a second or more, causes such intense friction with the air that the meteor is rendered white-hot and luminous. As the earth itself is traveling at the rate of eighteen miles a second, the character of the luminosity of a meteor will depend upon the direction in which it is moving. If this is the same as that of the earth, so that it overtakes the earth, the friction will be a minimum, since it rushes through our air with the difference of its own and the earth's velocities. The light is then reddish or yellowish. This is the case with the meteors known as the Andromedes and the Perseids.

If the earth and the meteor are moving in opposite directions, they meet with the sum of their velocities, the friction is a maximum and the light greenish or bluish, as is the case with the Leonids. As some meteors move with a velocity less than that of the earth they cannot overtake the earth, but can only be encountered by the earth mostly in front, that is, on the morning side. For this reason fully twice as many meteors are seen in the morning as in the evening.

Small meteors are called shooting stars. They may be entirely vaporized by the heat so that no solid remnants fall upon the earth. Larger ones, which are of all sizes even to several tons in weight, when fallen are called meteorites. In their composition they are divided into two classes, stony and iron meteorites, with many varieties of mixtures. The size of the common shooting stars has been inferred from their average velocity and their light. It has been found by experiment that the amount of light given out by a standard candle in one minute is equivalent to about twelve foot-pounds of energy, a foot-pound being the energy developed by a pound of matter moving over one foot. Knowing then by photometric observations the brilliancy of a meteor, it is possible to compute its mass. This has been generally put down in text books of astronomy at less than a grain for an ordinary shooting star, and less than a hundred grains, or about a quarter of an ounce, for the largest.

W. Pickering, of Harvard, attacks this statement in the June number of the Astrophysical Journal. He claims that "if the meteor weighed only a grain, its intrinsic brilliancy must be 4000 times that of the incandescent carbon (in an arc light), or 40 times that of the sun itself, but that if the brilliancy of a meteor of the third magnitude is taken equal to that of an arc light, it must be six or seven inches in diameter, and an average fireball must measure five or six feet." He says that "the tremendous quantity of heat generated by the blast of air must be devoted chiefly to vaporizing the front surface of the meteor, which we may conceive to be cut away when at high velocities at a linear rate of two or three feet per second. The temperature would be constantly kept down by the evaporation, so that at ordinary pressures it would be impossible for a high incandescence to exist. In general, the phenomenon is so short-lived that conduction of heat can play very little part in the process of destruction."

In the last, or November number of the same journal, Ch. Fabry, of Marseilles, France, shows that the original statement in our text books is more consistent with known photometric results. He says that "the crater of the electric arc gives about 200 candles per square millimeter. The projection of the visible surface of the meteor, supposing that it has an intrinsic brightness equal to that of the crater of the arc, would be 23 square millimeters. Supposing it spherical, its diameter would be 25.4 millimeters (1 inch), and if its density was 4, it would weigh 0.3 grains (4.5 grains)." He adds that "it is very difficult to discuss the correctness of the hypothesis that the intrinsic brightness is equal to that of the electric arc. Mr. Pickering regards that value as a maximum, and it is strongly probable that it is so."

Let me add in conclusion that the composition of comets is supposed to be mainly meteoric. As Father Searle says that "it seems highly probable that we shall on May 18 be inside the tail" of Halley's comet (Astronomical Bulletin No. 361, of Harvard College Observatory), we have reason to expect a brilliant display of celestial fireworks at that time, by day possibly as well as by night. And this is most likely the only harm that Halley's comet will do the earth.

William F. Rigge, S. J.

The method heretofore used for extinguishing fires in cargoes at sea has been anything but scientific. The flooding of the hold is not only very uncertain, but also very dangerous, since it diminishes the buoyancy of the hull. Besides it often sacrifices that part of the cargo not reached by the flames. To supply this defect George Harker, an Australian inventor, has patented a device for smothering such fires in steamships with incombustible gases taken from the funnels. These gases reduce the oxygen in the hold to a proportion so slight that combustion is impossible.

Max Bermann indicates a new method of analysing steels by observing the shape of the sheaf of sparks thrown off whilst the metal is being pulverized. This makes their classification and the detection of inequalities in their composition an easy matter.

Germany has provided against the polluting of streams in a way that might well be adopted in this country. It is forbidden to permit even a particle of waste from factories to reach a stream, and water emptying into rivers must be cleansed beforehand of every trace of manufacturing by-products. Accordingly the water is turned into pools to settle, and then is passed through filters. The streams are patrolled by inspectors whose duty it is to enforce the law. Any manufacturer violating it is obliged to purify the water at his own cost.

The cruiser Victoria Louise, which but lately visited New York as one of the squadron representing Germany at the Hudson-Fulton celebration, has been ordered to sail for Central America to be present during the balloon ascensions to be made in the second week of December for the purpose of investigating the trade-winds. The expedition arouses keen interest among German scientists since one of its main objects will be to determine just how successfully air-ships can be utilized in scientific experimentation. The experiments to be made will be conducted by international representatives.

Successful aviation has produced a new industry. In consequence of his flight across the English Channel, Louis Bleriot has orders for 162 machines, of which he supplies six a week. Voison has more than sixty contracts; Farman over forty, whilst Antoinette declares that he has produced or has under contract sixty monoplanes. Santos-Dumont is filling his orders through the Bayard-Clement Automobile Company at the rate of one hundred annually.

The official report of the United States Board of Ordnance, just published, pays the following high tribute to the late Dr. Samuel P. Langley, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution:

"The successful outcome of the aeroplane tests justifies the belief in the practicability of the aeroplane as a useful military adjunct. To Samuel P. Langley and his pioneer efforts to establish the basic principles of the art is due the present state of mechanical flight."

SOCIOLOGY

We have received a pamphlet by Mr. Andrew Carnegie entitled, "Armaments and their Results." It is a plea for disarmament and an international agreement to submit all disputes to arbitration. Mr. Carnegie is a man of great experience and he must know that there are certain things he would never arbitrate. The same is the case with nations. There are things which touch the national honor, and these they will defend to the last. What is not worth quarrelling over, they will arbitrate at the Hague or anywhere else. Armaments will go on increasing until the burden is too great to be borne, and then the nations that find the burden heaviest will have to cast it off and fall out of their place or else choose war as a preferable evil. They will probably take the latter course, and the power that comes out victorious at last will dominate the world, and dictate disarmament to the other nations. Thus there will be relief for a season. But wars will not come to an end until the Prince of Peace shall have established his eternal kingdom in the new earth and under the new heavens where justice shall dwell forever.

The Survey gives an interesting account of the St. Helena Colony of Italians near Wilmington, N. C. It is the result of a business man's scheme to turn unreclaimed swamps to profit. He sold the land at $30 an acre in ten acre lots, built a small cottage on each and supplied the buyer with tools. Each colonist, therefore, when he began to clear his land owed about $600 to the promoter, who bought the wood he cut at 90 cents a cord and was glad to allow him to clear other parts of the estate on the same terms. Clearly there was money to be made by the promoter if only he could sell the land. On the other hand, the soil is most productive, the climate permits market-gardening all the year round, and the estate lies on the line of direct commercialism with the North; hence a colonist who could face the difficulties of the first two years would be in a fair way to prosper. It was an opening for the husbandman of Northern Italy, and some 300 Venetians have taken advantage of it. They have now their own cooperative store, have brought in their own priest and begun their own school. Protestants are talking of establishing similar colonies, and as profits can be joined with proselytizing they will find no difficulty in getting the capital required for them. If Catholics would undertake such colonies in favorable places, they would do much towards solving our own Italian question, how to keep the hundreds of thousands that are flocking into the country from Italy, true to their religion.

The movement to diminish tuberculosis is most laudable, but those in charge of it should guard against exciting unreasonable fear of the disease. According to the Survey Henry Phipps, of Philadelphia, offered to pay the general hospitals of Pennsylvania a dollar a day for each case of advanced tuberculosis received and cared for. Not a single hospital has accepted the offer, and of this the chief reason is fear of infection. People should know that there is no more danger of infection from consumption than from typhoid, and that in a properly conducted hospital it practically does not exist. The danger lies in allowing such cases to remain scattered through the crowded tenements of our cities.

The National Civic Federation held its annual meeting on November 22 and 23, at the Hotel Astor in this city. Prominent representatives of the government, of Capital and of Labor took part in it. Among these was Archbishop Ireland, the Secretary of the Treasury, Senator Root, Samuel Gompers, John Mitchell, Henry Towne, of the New York Merchants' Association, Andrew Carnegie, Warren S. Stone, of the International Brotherhood of Railway Engineers. The official Commissions on wage-earners' liability insurance of New York, Minnesota and Wisconsin were present, and from foreign lands came A. H. Gill and J. R. Clymes of the Labor Party in the English Parliament, and A. E. Piorkowski, of the Krupp Co. The subjects discussed were Compensation for Injured Wage-Earners, Employers' Voluntary Sick and Death Funds, and Pensions.

A number of prominent citizens, lay and clerical, of this city recently organized a "Clean Speech League," to stem the tide of obscenity and profanity which, to the regret of all decent citizens, is making obvious headway, especially in our youth. A special purpose of the League is to strive to save children from the contagion, and to call attention to the need for serious effort and to give effectiveness to such laws as may exist for the suppression of profanity and obscenity.

J. G. Phelps Stokes went to New Haven lately to organize a branch of the Intercollegiate Socialistic Society in Yale University. Although his meeting had been advertised widely in the college paper and the local journals, not more than twenty students attended it.

ECONOMICS.

The reduction of the Payne-Aldrich tariff of the duty on printing paper is doing the Canadian paper mills little good. Although the reduction was brought down to $3.75 a ton, the counter-vailing provisions of the law increase the duty on paper made from wood cut on Crown lands in Quebec to $6.10 and in Ontario to $5.75 a ton. However, most of the paper now exported from Canada to the United States is manufactured from wood cut on private lands and therefore enters at $3.75. But even this is not low enough to permit Canadians to compete extensively with the American paper companies. The Canadian mill owners have grasped the fact that Canada has the raw material which American mills require, and which is becoming more and more rare in the United States owing to the rapid depletion of pulp wood areas. Accordingly, they have begun a movement for prohibiting the export of pulp wood. Should the Dominion Government be prevailed upon to issue such a prohibition—which it can do by an Order in Council without reference to Parliament—then one of two things will happen: either the American mills, deprived of the Canadian supply of pulp wood, will be forced to withdraw their objection to free paper, and in that event the Canadians will withdraw the prohibition against exporting pulp wood, or, as the Province of Quebec, which is the pivotal factor in Canadian politics, urges, the American mills, being deprived of Canadian pulp wood, will be compelled to move into Canada, and this would strengthen Quebec's influence against the swiftly growing West.

The Tehuantepec Railway from Coatzacoalcos, on the Gulf of Campeche, to Salina Cruz, on the Gulf of Tehuantepec, connects the Atlantic with the Pacific through Mexico. It was opened in 1907, and in that year carried between 25 and 30 million dollars worth of American merchandise between the ports of the Atlantic and of the Pacific coasts. The value of such goods carried during 1909 will exceed 50 millions. Its length is only 190 miles, and its northerly position gives it a great advantage over the Panama Railway, which during the present year carried only a little more than nine million dollars worth of American merchandise. The success of the former road, however, is not so serious a blow to the latter as at first sight would appear, as this is now owned by the government, and is occupied in business growing out of the construction of the Canal. Moreover, the completion of the Canal would necessarily have deprived it of its importance even if the Tehuantepec Railway had not been constructed.

The State Charities Aid Association has carried the campaign against tuberculosis into Ontario County. The County Organization had taken up the matter enthusiastically last May and at a meeting held in the middle of the present month appointed a special field agent and arranged for the formation of local committees in the towns and villages where they do not exist. The Association will supply both the agent and the committee with literature and will furnish the former with an exhibit to carry from town to town.

The Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor, having compared the world's trade during the first six months of 1909 with that of the corresponding period of last year, announces a general improvement. The improvement, from 10 to 25 per cent. on total trade of each country, indicates to some degree an increase in volume, but, unfortunately the greater part of it is only apparent, the result of a general advance in prices.

Mr. McKewan, who had been connected with the London and County Bank since its establishment in 1839, and long its general manager until his retirement some ten years ago, has just died in his ninetieth year. During his long career he had exercised much influence on legislation affecting the money market.

The Union-Castle Line from England to the Cape, is about to extend its service up the East Coast of Africa as far as Mombasa. The East Coast trade has hitherto been in the hands of the German Line through the Suez Canal.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

A Subscriber.—Good Catholics do not use the expression "The Ultramontane Movement." They would as soon think of saying, "The Trinitarian Movement" to express the opposition of the Church to the heresy of Arius. The term originated with Gallicans in France. It means literally "The Beyond the Mountains Movement," the mountains being the Alps, and they coined it in a spirit of hostility to the Holy See, which did not allow their unorthodox ideas on the constitution of the Church and the Primacy of the Holy See to go uncensured. Since their time Ultramontanism has been a favorite nick-name for orthodox Catholicity with Liberals in France and Germany and with the enemies of religion in general. Read "Gallicanism" in "The Catholic Encyclopedia," Vol. VI.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The first Pan-American Thanksgiving service was held in Washington on Thanksgiving Day. St. Patrick's Church was the scene of the solemn religious ceremony. Mgr. Diomedo Falconio, the Apostolic Delegate to the United States, Cardinal Gibbons and other prelates took part. President Taft accompanied by Captain Archibald Butt, U. S. A., his military aide, attended the services and occupied a front pew. Beside him sat Señor Nabuco, the Brazilian Ambassador, who is dean of the diplomatic corps in Washington. The other guests included Secretary of State Knox, Secretary of the Interior Ballinger, the Ministers of Costa Rica, Bolivia, Argentine Republic, Guatemala, Salvador, Chile, Honduras, Panama, Hayti, Cuba, Venezuela and Nicaragua; Associate Justices Day, McKenna, White and Brewer, of the U. S. Supreme Court; Mr. John Barrett, Director, and Francis Yánes, Secretary of the Bureau of American Republics; Brigadier General O'Reilly, U. S. A., retired; Rear Admiral Ramsey, U. S. N.; Sir Horace Plunkett, and Frederick W. Carpenter, secretary to the President. The Rev. Charles M. Bart was celebrant of the Mass. The Rev. Dr. William T. Russell, rector of St. Patrick's who originated the idea of the service, preached a sermon on peace and good will among nations, which the President listened to attentively, following the celebration of the Mass, with the aid of a souvenir pamphlet containing the prayers and responses in Latin and English. At the luncheon in the rectory at which most of the guests were present, Secretary of State Knox suggested that a day of thanksgiving be observed in all the republics of the Western hemisphere. The republic of Chile already has such a day. At a conference of the hierarchy, September 18 was selected for solemn annual thanksgiving service in the spirit suggested by the Secretary of State.

Last week the Holy Trinity parish of Cincinnati celebrated the seventy-fifth anniversary of the dedication of the first church erected by a distinctively German congregation in the Middle West. In 1824 Rev. Frederick Reze, afterward Bishop of Detroit, was charged with the spiritual care of the German immigrants into Ohio. The building of a church was at once begun, the growing congregation meantime being made welcome in the temple of the English-speaking Catholics. In 1834 the first Church of the Holy Trinity, erected in the south-western part of the city, the heart of the then German district, was ready for dedication. The Rev. J. M. Henni, later the distinguished first Archbishop of Milwaukee, was its first Rector. Fire destroyed this church and its neighboring parochial school in 1852, but the zeal of the parishioners speedily caused a nobler edifice to rise from its ashes. The parish, one of the few strictly German communities in Cincinnati still in existence, is a very populous one, and its church and school buildings are among the most imposing in the city. Most Rev. Archbishop Moeller presided at the religious festivities, and praised the work of pastors and people during the seventy-five years of the active life of the parish.

The centennial celebration of the establishment of the Sisters of Charity in the United States was held in New York on Dec. 1 and 2, although elsewhere in the country it took place earlier in the year. On Dec. 1 a Solemn Pontifical Mass was celebrated by his Grace, Archbishop Farley, in St. Patrick's Cathedral. The sermon was preached by Mgr. James H. McGean, rector of St. Peter's church, Barclay street. It was at St. Peter's that Elizabeth Bayley Seton, foundress of the Sisters of Charity in the United States, was received into the Church by the then pastor, the Rev. Matthew O'Brien, in 1805. Mother Seton sent the first band of her sisters to New York in 1817, and there are now 1,400 of her spiritual daughters laboring in the schools and institutions of the archdiocese. At the pontifical Mass in the Cathedral the processional and recessional hymns were sung by 1,200 children from the parochial schools of Manhattan. On the following day, Dec. 2, special services were held in all the churches of the city, in which school children also took a prominent part. The sermons preached on the occasion were commemorative of the life, works, and virtues of Mother Seton.

To avoid all misunderstanding, the Sacred Congregation of Regulars has declared under date of Oct. 4, 1909, that a certain association of women styled "of St. Mary," with houses in Turin, Civita Vecchia and elsewhere, though wearing a habit similar to that of the Sisters of Charity, is not a religious institute, nor a branch of the Sisters of Charity, nor dependent in any way upon the ecclesiastical authority.

His Holiness Pius X has sent a letter of congratulation and blessing to Father Pasi, S.J., of Venice, for his labors in promoting retreats for workmen.

Dr. George Matheson Cullen who was recently elected Bailie of the Town Council of Edinburgh, Scotland, is the first Catholic to be thus distinguished since the Reformation.

OBITUARY

The Rev. Brother Joseph, Provincial of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, died on November 26, in New York City, of pneumonia. Brother Joseph, whose name in the world was Patrick L. Kenny, was born in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1857. He first taught in the schools of Baltimore; he was for five years prefect of discipline in Manhattan College, New York, and afterward became director of St. Peter's Parochial School. Later he went to Tooting College, London, where he was made Professor of History. On his return to America he was appointed General Inspector of the schools taught by the Christian Brothers in New York City and shortly after was made director of La Salle Academy. In 1897 he became provincial of the New York District, extending from Halifax to Detroit, the highest local position in his Institute.

Mother Teresa Austin Carroll, of the Convent of Mercy, Mobile, Ala., died Nov. 29 in her eightieth year. Mother Austin, as she was popularly known, was born in Clonmel, Ireland, entered St. Mary's of the Isle Convent of Mercy, Cork, 1854, and in 1857 came to New Orleans, La., where she was Superior of the Mercy Convents for many years. She founded numerous convents in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida, and peopled them with sisters whom she herself had secured. Her "Annals of the Sisters of Mercy" and some thirty other publications, biographical, historical, doctrinal, etc., are a monument to her energy and zeal as well as literary ability.

Thomas Meagher, son of Gen. Thomas Francis Meagher, the Irish patriot of 1848, died in Manila on November 29 of pneumonia. He was a student for a short time at the U. S. Military Academy at West Point, and had lived for several years in Montana and California. At various times he had held minor posts in the government service in the Philippines. He was the son of General Meagher's first wife, and was born in Ireland in 1854. He never saw his father, as he was born during a visit of his mother at Waterford to his paternal grandfather, who afterwards brought him up. He did not come to the United States until several years after the death of his father.

Most Rev. Francis J. McCormack, Archbishop of Nisibis, died at his Galway residence November 13, after a protracted illness. Appointed Bishop of Achonry in 1875, he had completed the longest episcopacy of the present bishops of Ireland. Transferred to Galway in 1887, he ruled that see until the present year when he resigned on account of advancing years and was succeeded by Dr. O'Dea, the present incumbent. He was noted for his personal kindness and executive ability. In recognition of his long continued services to the church Pius X raised him last year to Archiepiscopal rank.

The Rev. Mother Mary Cecilia Lawrence, of the Ursulines died on November 21st at Mount St. Ursula, Bedford Park, N. Y. Mother Cecilia had been a member of the order for forty-eight years. She was a daughter of the late Bryan Lawrence, who at the time of his death was president of the New York Catholic Protectors and vice-president of the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank.

Mother Henrica, superior of the Franciscan Hospital in Denver, died recently in her forty-eighth year and the twenty-fifth of her religious life. She was a native of Germany and previous to her assignment to Denver she was stationed in Evanston, Ill., where she built St. Francis' Hospital.

Mother Mary Celine, who for nearly a quarter of a century had directed St. Mary's Institute of the Notre Dame Sisters of Quincy, Ill., died on November 23. She was born in Milwaukee, July 15, 1854.

PERSONAL

As a souvenir of his recent episcopal silver jubilee, it has been decided to present to Archbishop Healy, of Tuam, Ireland, for use in his cathedral, a reproduction in silver of the famous processional Cross of Cong, one of the most important relics of the art of the ancient Irish metal workers. The original cross was made by order of Turlough O'Connor, King of Connaught, in 1123, by an artisan from Roscommon named Mailisa MacBraddan O'Hechan, for the Cathedral of Tuam, then held by Archbishop Muredach O'Duffy. It is 2 feet 6 inches high, and was intended to enshrine a piece of the True Cross. It is covered with elaborate ornamentation of pure Celtic design and inscriptions in Gaelic along its sides give its full history. This cross was kept at Tuam until the reign of Roderick O'Connor, the last king of Ireland, when it was sent to the Augustinian Abbey of Cong. Here it remained until the Reformation when it was concealed and not found until early in the last century, when a Father Prendergast, the parish priest at Cong, discovered it. It is now in the museum of the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin. It is not generally known that fine reproductions in metal of the Cross of Cong, the Aedagh Chalice, St. Patrick's Bell, the Tara Brooch, and other attractive examples of early Christian art in Ireland are included in the collection on view at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in this city.

In the record of the existing incidents of the work done by the rescue party that penetrated the St. Paul mine at Cherry, Ill., after the recent disaster, the name of Father James P. Heaney, rector of St. Mary's Church, Mendota, stands out conspicuously. Wearing a miner's cap and a flaming torch he penetrated into the gallery in time to administer absolution to a dying miner, and to aid in the bringing to the surface of those rescued. Bishop Dunne, of Peoria, was also present during some of the rescue work, and immediately started a personal house to house canvass of the town for relief measures by the Catholics of the diocese. With the Bishop were several Sisters from the Nazareth Hospital, Chicago, who spoke Polish and Italian.

On the eve of his departure for Rome, on November 25, Rev. Dr. Henry A. Brann, rector of St. Agnes' Church, this city, was entertained by the twelve hundred children of his parochial school. His parishioners presented him with $2,000 in gold which he announced he would use for various charities. A Protestant gave him $10,000 in bonds, the income of which will be devoted to the poor of his parish. Another Protestant presented him with a letter of credit for $1,000 with the privilege of renewal as often as Dr. Brann wished.

In making his appointments of Supreme Court judges Governor Hughes, of New York, has promoted two of its prominent Catholic members. He has designated Justice Victor J. Dowling to be an associate justice of the Appellate Division, First Department, for five years, and Justice William J. Carr, of Brooklyn, an associate Justice in the Second Division.

Hon. John C. Gibbons, a Texas pioneer, and one of the leading citizens of Paris, Texas, was received into the Church by the Rev. James M. Hayes, of Texarkana on November 24. Mr. Gibbons has lived in Texas more than sixty years and is one of the most prominent business men in the Southwest.

Francis Joseph Reitz, president of the National Bank of Evansville, Ind., is to build an addition to the Home of the Little Sisters of the Poor in that city that will cost him $100,000.

The President's Message.—Opening with an account of our foreign relations, President Taft announces to the sixty-first Congress, that the dispute over the fisheries on the North Atlantic Coast has been submitted to the Arbitral Tribunal of the Hague, and specifies the progress made in each of the questions of boundary between the United States and Canada. He records the origin of the Declaration of London, of which he highly approves, regulating procedure in regard to maritime prizes, blockade, contraband, destruction of neutral prizes, and continuous voyages. He strongly recommends an appropriation for an American exhibit at the World's Fair in Brussels, in 1910, and describes our attitude towards Congo reform agitations as one of "benevolent encouragement, coupled with a hopeful trust that the good work, responsibly undertaken and zealously perfected to the accomplishment of the results so ardently desired, will soon justify the wisdom that inspires them and satisfy the demands of humane sentiment throughout the world." Reviewing the late journey of our commissioners to Liberia, he reminds Congress that according to the constitution of that country, the United States may be called upon by that country for assistance in solving national problems. Our interests in the coal lands of Spitzbergen, and in the near East particularly in Turkey and Persia are emphasized. The peaceful solution of the boundary question between Bolivia and Peru; the Fourth Pan-American Congress at Buenos Ayres, July, 1910; and the great international agricultural exhibition to be held there from May to November next, are mentioned as points of primary importance for our attention. The Pan-American policy of this government is commended and its practical results are enumerated as they manifest themselves in Mexico, Venezuela and Panama, Cuba, San Domingo and Chile. The action of Secretary Knox in regard to Zelaya is virtually indorsed, with the statement that at the date at which the message is printed the government has terminated relations with Zelaya's government, and is intending to take such further action as is consistent with its dignity and its moral obligation to Central America and to civilization. A special message on this point may be deemed necessary.—Equality of opportunity and scrupulous regard for the integrity of China are declared to be our policy in China, the first of the Far East nations mentioned in the message. Our claim to a share in the loan by foreign bankers for Chinese railroad development; the policy of the Chinese government in sending students to this country; the results of the opium conference at Shanghai last spring, are all commended. Various incidents are recalled of our amicable relations with Japan during the past year, and the assurance of its government that the Japanese railway in Manchuria is not a movement for control to the exclusion of other countries.—The modernization of the State Department and the reform of the diplomatic service are strongly urged. A pause in tariff legislation until sufficient data are obtained for determining the customs; economy in government expenditures, means of meeting the increased canal estimates; more efficient service on the part of government employees; prosecution for customs' frauds and the functions of the tariff board, are earnestly recommended. Substantial changes in the organization of the army; important coast defenses, especially at the entrance of Chesapeake Bay; a naval base at Pearl Harbor, near Honolulu, in preference to one in the Philippines are suggested. The chief improvements for the navy are those lately adopted by Secretary Meyer, and the appointment of an astronomer rather than a naval officer for the charge of the naval observatory.—For the Department of Justice, more expedite legal procedure, due notice before issuing injunctions and amendments of the anti-trust and interstate commerce law, are the program. The usual suggestion to increase the rate on second-class postage for magazines and periodicals is repeated for the Post Office Department, as the deficit on this head is now $63,000,000 a year. Postal savings banks are also favored. A ship subsidy for lines between our Atlantic seaboard, and the eastern coast of South America, and from our western coast to China, Japan, and the Philippines, is proposed. In the Interior Department, the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as States; territorial legislation for Alaska; conservation of national resources are the chief considerations.—The message closes with the discussion of various unclassified topics, such as the consolidation of the Department of Commerce and Labor with the Bureau of Manufactures and Statistics; an appropriation for suppressing the white slave trade; the establishment of a Bureau of Health; new quarters for the Civil Service Commission; political contributions; the payment of depositors in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, the celebration of the semi-centennial of Negro Freedom in such a manner as to show the progress of the race during the past half-century. There is a final caution against blaming the tariff for the increased cost of living, and a reminder to all who would increase prices that, on the materials for which they would charge more, there has been either no increase on the tariff, or in many instances a very considerable reduction; besides, the cost of living the President notes has been increased all over the world.

The Nicaraguan Crisis.—The United States has severed diplomatic relations with Nicaragua and sent his passports to the Nicaraguan Chargé d'Affaires, Señor Rodríguez. The Government has likewise opened unofficial relations with Señor Castrillo, the accredited representative of the revolutionary government of Estrada, at the same time offering to continue unofficial diplomatic relations with President Zelaya. This brings the crisis as near the status of war as is possible by Executive action without a definite declaration by both Houses of Congress. The announcement of this new development in the Nicaraguan situation is contained in an official letter of December 1, addressed by Secretary Knox of the State Department, to Señor Rodríguez.

Reorganizing the Department of State.—Secretary Knox has effected a practical reorganization of his working force in the State Department which will be productive of commercial expansion. A number of new bureaus have been established which have as object a development of peaceful trade relations everywhere. A corps of subordinates under his direction are working to this end, utilizing every source of information to accumulate helpful knowledge for our merchants and manufacturers. As part of the detail of the plan, Wilbur J. Clark has been promoted from the position of chief clerk of the Department to that of Director of Consular Service, a new office recently created. A division of Near Eastern Affairs has been established, in charge of Charles F. Williams, late law clerk of the Department. The division of Far Eastern Affairs has been in existence two years; the division of Latin American Affairs is now being organized. Bureaus to handle the business of northern Europe and those of southern Europe are in contemplation.

Great Strike in the Northwest.—What is affirmed to be the most far-reaching strike that has taken place in the West in twenty-five years is that of the switchmen on the Northern transcontinental lines between St. Paul and the Pacific Coast which has tied up freight traffic. At the beginning of the week not a wheel was turning under a freight train between St. Paul and Seattle. Flour mills, packing houses, mines and smelters all through the Northwest have been compelled to close for lack of shipping facilities, and small towns in the strike district are shut off from their daily supply of foodstuffs. There is coal enough on hand to last about a month with normal weather conditions. The strike arises from simultaneous demands made by switchmen in the Northwest territory on thirteen railroad companies entering the Twin Cities for an increase in wages and certain changes in service conditions. Five conferences were held in St. Paul in which the switchmen in no detail receded from their demands. The railway managers' committee agreed to make certain concessions but would not yield in all, claiming that the demands of the switchmen would entail an additional expense of from 40 to 45 per cent. for switching service, an intolerable burden. They claim, too, that an increase of wages granted in 1906, and not reduced during the business depression which followed, make the present scale of wages for switchmen average over $100 per month. The managers' committee suggested arbitration under the provisions of the Erdman Act. The switchmen declined to heed the suggestion and in their final written answer to the managers' committee made the statement that "the committee begs leave to state that it will not submit to arbitration under any circumstances."

Other Home News.—The Secretary of the Navy sent urgent orders to the commanders of the cruiser Albany and the gunboat Yorktown, the two American warships which were then at Magdalena Bay, Lower California, to proceed forthwith to Corinto, the Pacific Coast port of Nicaragua nearest to the capital of that country. The gunboat Vicksburg already is in the harbor at Corinto, and the gunboat Princeton is on her way from the Navy Yard, Washington, for the same port.—Martial law holds sway at Bridgeport, Ohio, where 2,000 striking employees of the Aetna-Standard plant of the American Sheet and Tin Plate Company, a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation, have been rioting for three days. A regiment of infantry, one squadron of cavalry, and 150 deputy sheriffs and a company of police guard the city and the tin plate mills. Governor Harmon has placed fullest military powers in the hands of Brig. Gen. John C. Speaks, in command of both civil and State authorities in the city.—Conferences at the headquarters of the Trainmen's Union in New York on Saturday completed arrangements for a petition to be addressed this week to the various railroad companies operating in the East for an increase of ten per cent. in wages which will affect 100,000 men. The Trainmen's Union is distinct from the Switchmen's Union of North America now on strike in the Northwest and claims to have no cordiality of feeling towards the latter organization. The request of the Trainmen will be courteously worded and presented in good spirit, and the petitioners look for a favorable response to their prayer for more pay which they ask for because of the higher cost of living and the increasing prosperity of the railroads. There is in the request no present hint of the possibility of a strike.—The National Association of Manufacturers announces that reports received regarding business conditions throughout the country show a marked improvement since December of last year. Officials of the Association, after an analysis of these reports, predict a continuance of this prosperity during the coming year.—According to advices given out to the press by Secretary of State Knox, President Taft by executive order has taken the diplomatic service of the country out of politics and placed appointments under the merit system.—The members of the Senate who have been threatening a Congressional investigation of the Sugar Trust have been requested not to insist upon such action for the present. It is feared that an investigation pursued by Congress at this juncture would prove a hindrance to the prosecutions in New York now in hand.—President Taft has formally accepted the resignation of Governor Joseph Blackburn of the Canal Zone. Governor Blackburn, a Democrat, was appointed by President Roosevelt.—The Anti-Prohibition victory in Alabama last week was the first to break a long series of defeats. During the past twelvemonth prohibition has made progress in thirty States. Nine States, with a total population of over 12,000,000, have prohibition laws: Alabama, Georgia, Kansas, Maine, Mississippi, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma and Tennessee, where the sale of liquor was prohibited last year and its manufacture will be abolished with the close of the present year. There are 375 prohibition cities in the United States with a population of 2,000,000, and towns and counties innumerable in which "dry" conditions prevail by local option.—The Government has decided, it is understood, to send the cadets of the United States Naval Academy to Europe next year. The Transatlantic voyage, as a substitute for the annual cruise in the North Atlantic, was recommended by Capt. John M. Bowyer, Superintendent of the Naval Academy, and has, it is said, the approval of the Secretary of the Navy. The itinerary of the cruise has not been made public, but it will probably include the Mediterranean ports of France, and Naples, Genoa and Gibraltar, and possibly Portsmouth, England.—William James Calhoun, of Chicago, has been appointed Minister to China and has accepted.

New Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia.—The resignation of Lieutenant-Governor Dunsmuir has been accepted by the Dominion Government at Ottawa, and, by an order of the Governor-General-in-Council, which practically means a decree of the Cabinet, dated December 4, Mr. Thomas M. Patterson, of Victoria, has been appointed Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia. He settled in the provincial capital, Victoria, in 1885, and soon became prominent as a railway contractor. A native of Ayrshire, Scotland, he was educated in Oxford County, Ontario. He was twice elected to represent Victoria city in the Legislature. He was fifty-seven last Monday.

Ottawa Parliament.—On December 3, on motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, it was resolved that the House of Commons would not sit on Wednesday, the 8th, Feast of the Immaculate Conception. The members of the House afterwards proceeded to the Senate to witness the ratification of the commercial treaty between France and Canada by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, representing the Governor-General. The only thing that now remains to be done is that the British Government in London send a diplomatic note to the French Government in Paris.—The Senate has adjourned till January 11.

Canadian Lumber.—A despatch from Washington, D. C., dated December 4, says that a careful investigation will soon be made into the manner in which the customs duties are assessed and collected upon lumber coming from Canada into the United States. As lumber is so bulky as to be incapable of being handled by the customs inspectors, the practice has grown of accepting the figures of the invoice. But there is a well founded suspicion that the American Government is being cheated. Now along the Canadian border and in the lake ports the lumber trade is so heavy as to make a comparatively slight leak amount to great losses to the Government. Imports of lumber into the United States from these northerly ports amounted last year to $13,327,000, the imports at all the remaining ports reaching less than two million dollars.

Troubles of a Canadian College.—Under this title on September 18 AMERICA (p. 608) chronicled the unfortunate position in which the faculty of the College of Sainte-Marie de Monnoir had placed themselves by moving without authorization into another diocese, and how they had in consequence incurred the displeasure of their former and their present bishop. Last week the Rev. J. A. Lemieux and sixteen other priests addressed to Mgr. Bernard, Bishop of St. Hyacinth, in whose diocese the college was formerly situated, a letter in which they acknowledged their fault in establishing their college at St. John's against the bishop's formal will, against that of the Archbishop of Montreal, and against the orders of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda, and they begged pardon for the pain their disobedience has caused. They still remain at St. John's.

Germany.—With splendid pomp the Reichstag began its sessions on November 30. The opening ceremonies were held in the great white chamber of the royal palace in Berlin where from his throne Emperor William presided in person and read the opening address to the representatives present. Before the exercises marking the occasion, religious services had been held, in the chapel of the palace for the Emperor and his suite, in the cathedral for the Protestant members of the Reichstag, and in St. Hedwig's Church for the Centrum and other Catholic representatives. Promptly at midday the Reichstag was gathered in the grand salon, and two heralds, trumpeting, entered, followed in order by the Emperor, Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg, and high officials of the court in gorgeous uniforms. Seated upon the throne, the Emperor received the speech from the Chancellor and read it with clear, strong voice. His Majesty's address dealt largely with domestic legislation and communicated the important announcement that the Government had prepared a measure extending the sick benefit insurance to the working classes not heretofore benefited and creating a system of insurance for the dependent relatives of deceased workers. The imperial insurance organization was to be modified in notable particulars. The principal task of the Government in this session of the body was declared to be to strengthen the imperial financial system with the means made available by the finance bill of the last session. To accomplish this task was the purpose of the appropriation bill for 1910 which would be laid before the reichstag. The Emperor congratulated the country on the happy growth of the empire's possessions over the seas, made known certain projected colonial legislation to meet occurring economic conditions, and referred to trade agreements in prospect with Great Britain and Portugal. A good word was added regarding the French-German agreement in Morocco and the triple alliance which had preserved peace for a generation. "I nourish the confidence," said Emperor William, "that the three allied empires will continue to act together, using their strength for the welfare of their peoples and the maintenance of peace." Evidence of enduring tension between the political parties as a result of the quarrels of last session's consideration of reform in the empire's financial system came into play in the opening business sitting of the Reichstag. In electing the governing body in the house organization Count Udo von Stolberg-Weringerode was reelected president and Dr. Spahn, of the Centrum, first vice-president, displacing Dr. Paasche, National-Liberal. The latter when chosen second vice-president, declined to serve, alleging that his party had decided unanimously not to accept office in the house organization. The Free Conservatives, too, declined part in the organization, and the Radicals went so far as to decide that they would cast blank votes. It is apparent that these parties are determined to cast full responsibility for coming legislation upon the German Conservatives and the Centrum party. In a following sitting Hereditary-Prince Ernest of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, who is an honorary member of the National Liberal party, was called to fill the place of second vice-president by the votes of the Conservatives and of the Centrum. A formal speech is looked for from Chancellor von Bethmann Hollweg during the debate on the State of the Empire which will begin in the first regular legislative session.

Great Britain.—Lord Lansdowne's motion to refuse to agree with the Supply Bill was carried by 275 majority; 350 peers voted. The Bill has been returned to the House of Commons. Mr. Asquith moved that the action of the peers was a violation of the Constitution. He said that Parliament would be dissolved, and that if he was returned to power his first act would be to pass the Supply Bill just as it stood. His resolution was carried by an immense majority. Parliament was prorogued by Royal Commission on December 3. The dissolution is not expected before the beginning of January. Nevertheless, the campaign has begun with equal vigor and bitterness, the leaders of the Government saying that the war on the House of Lords has begun and that, however the coming election turns, it will be carried to a successful issue; for no Liberal Government will ever consent to take office under the present conditions.—The correspondent of the Times does not take a very hopeful view of Lord Charles Beresford's prospects in Portsmouth. The men in the dockyards seem to be almost unanimously in favor of the Government.—Mr. Justice Grantham, sitting at the Central Criminal Court and taking as a text the words of the usher's proclamation, that the prisoners are at the bar "for their deliverance," contrasted in his instructions to the jury, English and French criminal procedure, much to the disadvantage of the latter.—It is announced that there will be no competitive examination in December for entrance into the military college at Sandhurst in December, but only a qualifying examination will be required. The same announcement was made last June, when the Secretary for War said it was due to temporary and accidental circumstances. The same condition of affairs exists at Woolwich, the artillery and engineering school, with this exception, that a candidate must attain a certain standard in mathematics. The conclusion is that while formerly the supply of would-be officers exceeded the demand, the reverse is the case now.

Ireland.—The House of Lords' treatment of the Land Bill is to be the main election cry in the agricultural and Unionist constituencies of Ulster. They have destroyed the principle of compulsory sale in all except the Congested Districts, limited the area of such districts and reduced the definition of a congested holding from £10 to £7 valuation, thus breaking up the original bill into what Mr. Birrell called "the fragments of my own measure." It is for this reason that Mr. T. W. Russell, M. P., the efficient and popular secretary of the Irish Government Board, has reconsidered his determination to decline reelection: "The Lords have destroyed the main features of the measure and have been backed in eliminating compulsion by the entire vote of the Tory representatives of Ulster, pledged as they are to this principle and returned by Irish farmers for a very different purpose. The Lords have blocked and spoiled what was intended by the Government to be a practical solution of this long and terrible controversy. I am unwilling to leave the matter as it stands, and I am assured that the Ulster representatives who attacked the Bill will soon realize that they had the greatest interest in defending it."—The Nationalist organs that were somewhat critical of the Irish party are all rallying to its defence in view of the approaching elections. The Dublin Independent, which had antagonized the Irish party on several points, insists that a united and disciplined party is essential to Ireland, that being poor men as a rule, they cannot give constant attendance unless they are paid, and that while reasonable criticism is mutually advantageous to the country and the Party, all criticism is unreasonable unless the country which demands their faithful and constant service, pays for their up-keep.—A passage from the election address of Mr. Lambert of Southport is to be presented as a sample to all Liberal candidates: "I am in favor of granting Home Rule to Ireland. Not only do I believe that this policy for Ireland will bring peace and prosperity to the country, but I see no reason why self-government should be granted to the Transvaal and withheld from Ireland."

France.—A commission has been appointed to consider a reform of criminal procedure that will model it on English methods by taking from judges the office of interrogating the accused.—The municipal council of Rouen has decided to celebrate on a grand scale the thousandth anniversary of the formation of the Duchy of Normandy which was established by treaty between Charles the Simple and Duke Rollo in 911. The Channel Isles, a part of the original duchy and now an appanage of the British Crown, give Edward VII his title of Duke of Normandy.—The General Council of the Seine, adopted on December 1 a petition requesting the Superior Council of Public Instruction to exercise more effectual control on the school manuals, in order to ensure respect for the neutrality of public schools. "It is necessary," says the Seine General Council, "to exclude those manuals which might offend the religious beliefs of the children or weaken in them the feeling of patriotism."—On December 4 the French Minister of Foreign Affairs had not yet received the answer of the Sultan of Morocco, who had, nevertheless, been informed that the conditions laid down by France were final. These are that the Sultan should authorize French agents to collect customs dues in Moroccan ports, and that the receipts therefrom should serve as security for a loan of a hundred million francs, with which France intends to satisfy the French and foreign creditors of Morocco.—The bishops of France are debating the question whether the Catholics, as such, should unite for the coming general election. The Archbishop of Toulouse is strongly in favor of a Catholic union, while the Bishop of Nancy recommends Catholics to unite with sincere liberals and good men (les honnêtes gens) of all parties. Fifty-six bishops have adhered to the latter's pamphlet on this subject. The Archbishop of Rouen has gone still farther in an open letter to the Bishop of Nancy published in Le Temps of November 24. He defines not only the object of this union with "les honnêtes gens," but its platform, which must be constitutional. In the Univers of November 25, M. François Veuillot writes an open letter to the Archbishop of Rouen, respectfully deprecating His Grace's effort to set the proposed alliance with "les honnêtes gens" over against the intimate union of all Catholics. The latter, says M. Veuillot, is a duty, the former is only one means of attaining our end, a necessary expedient in certain parts of France. For the sake of obtaining the support of certain liberals who wish to make use of us, it would, he says, be neither just nor prudent to exclude certain monarchists who wish to serve the Church.

Roman News.—The Liberal press accuses the Pope of stirring up domestic strife in France by his addresses to French pilgrims. The Osservatore Romano points out that the defending of their rights by Christians can not be reckoned disorderly. If there be disorder it must be attributed to the Government that persecutes them. It points out that the timely stand the bishops are making is more conducive to ultimate peace than a submission that could not continue.—The Pope will receive and entertain for a day a large number of the ship's company of the British man-of-war Duncan.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The British Crisis and the Empire

Fifty years ago, when England was supporting revolutions abroad and harboring revolutionists at home, Englishmen used to boast that under its admirable constitution domestic revolution was impossible. "When the nation is disturbed," they said, "we have a defeat of the Government, a new ministry, possibly a general election, and then things go on as before." The wiser sort, perceiving that every Liberal victory was a step towards democracy, suspected this comfortable doctrine; and the infatuated tried to reassure them with the phrase, "a flexible constitution," pointing out that the British constitution is none of the written kind cast to order in a rigid mould, but a bundle of traditions, precedents and implicit conventions bound about the essentials, King, Lords, Commons and the Act of Settlement. For centuries it had been adapting itself to the nation's growth; why should it not do the same for centuries to come? But the wiser sort were not reassured. They saw that this so-called adaptation was not a symmetrical development of the constitution in all its parts but the abnormal development of one at the expense of the others, leading to the extinction of these at last. And now their forebodings seem near fulfilment. The Constitution has broken down, and unless it can be repaired it must go the way of all broken-down machines to the scrap-heap.

Conservatives understand this. Their leader among the peers, Lord Lansdowne, has said that should they win the general election now impending, they must reform the Upper House. But there are other reforms no less essential.

About the middle of the last century the Liberals were giving self-government to the colonies. Their object, of which they made no secret, was to prepare them for separation from the mother country. Liberalism was then dominated by the Manchester school of political economists, which seemed to hold the trade of the world to be England's inviolable heritage and her heaven-given mission, to buy and sell everywhere without a rival and at the least expense. Charges Account must be kept down that the balance of Profit and Loss may abound. "We can trade," said they, "with the colonies, even though they be separated from us, and by casting them adrift we shall save what they now cost us." Or, as Tennyson scornfully put it:

"Too loyal is too costly. Friends, your love
Is but a burden: loose the bands and go."

But there were others more clear-sighted. Disraeli had in his mind another system, which, whether he understood it so or not, was to be not merely of economic advantage for England, but the condition of her existence among the powers of the world. In 1866 he said that the granting of self-government to the colonies should have been part of a great policy of imperial consolidation including an imperial tariff, the systematic transfer of surplus population to new homes under the flag, a plan of imperial defence in which the colonies should have their share, and an imperial council gathered from the whole Empire. When, in the following year, the British North America Act established the Canadian Confederation, he was in office but not in power, and therefore may be excused for not having introduced into it some of these ideas. It is hard to see why during his supremacy, from 1874 to 1880, he put no hand to the work. Perhaps he was dazzled with the apparently greater splendors of the Eastern question, the Congress of Berlin and his Asiatic policy; perhaps he thought the time not yet ripe. However it may have been, he passed away, having stirred up indeed the imperial spirit, but leaving the work of building the Empire untouched.

Under his successors in the last years of the century Imperialism ran riot, an Imperialism of acquisition, not of consolidation. "Another little spot of red" on the map was a triumph; the chartering of African and Asiatic Island companies, empire-building. These gave material to work in; the work was yet to do. Then came the unexpected. The policy indicated by Disraeli found its advocate in one brought up in the strictest Radicalism. Joseph Chamberlain, comprehending the evils free trade was working in England, took up the cause of protection, but behind this were larger views. Perhaps he learned the primary lessons from one of the sanest of imperialists, Henniker-Heaton, who for years had been fighting the battle on the humbler field of a common inter-imperial postal rate, and who, if there ever be a real British Empire, will not be the least honored of its founders.

At first Chamberlain's party would not hear him. Soon one individual after another came round to his ideas on the domestic question, so that at the last general election the Conservatives were more or less committed to tariff-reform. Now it is at the core of their policy; and imperial preference must follow tariff-reform. From imperial preference to inter-imperial free-trade and a uniform imperial tariff is but a step, but it is a step that leads necessarily to the rest of Disraeli's policy.

Let us see how the colonies are disposed towards imperial consolidation. Their people to-day know not the passionate love the first settlers bore to England, their home. For them, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the Cape, are home and country. Nevertheless they have something of the spirit of their fathers. England is still the mother-land, to be loved and, in need, to be helped. They are proud of her greatness in which they share. But as years pass, and the colonies, growing great themselves, need no reflex glory, such sentiments must decay, and the more quickly as the colonists become persuaded that England is failing. This opinion is growing. England's pitiful appeal for Dreadnoughts heightens it. Sir John Fisher's naval concentration may have seemed in English eyes a statesmanlike policy; to the men of the colonies who looked upon the deserted dockyards and sought vainly in the harbors the flag of empire familiar from their youth, it was the recall of the legions from Britain, an infallible symptom of imperial decay.

Still the English spirit in the colonies is not yet extinct and it is probable that the advantages of imperial federation would heighten their natural inclination towards it. Canada, Australia and New Zealand have great interests in the Pacific. They wish a strong fleet there and they are fully able to support it. But they are not going to contribute blindly either ships or money. As for colonial navies, the colonial who can not see beyond his own boundaries judges them a useless expense. What the Imperialist thinks who sees the colonies with their constitutions, their flags, their military force, their negotiations with foreign powers, may be gathered from a careful reading of III Kings ii, 13-22. The Empire, if not a mere word, means that the interests of the part make up the interest of the whole, and that each part has a right of voice in its policy. England may no longer assume an air of superiority towards the colonies and think to hold them by Royal visits and Imperial conferences. They are no longer children. Already they count more than a quarter of the English-speaking subjects of the Crown. Since the Constitution must be remodeled and Parliament reformed, let these be done to the fullest extent. Give the sons of the Empire seats at the Empire's council-board, and they will do more than their part for army and fleet. But if received into the Empire, they must come in on terms of absolute equality. There is no reason why the Prime Minister of the Empire should not come from the Cape of Good Hope; nor why Imperial peers should not come up to Parliament from Melbourne and Montreal; nor why members for Auckland, Johannesburg and Vancouver should not sit in the Imperial Commons beside those for Edinburgh, Dublin, and Manchester; nor why Canadian, Australian and New Zealand troops should not garrison Gibraltar and Malta and watch the Indian frontier while the English regiments are at Halifax, Esquimalt and Sydney.

These thoughts are simmering in many colonial minds. But it must be understood that the colonies make no demand. They have their own bright future. They do not need England, but England needs them greatly, as all the world testifies and the half-awakened English conscience acknowledges. But prejudice objects: "How is such a change to be made?" Why, then, boast of the flexible constitution, if it cannot transform the Parliament of England into the Parliament of the English and the Kingdom of England into the Kingdom of the English? Should Canada and Australia seek admission into the American Union, perhaps they would not be received, for many are opposed to such expansion. But were they received, a few formalities in Congress would be gone through and then the representatives of each Canadian Province and of each Australian State would take their places in the House and the Senate on equal terms with those from Massachusetts and New York. This could be done under a rigid constitution; can the flexible do less?

A Crisis in France

The Chicago Tribune published, on November 28, a striking article by "Ex-Attaché," who, taking occasion of the recent manifesto of the French Royalists announcing their intention to unite with the Catholics at the coming general election in opposition to the Government school policy, broadly reviews the character of the forces arrayed against the present régime.

As the publication of this article without editorial note or comment other than confirmatory headlines shows that the great secular journals are beginning to recognize the value of Catholic and conservative testimony as opposed to the Radical and Socialist travesty of current French events, a summary of "Ex-Attaché's" statements seems opportune.

The present crisis is due to many causes and may be best explained by pointing to a general feeling of despondency whenever the question of the republic is mentioned. Everyone admits the existence of evils calling for immediate remedy and of vital problems demanding solution. Anti-militarism, anti-patriotism, rampant immorality, disregard of the rights of property, increase of national debt, decrease of population, and above all, the loss of individual liberty are known to be the fruits of Socialism. But how can one look for the cure of these evils from the political system that has begotten them? Even so sworn a foe of monarchy as ex-Premier Clemenceau is credited with regarding royalty as the only alternative for the situation. Some say that it is because he is convinced of this that he purposely provoked the scene in the legislature last summer which enabled him to resign the office of prime minister and leave the legacy of trouble to Briand. The latter is so seriously alarmed that he has recently sought to soften the application of laws so oppressive that they would not be tolerated for one moment in this country, and has declined to accept the "scrutin de liste" bill, for which he has been clamoring for years, and which the chamber expressed its willingness to vote the other day by a large majority. His reason for refusing the offer was that the outlook was too troubled.

The colossal number of civilian employees in the pay of the government is one great source of financial alarm. They constitute an army of over 900,000, as compared with 250,000 in the last year of the empire, and cost $280,000,000 a year, more than one-third of the total national revenue. This army is constantly increasing and will continue to grow so long as the present system of government endures: for the state is able, by a little judicious tyranny, to command the votes not only of these civil servants but also of their relatives and friends. Yet France's national debt is advancing by leaps and bounds. This autumn Minister of Finance Cochery's budget shows a deficit of forty million dollars for the year. This will have to be met by new taxes; especially in view of the great cost of the old age pension scheme to which the present government stands pledged.

Another cause for despondency in connection with the republic is the falling birth rate. Official statistics show that during the first six months of the present year the deaths have exceeded the births by 28,203. There are a quarter of a million less births a year now than in 1870, and 150,000 less births per annum than in 1889. At this rate of retrogression, by the end of the present century the population of France will have dwindled from thirty-nine to thirty millions, while Germany is adding to its population at the rate of a million a year. An examination of all the explanations of this falling birth rate proves that the only satisfactory one is the progress of paganism and consequent self-indulgence. Even the most worldly and cynical students of this problem are compelled to admit that religious teachings are the only remedy that has proved in any way efficacious in arresting the evil. Now the course to which the republic is committed is the elimination of religion from public life. Thoroughly imbued with the belief that the republic is in favor of atheism and averse to religion in any form, the public school teachers of both sexes, instead of merely remaining neutral, endeavor to instil into the children's minds a dislike and disgust for "Christian superstitions and observances."

Here "Ex-Attaché" reviews the present conflict between the bishops and the government on the school question, which is dealt with more fully elsewhere in our columns. This conflict he proves to be due to the irreligious bias of the government which declines to authorize educational establishments other than its own, and has closed twenty thousand schools maintained by the Catholic Church, where education was free of cost. He continues as follows: "But it is not only the Catholic clergy who are arrayed against the state in this matter of education. The Protestant denominations are making, for the first time in history, common cause with their former rivals. French families of good old Huguenot stock are as incensed as Roman Catholics themselves at the latest developments of the educational policy of the state; and French Catholics and Protestants have been brought into close and sympathetic contact with one another by the wave of anti-Christianity. They are united for common action against the common danger; and the republic now finds itself confronted not merely by the Roman Catholic clergy and by the Roman Catholic families but by the Protestant clergy and by the wealthy and influential Protestant families—a combination which constitutes a powerful alliance.

"To this coalition must now be added the Royalists, who embrace most of the former Bonapartists, owing to the fact that neither Victor nor Louis Napoleon is willing to raise one finger in behalf of their cause, or even to give one word of encouragement to their adherents. It has been the custom to ridicule the Royalists because of their failure to take advantage of the opportunities that have seemed to come in the way of the pretender, the Duke of Orleans. But the latter, in pursuance of the policy of his great-grandfather, King Louis Philippe, is determined that if he does attain supreme power in France it shall be by the will of the people and by what may be described as constitutional means. He does not wish to reach the throne through the shedding of French blood, nor would he stand for a coup d'état so sanguinary as that which brought the imperial crown to Napoleon III on that fateful December night. He firmly believes, and there are many who share his belief that one of these days either the French legislature, or else some other representative French assembly, will summon him to take possession of the throne as the only means of halting the socialistic, atheistic course, with disaster at the end, upon which France is rushing." Virginia's Attitude Toward Slavery and the Union *

Not the least important provision of the Constitution is that found in Section II of Article III, which designates the Supreme Court of the United States as the official and final interpreter of our organic law. For the first fifteen years of its existence all the members of that august tribunal were of the same political complexion, for Washington and John Adams selected their nominees from the ranks of the Federalists; but Jefferson's first choice belonged, to use the terminology then in vogue, to the Republican party. Hardly had the Constitution been adopted when acrimonious controversies arose over its nature, scope, and meaning. The Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions of 1798 and 1799, the former drawn up by Vice-President Jefferson and the latter by James Madison, Jefferson's successor in the presidency, declared the Constitution a contract, and claimed for the States the right of interposing should the Congress exceed its powers. Copies of the resolutions were sent to all the States, but were not officially acted upon by any. The Act of South Carolina in 1832 in "nullifying" an Act of Congress was in strict conformity with the Kentucky Resolution of 1799. Shallow thinkers and flippant talkers are still found whose ignorance leads them to say that the war of 1861 was undertaken to free the slaves, and that by the Emancipation Proclamation President Lincoln affected to deliver from bondage all the slaves in the United States. Romance still passes for history.

Mr. Munford's volume gives us from official acts and in the words of prominent Virginians a comprehensive view of the attitude of the Old Dominion toward slavery and the Union. Love for the one and hatred for the other have so commonly been set forth as the State's normal condition before Lincoln's administration that whatever will place her in a more favorable light will now be welcomed by the dispassionate student of history. Going back to the colonial days, the author quotes with pride Virginia's able, though ineffective efforts to suppress slave traffic on the high seas, and reminds us that the famous Ordinance of 1787, confirmed by the first Congress under the Constitution, owed its success in the Continental Congress to the united efforts of the delegates of Massachusetts and Virginia. True, William Henry Harrison, a Virginian, was among those who prayed the Congress so to relax the Ordinance as to permit slavery in Indiana.

After the twenty years of slave importation permitted by the Constitution, the traffic did not cease. Blacks were brought in by the thousand. The sign of "New Negroes" was understood by all readers to mean that a fresh importation had been smuggled into the country and was awaiting a bidder. By a strange perversion of the sense of the law, the authorities, after seizing a contraband cargo, would fine the importer and then auction off into slavery the negroes whom they had confiscated. To Virginia belongs the credit of having enacted at an early date that negroes thus confiscated should be conveyed back to Africa. Virginians, too, were active in the humanitarian work of establishing free negroes or freedmen in that colonial fizzle called Liberia.

In spite of his formidable array of anti-slavery and emancipation sentiments uttered by influential Virginians, the author's attempt to clear the State of the charge of slave-breeding for profit does not seem to be entirely successful. The South Carolina planters, it must be assumed, understood the details of their business. When, therefore, they decided in convention that, in the cotton States, instead of looking after the slaves' health it was more profitable to use them up in seven years and get a fresh batch from the slave-breeding States, they knew something about the law of supply and demand. Whence did they get their stock? Of Virginia's love for the Union the author quotes many eloquent proofs. But, though Virginia claimed the right to put down by armed force any rising against the State laws, she recognized in the Federal government no right to put down by similar means the hostile action of a State against the Federal laws. When the steamer Star of the West undertook to re-occupy Fort Sumter, Virginia saw in that act the exercise of a power which the State did not recognize in the Federal government, and then she cast her lot with the Confederacy.

From the day when Christopher Columbus shipped his consignment of fifty Indian slaves to Europe, slavery was an institution in America. The first colony to legalize trade in Indian and African slaves was Massachusetts, which in the General Court of 1640, formulated laws for its regulation. Circumstances of time and place gave so prodigious a development to that peculiar domestic institution, that of the compromises of the Constitution, three bore on slavery and each was a concession to the slave States. These were: the basis of representation in the House of Representatives, the toleration of the ocean slave trade for twenty years, and the return of runaway slaves to their owners. If the Supreme Court had spoken authoritatively on the Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions the people, during the years of public tranquillity and political calm, might have become accustomed to the official meaning of the Constitution, the "Nullifiers" would have had either no reason to exist or no reason to fear force, and the whole history of our country from 1798 until to-day might have been writ in other words.

Stealing the Pearl of Price

Among the twenty men who were rescued a few weeks ago from the St. Paul's mine at Cherry, Illinois, was an Italian, Joe Peggatti, who on the fourth day of his imprisonment drafted his last will and testament. After declaring he was not afraid to die and invoking the "Holy Virgin," he thus addressed his wife: "I think my time has come. You know what my property is. We worked for it together, and it is all yours. You have been a good wife. May the Holy Virgin guard you. I hope this reaches you some time and you can read it. It has been very quiet down here, and I wonder what has become of our comrades. Good-by until heaven shall bring us together." Samuel Howard, another miner, shared the fate of those who perished. In his diary he wrote: "If I am dead give my ring to Mamie Robinson. Henry Caumicent can have the ring I have home. The only thing I regret is my brother that could help mother out after I am dead and gone. I tried my best to get out but could not. To keep me from thinking, I thought I would write these few lines. Sixteen (dead) to 1 P. M., Monday. The lives are going out. I think this is our last."

In an interesting editorial the New York Evening Post presents these bits of self-revelation as striking examples of how the common man thinks and writes in the presence of that most impressive of all facts, Death. His object in presenting them, however, is to show from a literary point of view the gulf between life and the literature of to-day which pretends to be a faithful mirror of life. The religious mind will find in these compositions food for more serious reflection.

The writer of the first was undoubtedly a Christian, strongly impressed with the great truths of Faith, a man who in the hour of supreme distress found in those truths his consolation and support. His companion met death stoically. Evidently a good man at heart, his thoughts are limited by the narrow horizon which shuts out God and a hereafter. He thinks of those who are dear to him, provides for them out of his humble store—a diamond ring or two—and regrets the loss of his brother.

who could help mother "after I am dead and gone." But of hope in a hereafter there is not an inkling.

His more religious comrade thinks lovingly of his wife whom he commends to the care of the Holy Virgin; he is not afraid of death, and he looks forward to a blessed reunion with his wife in heaven. No more striking contrast could be given of the influence of the sublime truths and the earnest convictions of the believer on his thought and action.

This composure in the face of death, this fervent appeal to the Blessed Virgin in what was felt to be his last hour may puzzle the casual reader and leave him at his wit's end to explain how a common Italian laborer can thus fortify himself so religiously when his hour has come. It is an occurrence which every priest meets in the daily rounds of his ministry. The remembrance of God's mercy, the thought of the Mother of the Redeemer and of her intercessory power with her Divine Son, heartens the dying sinner and fills him with a confidence which no earthly motive could impart. What are we to think, then, of those proselytizers who would seduce the unlettered and impoverished immigrant from allegiance to his religion and, stripping him of the precious heritage of his faith, leave him for a mess of pottage to struggle against the hardships of his lot without the religious props necessary to sustain him in adversity?

French School Manuals

Our French correspondent (AMERICA, Dec. 4, p. 204) gave several quotations from Le Temps, proving by extracts from official school manuals the dangerous tendencies of these text-books and their unfitness for school children's use. L'Univers, the great Catholic organ, gladly registered this avowal of the famous non-Catholic Paris daily in the following words: "Only the other week the Temps blamed the bishops and accused them of provoking agitation without motive. To-day it acknowledges that the episcopal intervention is fully justified and that the system of manuals of lay morality has produced enormous harm." The Temps, which is nothing if not a time-server and an equilibrist as to religious questions, replied, in a rather weak defence of its momentary fit of sanity, that what it blamed the bishops for was their attack on the principle of neutrality in schools, a principle which that journal, as a moderate supporter of the Bloc, feels bound to defend, although, given the postulate of possible objective truth, there can be no real neutrality between truth and error. Swinging, then, to the Catholic side, the Temps goes on to say that, "instead of a hazardous collective move of the departmental federations of teachers, it would have been better if none but the authors of the condemned manuals, who have serious reasons for deeming this being placed on the Index unjustifiable, had individually carried their grievances before the courts." But nowhere does the Temps withdraw any of its damning quotations from the manuals.

Nor could it, with any plausibility, defend these quotations. S. D., the well informed and impartial Paris correspondent of the New York Evening Post, in a letter which appeared on December 4, adds the following instances: "A manual of moral teaching for primary schools not only explains that morality has a basis independent of any revealed religion, but also that 'science' has shown there is no such thing as revelation. Another manual, found by the Bishop of Angers in use in his region, teaches that the existence of God and of the soul and the immortality of the soul, can all alike neither be proved nor disproved. A third gives as an example of priestly intolerance the attempt to force Sunday rest laws on the entire community. A fourth says certain early Christians were martyred because they so badgered the community around them. School histories of France have been condemned for making the Church of Catholics in general odious; and here some of the 'fathers of families' have scored. They have bought for their children the little histories of Professor Lavissee, who is beyond suspicion, and bidden their children learn their history lesson from his pages and not from the condemned class-book."

"S. D." puts his finger on the root of the evil when he says that "the French State claims a right to form the child's mind independently of its parents. It has always been a part of Republican teaching in France that the child belongs to the State more than to the family; and that the State has the right to defend what it considers the child's moral interests against the parents. As the State, in all republics, means eventually the majority of politicians who succeed in getting themselves elected as representatives of the people, such a principle may carry a nation far." This will no doubt be a revelation to many of the more thoughtful non-Catholic readers of the Evening Post; but this unnatural and tyrannical claim of the State has been combated by the Church for the past century and a half, ever since Jean Jacques Rousseau first advocated this slavish return to the State despotism of Sparta. This is the liberty of the French "Terreur" of 1794—liberty to choose between the guillotine and the infallibility of a fanatical mob.

L'Univers, in its issue of November 23, answering the Temps, appeals to its own exact reproductions of the latter's words and is delighted that its esteemed contemporary's excuses simply show that it is sorry for its avowals of November 17 and that it will regret having tried to minimize their effect. After quoting once more, from the Temps, those obnoxious passages of the manuals reproduced by our French correspondent, the Univers continues: "All this led the Temps to worry and complain. It even went so far as to say of the primary schools: 'That is not the place, under plea of political or philosophical opinions, to dismiss (destituer) God.' The organ of moderate atheism would have a God

. . . for children! One can hardly believe one's eyes. We now understand why the freethinking and laicizing journal should, two days later, have felt the need of retracting and again incriminating the bishops. For it was suspected of having gone over to the enemy or having lost its head. Just think of it! A system of school teaching that would respect the Divinity and speak of God as if He really existed! But this would be clericalism. To-day a man that believes in God is a clerical. Of this the Temps has been reminded by several persons. M. de Lanessan, sometime professor of natural history at the Medical Faculty of Paris, and former minister, reproached that paper with understanding nothing about neutrality. M. de Lanessan is the author of pretentious and vile books in which he writes that 'science has killed God.' M. de Lanessan even imagines that we know 'the inmost constitution of matter,' which is a remarkably asinine pronouncement (ânerie) amid so many asinine pronouncements on which the freethinking mind feeds."

The Univers goes on to remind its readers that the God whom the Temps tolerates for children is the fantastic creation of blasphemous philosophers. "The God of Hegel, the God of Renan, that God, it seems, would be acceptable. But one could hardly preach him to children. Anyhow, he would have no influence over them. The true, personal and living God, is the one whom the Temps has greatly contributed to banish from the public mind and to 'dismiss (destituer).' What can it do? The Temps hesitates, fumbles, hems and haws, confesses and retracts, appalled by its great laicizing enterprise, which is cracking over its head and under its feet."

Medical Education in Brazil

We have recently received a sketch of the Evolution of Medicine in Brazil, a paper read before the Fourth Latin American Medical Congress held at Rio Janeiro during the present year. This sketch (Esboço Sobre a Evolução da Medicina No Brasil, Rio Janeiro, 1909) contains many items of interest because it serves to show how much the Latin American countries anticipated the English American countries in the initiation and high development of professional studies. Professor Bourne of Yale called attention to the fact that the Universities of Lima and of Mexico, founded nearly a century before Harvard, developed into magnificent universities with all the undergraduate and graduate departments in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and counted their students by thousands while our American colleges numbered theirs scarcely by equal hundreds. This little sketch serves to show that the Portuguese in Brazil did as much as the Spaniards in the rest of Latin America for the development of all branches of professional education.

The author, Dr. L. Juliano Moreira, calls attention to the fact that the first Europeans to take up seriously scientific questions relating to medicine in Brazil were the Jesuit Missionaries. There are many interesting medical details in the chronicles of the order. They made notes with regard to the diseases from which the Indians suffered and the remedies which they employed. It was they who first found out how the Indians used cinchona bark for the cure of malarial fever, and introduced it into Europe, where indeed it was long called "Jesuits' bark." They made it a special duty to study all the Brazilian medical plants which the natives used in order to introduce any of them that might be useful into Europe. As early as 1582 Father Anchieta laid the foundation of a hospital for the wounded and the sick of Baldes' fleet on the spot where later was constructed the present Misericórdia Hospital of Rio Janeiro. From that time until the present century there is an unbroken current of tradition as to the development of medicine and of medical education in Brazil. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century only the preliminary studies were made in Brazil itself and the final clinical years of medical study had to be passed at the University of Coimbra in Portugal. How important the preliminary studies were considered to be and how much had been accomplished for medicine in Brazil will be best appreciated from the fact that when the University of Coimbra was reorganized about the middle of the eighteenth century two distinguished Brazilian physicians were appointed respectively to the chairs of anatomy and surgery in the mother country.

Just as soon as a medical school was opened in Brazil itself definite regulations were made so that a good preliminary education in Latin, French or English, philosophy, arithmetic and geometry was required, and then five years of study of medicine. In 1832 a new law was passed requiring somewhat more preliminary education and six years of medical studies. During the first year physics, botany and zoology; during the second year general and descriptive anatomy with medical chemistry and mineralogy; during the third year anatomy and physiology were studied. The fourth year was taken up with internal and external pathology, materia medica and pharmacy; the fifth year surgery, obstetrics, gynecology and the diseases of children. During the sixth year special attention was given to legal medicine, hygiene and the history of medicine, while during the last three years certain hours had to be devoted to clinical surgery and clinical medicine.

The Brazilians continued to raise their standard in this matter. In 1854 the number of departments in which courses had to be taken was increased from fourteen to eighteen and the preliminary requirements were increased. In 1879 eight new departments were added to the medical school and a year was added to the course. Immediately after the proclamation of the republic there was a further reform in medical teaching, and the law of January 12, 1901, created a department of bacteriology. All during the nineteenth century the legal status of medicine has been far ahead of our legal regulations for medical education in this country. It shows how thorough were the Spanish American peoples in their effort to secure high professional standing. North Americans have been so accustomed to think the only thing developed in South America was revolutions, that there is a constant and ever growing surprise in recent years as we come to know more about the details of education and culture in South American countries and learn how much more the Spanish American did for education in the long ago than the English Americans did. The subject deserves to be accorded wide attention because it will correct many false notions and serve as a basis for some real knowledge of the true history of American education.

New Lights on Divorce

We who are getting on in years read with proper enthusiasm in our well-regulated boyhood the stories of Capt. Mayne Reid. Of these one of the best was "The Boy Hunters." Three brothers were its heroes, the second of whom, named Lucien, was a precocious naturalist, a field naturalist always ready to rail at the naturalists who never get out of the study. George Elliott Howard, Professor of Sociology in the University of Nebraska has, in McClure's Magazine for December an article on Divorce, which brought back to our mind the old story-book, one must suppose by the law of contraries. For Professor Howard is a closet sociologist despising his practical brother, whom he calls contemptuously, the man in the street. Sitting in his study he has examined the statistics of divorce and the conclusion he has reached must astonish the man in the street who is in contact with the facts. He does not see clearly whether liberal divorce laws invite divorce or not: the man in the street sees it very clearly that they do, and that such as like divorce accept the invitation, while those that dislike divorce refuse it. He is quite sure that people do not seek divorce because they have grown tired of their lawful partners and want others more agreeable. The closet-naturalist, according to our boyhood's friend, Lucien, was quite sure that the pineapple and the long tree-mosses were of the same family. Lucien's disgust was unmeasured: perhaps that of the man in the street who sees the many undefended cases and knows the laws forbidding the marriage of divorced parties within a certain time, which some of the States where divorce prevails have made, may not be less.

These are trifles compared with the Professor's ideas of his own production. He thinks that the introduction of the decree nisi into our legal practice would help to reduce the number of divorces. The speaking of the decree nisi, a foreign thing, in an off-hand way, is impressive. Just think how many of the Professor's pupils whose anticipations lead them to take a lively interest in the divorce court, must have cried: "O Professor, do tell us what a decree nisi is." But had he looked into the matter and seen how futile the rare intervention of the King's Proctor usually is, he would not have recommended it as a practical means of diminishing divorce. And now the pupils may cry: "O Professor, do tell us what a King's Proctor is," which he with swelling chest will proceed to expound to the eternal glory of university culture.

But why does he propose means to make less frequent that divorce which he holds to be in the present social conditions, most righteous? Surely Prof. Howard is a daring thinker. He says things still more dreadful to make his hearers sit up and gasp. "The Christian idea of marriage is a plague. What do you think of that for an original sentiment? And to give it a greater semblance of originality, instead of: 'the Christian idea of marriage' I use the term, fire-new from the mint, 'Canon-law marriage'; and if any Roman Catholic tells you it is nonsense, don't believe him." After this the old story of how the Church in the Middle Ages connived at divorce by multiplying impediments, and allowed wide liberty in the matter, sounds tame, and the Professor finds it useful to throw another grenade. "The Catholic Church does not know how to deal with the matter. She is behind the times." This is mortifying for the Catholic Church, but, "there is balm in Gilead," as they say in the camp-meetings.

Notwithstanding her deficiencies Professor Howard of the University of Nebraska respects her for the courage and firmness with which she maintains her ancient ideals. Carry the news to Rome! How the Pope and the Cardinals will welcome it! But let them not be overjoyful. The Professor's respect is only provisional. If the Pope would enjoy it in perpetuity he must abandon those ideals and come to the Chair of Modern Sociological Truth at Lincoln, Nebr., to learn what he is to do. And a voice like to that of a Professor will teach him in these words: "Learn to speak less of Holy Matrimony and more of Holy Divorce (under present social conditions, of course). Abstain from calling divorce a plague, rather apply that epithet to canonical marriage. Have less of theology and more of sociology in your seminars. Do these things and I will respect you."

We have not dared to quote the exact words of the Professor in this summary of his article, but we have expressed his ideas as far as our weak intelligence has grasped them. If one of the modes of graft be to accept public money and furnish inferior supplies, following one's own fancies rather than the specifications, does it not seem that there is some of it in our State universities, and that the very professors who are most outspoken in their virtuous denunciations of municipal corruption are often, quite unconsciously, of course, as their self esteem could not allow them to suspect it, neither more nor less than grafters?

A Significant Resignation

Walter George Smith, the well-known Catholic lawyer, has resigned from the board of trustees of the University of Pennsylvania with which he has been associated for eighteen years, because he could not sanction either the views on marriage and divorce held by Professor J. P. Lichtenberger, or the appointment of the professor to the Wharton School of the University. Mr. Smith's objections to the professor were based upon opinions which the latter expressed at the annual meeting of the American Sociological Society in Atlantic City last December, in the course of the discussion of a paper by Professor George E. Howard, of the University of Nebraska, entitled "Is Freer Divorce an Evil." The views of Professor Lichtenberger were not such, in the opinion of Mr. Smith, as could be properly held by a professor in the university in the department especially dealing with sociological questions. Charles Custis Harrison, Provost of the University, has stated that the resignation of Mr. Smith has been accepted by the board with a very sincere regret. Mr. Smith was the only Catholic on the board of trustees. He is an active member of the Pennsylvania State Bar Association, and is prominent in Catholic societies of the country. As his resignation was handed in last May, though it was not accepted until late in November, it should not be regarded as connected with the Bolce articles, or with the charges of Bishop McFaul against the unchristian teaching of some of our university professors. Mr. Smith's action is significant for at least two other leading universities in the eastern States which have sought to add Catholic members to their boards of trustees. His protest in resigning is not merely that as a Catholic he cannot be party to the professors' teaching, but that apart from all question of religion, such teaching is against morality.

Canon Wyndham suggested in a letter to the London Tablet a form of Royal declaration in which the King would solemnly declare in the presence of God that he does not hold communion with the Church of Rome and does not profess its religion. Two priests immediately took him to task, questioning the lawfulness of such a suggestion, one saying that this course if persisted in, will call for the intervention and decision of ecclesiastical superiors. There is something to be said in favor of their view. The proposed declaration would be unlawful in itself, and to counsel an unlawful action is one way of being accessory to it. But there is much against it too.

Dr. Maxwell, Superintendent of Schools in New York City, would have some one prepare a catechism to teach lessons of honor on the model of the religious catechism he studied when a boy. By all means. The very attempt will prove that it is impossible to teach ethics without religion.

The Evanescence of Modernism

LONDON, NOVEMBER 24, 1909.

The late Father Tyrrell's book, "Christianity at the Cross Roads," the manuscript of which he completed just before his fatal illness, has been issued by Longmans, Green & Co. but has so far attracted very little attention. In fact, to use a familiar phrase, instead of its publication being an event, it has fallen flat. While Tyrrell lived his work was boomed in the non-Catholic and anti-Catholic press by writers who cherished the hope that he would be the rallying centre of a revolt among English Catholics. Apart from the man the book does not count and the man is gone.

Beside Father Tyrrell's grave at Storrington on the day of his funeral, the Abbé Bremond read some extracts from the manuscript of the book. Immediately after its publication comes the welcome news that the abbé has made a full public retraction, expressing his regret for his conduct on that occasion and making explicit submission to the decrees of the Holy See against Modernism. He has been absolved from the censures he incurred. The comments of the English press on the event show the bitter disappointment of the writers. One of them repeats the fable that "hundreds of priests secretly sympathize with Tyrrell's position," but will not risk their own by speaking out. The plain fact is that those who were misled by his propaganda of Modernism could be counted on the fingers of one hand.

The Anglican Church papers publish a correspondence between the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts, who writes as the representative of the American Episcopalians. At the Pan-Anglican Congress last year it was proposed to form a central consultative committee of the Anglican and similar bodies. Bishop Lawrence makes it clear that he and his colleagues suspect a design of Dr. Davidson of Canterbury to pose as a kind of Anglican Pope. The Bishop of Massachusetts says it must be understood that by the nomination of delegates to the proposed committee "no organic part of the American Church is committed to anything," and that "they may withdraw without question at any time." People in England for the most part are not aware that the Episcopalians are one of the smaller religious bodies of the United States and so are not amused at Bishop Lawrence calmly claiming to represent the "American Church." Archbishop Davidson hastens to reassure him that no organized union of English Established Protestantism and American Episcopalianism is contemplated. "No group of bishops," he writes, "need, unless it likes, depute any of its members to this body; no member so deputed need attend unless he likes; and no counsel given by those who thus meet can claim the obedience due to 'authority' in a technical sense." The Archbishop of Canterbury gives one more illustration of the fact that "authority" is non-existent in the Protestant churches.

There have been two cases lately in which the Anglican Church courts have refused permission for the erection of marble-topped communion tables in parish churches. In the latest case decided this week Dr. Tristram, the Bishop of London's vicar general, laid it down that the communion table must be of wood and removable and that a clear distinction must be drawn between the Protestant "communion table" and the Roman Catholic altar. This is one more legal assertion that the Anglican church has neither Mass nor altar, but a strange thing is that Dr. Ingram, Bishop of London, in whose name Dr. Tristram acts, is a High Churchman, and believes in Mass, altar and Eucharistic sacrifice.

An open air procession of the Blessed Sacrament is a notable event in England, for it can take place only where there is not only a strong body of Catholics, but also the assurance that the non-Catholics will be friendly and respectful. There was a very remarkable procession on November 16, at Isleworth, a country suburb of London. It came at the close of a very successful mission given by Father M. Power, S.J. Processions in the open air, which are still rare events, usually take place in fine summer weather. This was a torchlight procession in the darkness of a cold, rainy November evening. The rain ceased just before the procession issued from the church. The flaring torches made a great blaze of light around the canopy, which was preceded by the men and followed by the women of the congregation. The procession passed along the main road amid silent, respectful crowds. The procession then went through the grounds of a neighboring convent and returned by the high road to the church. After Benediction Father Power preached outside the church to the crowds attracted by the procession on the Catholic doctrine of the Holy Eucharist. It was the first procession of the kind in Isleworth for more than three centuries.

King Manuel of Portugal has been making a prolonged visit to England. He is just twenty and looks boyish even for his age. His youth, and the tragic story of the day when his father and his elder brother were killed beside him by the Anarchists of Lisbon, have made popular feeling very sympathetic towards him, and he received a hearty welcome from the crowds when he drove through London last week to visit the city as the guest of our Catholic Lord Mayor.

His mother, the widowed Queen dowager, is almost an Englishwoman. She is a daughter of the House of Orleans, born at Twickenham, baptized in the little Catholic church at Isleworth and partly educated at a local convent. For many years one of the most intimate friends of our King has been the Marquis de Soveral, the Portuguese ambassador. England and Portugal are united by a tacit alliance that dates back for hundreds of years, and a treaty of commerce has been signed during King Manuel's visit. There were persistent rumors that he was to be betrothed to an English princess, but so far there is nothing to show that the report had any real foundation.

Last Sunday he drove over from Windsor to the Jesuit college of Beaumont to hear Mass. Beaumont College is built round an old mansion dating from the eighteenth century, and once the residence of the famous Viceroy of India, Warren Hastings. It stands on the south bank of the Thames near the village of Old Windsor, where Saxon and Norman kings had a riverside residence in the days before the first castle was erected on the bold height beneath which the newer Windsor of to-day grew up. The old mansion of Beaumont Lodge was for awhile the Jesuit novitiate, but forty years ago the novitiate was moved to a house near London and Beaumont became the college of St. Stanislaus. Among the present pupils are several Portuguese, including the two sons of one of King Manuel's ministers. The college makes a feature of preparation for the army entrance examinations, and among its institutions is a cadet corps, which appears in the Official Army List as one of the "Officers' Training Corps." The cadets were under arms as a guard of honor for King Manuel, and after the Mass he was presented with addresses in English from the general body of the students, and in Portuguese from those of them who are his own subjects. The English address made a graceful allusion to the pleasure felt by boys in seeing a "boy-king" coming to hear Mass with them. In his reply King Manuel said he would remember his visit to Beaumont as one of the happy days of his life.

In previous letters I have more than once referred to "the escaped nun" of East Bergholt convent. The episode instead of doing harm to convents with the British public is likely to clear up many misconceptions among non-Catholics. Miss Moulton (formerly Sister Maurus) has taken to the lecture platform. But wherever she has appeared near London a lecture is given within a few days by Mr. Anstruther of the Catholic Truth Society, and he produces a document, which has also been freely circulated in the press. It is a statement signed by three Protestant gentlemen—the Church of England Vicar of East Bergholt, the Lord of the Manor, and a local Justice of the Peace. The Vicar published in his parish magazine a manly protest against the crusade of calumny carried on against the convent. The abbess thanked him and with the permission of the bishop proposed that he should come at any hour and day of his choice, accompanied by Protestant friends, and without previous notice to inspect the convent from end to end, and interview the nuns. The Vicar and his two friends accepted the proposal. They visited every part of the convent, and then in the parlor after saw the nuns privately. Miss Moulton had said that several of the sisters were eager to follow her example and "escape." These three Protestant visitors declare over their signatures that every nun told them she was perfectly happy and laughed at the idea of "escaping." They also testify that they found everything in the convent in perfect order, and were able to see for themselves that if any nun chose to "escape" there was nothing to prevent her walking out. The document has produced an excellent impression on the non-Catholic public. To-day, a leading London paper, the Daily Chronicle, publishes a long account of another Protestant inspection of East Bergholt convent. In this case the visitor was a reporter. He gives as his opinion that the life led at East Bergholt is one of happy, prayerful activity. He asked the abbess what would happen if a nun wished to leave the place, and the reply was:

"If she has well considered the matter and feels she cannot stay, she writes to the bishop asking that she may be dispensed from her vows. There is no difficulty. He writes back, giving her leave of absence, and, in the meantime, tries to get the dispensation from Rome. The Pope always grants it. There was a case of the kind here some years ago. A nun said she did not think she could bear the life, and she was granted a dispensation. Since then she has paid us several visits."

Several nuns had talks with the reporter, and all spoke of their happy contentment with the life they had chosen. One of them made a point in her defence of convent life, which evidently impressed her interviewer. "There are dens of iniquity in the world, are there not?" she said, "then why should there not be temples of sweetness and purity? I admire enormously those who do Christian work in the world, but I believe also very firmly in the efficacy of vicarious intercession. We pray continually for the world and hope thereby to make it better."

The French Academy and the Montyon Prizes

PARIS, NOVEMBER 25, 1909.

On November 14, the French Academy held its yearly meeting for the purpose of distributing what are called "les prix de vertu." In 1782 a wealthy citizen of Paris, the Baron de Montyon, presented the French Academy with a sum of twelve thousand francs, the revenue of which was to be given every year to any man or woman who had performed a remarkable "acte de vertu." Montyon's gift seems to have been dictated by mixed motives, he was a charitably disposed man, but also inordinately vain; without being an enemy to religion, he was not free from the vague, philanthropic, philosophical doctrines that were the fashion at that period. His offer was accepted by the Academy and the first recipients of M. de Montyon's bounty received his gift on August 25, 1783, in presence of an illustrious assembly. Since then, other donations have increased the fund, and every year the French Academy distributes a considerable sum of money to a large number of persons, who have distinguished themselves by deeds of devotedness, charity or courage. According to the custom established during M. de Montyon's lifetime, the ceremony is a solemn one: a member of the Academy makes a speech in which he introduces the recipients of the prizes to the public, touching lightly on their claims to this distinction. This yearly celebration always attracts a large crowd to the Academy and the speeches delivered on the occasion are, as a rule, delightful specimens of graceful eloquence. They have, besides this charm, a deeper meaning: it is curious to note, how in these days of religious persecution, the most interesting and worthy of the prize winners are the priests and nuns, whom the French Government persecutes in so cowardly and crafty a fashion; a proof that love of God is the strongest mainspring of noble deeds of charity.

This year, the task of presenting the prize winners to the public fell upon the Vicomte de Vogüé, a well-known figure in the world of letters. His speech was at once humorous and earnest; the task is by no means an easy one: for although the recipients of the prizes vary from year to year, their good deeds necessarily run much on the same lines and we can imagine that even heroism, might, in the long run, become monotonous. M. de Vogüé's opening sentences were singularly felicitous; he told his hearers how ten just men might have saved the doomed cities of Palestine; there are more than ten just among the humble winners of M. de Montyon's bounty. These winners, he added, are what we call the "poor and little ones of the world," but they ought, in truth, to be called "the great ones." In a humorous fashion, he owned that the prospect of making this particular discourse had always appalled him; "During twenty years I shirked it," he said. "At last, he could no longer avoid the unwelcome task, and he found himself, with a sinking heart, shut up in a large, bare room, with piles of documents before him, that contained the story of the different candidates. "A foolish prejudice made me dread the monotonous procession of good people that was to issue from that heap of papers." And he confesses that he began his work without either pleasure or enthusiasm. Then, as he read on, the atmosphere changed, the dull, bare room became illuminated; noble and pathetic figures, full of sweetness and strength seemed to surround the reader and he felt carried into a higher world, where self is absent and heroism reigned supreme.

In earnest and picturesque language M. de Vogüé then went on to tell his hearers of the brave men and women whose lives lay revealed to him; lives hidden by humility and generally brought into notice against the wishes of the candidates themselves. Among the most interesting of the prize winners are three young Breton nuns, to whom the sum of 1,000 francs was awarded. They belong to the Congregation of St. Joseph de Cluny and devote themselves to the care of the lepers in the island of Mangarewa, in the Pacific Ocean. So far from the beaten track is this lonely rock that letters are only delivered twice a year by a sailing boat from Tahiti. Here these three brave women conduct a hospital for lepers; until they become themselves victims of the hideous disease they bring hope, comfort and joy into the lives of these incurables. Their letters to their families in Brittany, says M. de Vogüé, are bright with charity and full of superhuman peace. Until lately, these noble sisters had a school for little girls, but the French Government, to whom the desolate island belongs, deemed that although they were worthy to nurse the lepers, they were unfit to teach the children of the islanders and, like their sisters in France, they were obliged to close their school.

The other examples of charity, quoted by M. de Vogüé, pale before the heroic sacrifice of these three Breton nuns. A large sum, 8,000 francs, was awarded to M. Rollet, a Paris lawyer, who has founded on his own initiative a home for little waifs and strays, where the boys are lodged and fed, employed in different trades and trained to become honest men. Another important prize, 5,000 francs, was given to a work founded by a priest in the wild mountains of Auvergne. In 1866, a young priest, the Abbé Robert, used in the gorge of Deveze, a wretched house, that had become his property, to lodge an epileptic child, whom he carried on his shoulders up the steep mountain path. Two poor women came to help him and the three, with their own hands, added to the house, where soon two, three, four and five incurable children were brought by their parents. Then Père Robert began to build in earnest, and now a large hospital for incurables, served by eighty nuns, stands in the centre of the gorge. Around it, are cultivated fields and orchards, and throughout the two "départements" of Cantal and Aveyron, this house, where hopeless sufferers find a home, is deservedly popular. Its founder, a saintly man, died last December, when he was more than eighty years of age, and the Montyon prize is awarded to the superiress of the hospital, who, during forty years, was his devoted assistant.

M. de Vogüé does not fear to draw attention to the fact that the best and noblest of the acts that he holds up for admiration were prompted by religious feeling: "However perfect may be the telescopes of the astronomers they cannot make them see certain stars that are too far away in the infinite space; but the existence of these stars is revealed by an atmosphere of light whose source we cannot reach. So it is with virtue, its light must come from a world far away and far above us, for nothing can explain its existence in the poor world that is brightened by its rays." If this conclusion appears to us somewhat vague, we must remember that the Academy is not a religious body, although many of its members are high minded and religious men. Better than any homily, the deeds of the best among the prize winners proclaim the fact that faith in God is the safest and highest road to charity towards men.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

A Central American on Turner's Yucatan

Under the title of "Sensation sans Sense," and the suggestive sub-title "Every time a jackass brays, he remembers something," The Clarion, of Belize, British Honduras, in its issue of November 25, pays its respects to John Kenneth Turner, who has been writing in one of the "yellow" magazines on "Barbarous Mexico," for his article on slavery in Yucatan. P. Stanley Woods, editor and proprietor of the paper mentioned, has grown to manhood in the colony; his standing as a gentleman of wide information, reliability and high social position is known and recognized in official and unofficial circles. We quote:

"For the past twenty years the writer has had close business associations with various parts of Mexico during which he has spent a year and a half in Yucatan enjoying the hospitality of the planters, including the gentleman to whom special allusion has been made [in Turner's article]. From his own personal observation amongst the Maya population engaged on the estates he most unhesitatingly asserts that he has never seen a happier and more contented lot working either there or in any other place in Central America. He was particularly struck with the paternal and kindly relations existing between the individual planter and his hands on the many occasions he has visited the latter while at work, as shown by the friendly enquiries, salutations and little conversations which passed between them without making any distinctions; while as regards the food supplied it was the best of its kind, according to the Mexican style, without strict or undue limit. . . . The labour is paid for in just the same way as in Central American places or British Honduras, viz., hiring by contract. . . . It looks as if he [Turner] were desirous of climbing into the ranks of well-known authors by perpetrating something ultra-sensational with appropriate illustrations based on the broad foundation of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.'"

British Honduras is separated from Yucatan by a river and not an ocean. Yucatecans trade back and forth to such an extent that Belize merchants employ clerks who speak Spanish and Maya. Mr. Woods is not a merchant and therefore is not personally interested in commerce, nor is he a government officer; but he has traveled so extensively in his own private interests that his opinion on any Central American subject is bound to be based not on fancy but on facts.

The American College Under Fire

Has it come to the point in the development of specialization among us that an "absolutism" has come into being which forbids a criticism of educational methods unless it proceeds from one who pertains to the esoteric few? Doctor Nicholas Murray Butler, in an article, "The American College under Fire," which appears in the current number of the Educational Review, indulges in statements which lead one to ask the question. Speaking of recent criticisms of the present position and value of the American college, Dr. Butler sarcastically refers to one source as "set in motion by the lapping waves of that presently popular tide whose yellow is, as the dictionaries have it, a token or symbol of jealousy, envy, melancholy. Probably through inadvertence, the dictionaries omit to add the word ignorance. This crude criticism of the baser sort may be first disposed of. Because ignorant, it is impertinent."

The President of Columbia has in mind the direct charges made by a Catholic Bishop regarding the ethical and religious teachings common in the secular colleges and universities of the day. One is tempted to ask, does Dr. Butler forget that the amenities of refined discussion forbid one to accept abuse as argument? Or, is it possible that a mere outsider, however capable and intelligent, however interested in the welfare of the youth now in training to bear the burdens of manhood, cannot question the logical trend of much of the present day influence in college training? The crude criticism referred to has made no uncertain charges. The natural duty of those who are responsible for such training appears to the ordinary mind to demand a fair answer showing the unfounded character of the indictment, or, in default of this, a manly admission of the contention and a refutation of the evil consequences of the asserted teachings. A flip-pant affirmation that the criticism is based on ignorance and therefore impertinent is unworthy of one in Doctor Butler's position. And especially is it unworthy when the ignorance claimed does not exist.

A recent declaration of one of Dr. Butler's confreres in university work in this country may be quoted as an illustration of the kind of religious teaching in certain American institutions of our time. President Jordan of Leland Stanford University on November 25, addressed the Chicago Sunday Evening Club on the theme: "The Call of the Century." His speech as summarized was to the effect that as in the case of individuals we find well-marked lines of difference separating one from another, so too in centuries. "Hence," he affirmed, "the twentieth century is a 'religious age,' not in the sense that its teachings or practice shall be determined by the Bible or creed or symbolism or any special church. For the Bible is but a human record, full of error and absurdity, written subsequently to the events described whose accuracy and worth are further discountenanced by numerous errors incident upon ignorance and the ceaseless changes attending its transmission, and hence it makes no difference at all whether the whale swallowed Jonas or Jonas swallowed the whale. Bible, creed, ceremony, church and symbolism may help a few, but for the great majority they are useless. They do no harm but assuredly they do no good." Is it crude, ignorant or impertinent to criticise such teaching as destructive of all Christian religion? Or, will Dr. Butler airily protest that the universities are no more responsible for what their presidents say than the same presidents are for their professors?

The Neglected Habit of Thrift

The public health is a heavy charge on New York's civic purse. The care of the sick cost $11,142,592 in 1908, and men whose opinions are worth something hold that nearly half of this went in the care of illness due to the crowded tenements. Moreover, special appropriations, $5,000,000 for the tuberculosis campaign alone, are demanded to reduce such preventable disease. Landlords are getting large rents for tenement houses. The city is paying large sums on account of these houses. It is easy to jump at the conclusion that the landlords' greed is the cause of this heavy expenditure. This is hardly correct. There are greedy landlords; but these show their greed by neglecting the sanitary conditions of their houses, something the health inspectors can always remedy, and by evicting tenants whose rents are somewhat overdue. But the working classes do not live in tenements because landlords are greedy and will not give them anything else, but because they like to be near their work. The problem is much more complex than it appears at first sight.

Again, it is said that the hospitals are crowded with underpaid working people. This also seems to be an exaggeration. There are niggardly employers, but there are thousands of thriftless employees. Wages have increased, the hours of wages have diminished, and along with these the means of spending wages uselessly have multiplied. The most important natural means of bettering social condition is thrift, and we fear that too little is being done by sociologists to promote it while the first effect of Socialism is to discourage it.

If hospitals are crowded with these penniless employees, they crowd the bar-rooms, the cheap theatres, the dance-halls, the Sunday resorts, the cheap finery shops, the restaurants and ice-cream parlors, the cigar stands, and surround the slot machines, and the pool-sellers for many a day before they reach the hospitals. A habit of self-denial, of turning a piece of money over two or three times before spending it, of not carrying one's bank in the pocket, on the part of all, would reduce municipal expenses wonderfully in all departments.

Time's Swift Revenge

It is nearly ten years since the pamphlet, "President Eliot and Jesuit Colleges," by Rev. Timothy Brosnahan, S.J., was hailed by the Bookman as "one of the neatest bits of controversial literature that we have seen in a long, long time." Doctor Eliot was at that time an autocrat in the American educational world and his pet theory was electivism, viz., that students on entering college should choose their own courses instead of having them arranged and imposed upon them by an exacting faculty. Father Brosnahan's brochure subjected this theory to a keen analysis and showed how it failed to meet the tests, not only of experience, but of common sense. Brilliant as was Father Brosnahan's performance, and welcomed though it was by conservative professional educators, still to a large element of college workers, blinded by the glory of Harvard and its president, it was merely a faint voice in the wilderness crying out in vain against the ruthless march of progress. If Father Brosnahan felt the discouragement of unequal conflict with popular majorities and trusted to the future for the confirmation of his views, he must experience some satisfaction over the latest reports from Cambridge.

"The elective system," says a correspondent to the New York Sun, "instituted at Harvard by President Eliot and copied throughout the country as a model, has been smashed. President A. Lawrence Lowell is responsible for the change, and the faculty has by a vote approved his stand. President Lowell believes, and has said so on many occasions, that the elective system has not developed the best in students; that too much freedom has given them a smattering of many subjects but little training in any one."

This is practically the substance of Father Brosnahan's conclusions ten years ago. However, his satisfaction and ours at time's revenge must be tempered by the mournful conviction that it will take years for the country to recover from the period of educational whimsies which a great college and great personal prestige introduced, prolonged and made respectable to the scandal of the petty educators to whom a name is better than an argument. Such experiments are costly when they lower the intellectual standard of an entire generation.

The Limits of Sociology

Nurses know how disheartening is a refractory patient who will not obey orders and rails at the doctors because he is not well. They ward off for the moment the worst consequences of his illness with palliatives; but the time must come when these will no longer be effective, and they wonder whether the postponing of the inevitable be worth the trouble it involves them in. Modern society is such a patient. Christian sociologists are its nurses: the Pope and the bishops are the doctors, drawing their science from the Gospel. This gives an infallible remedy, bitter indeed, for it means privation and present renunciation; and society, which clings to sensuality and persists in loving this world and forgetting God, in hating Christ's cross and the perfect adjustment of all things in the life to come, will not hear of it and rails at the physicians. There are sociologists who think they can heal the patient steeped in moral debauchery with such remedies as public ownership, government workshops, the better housing of the poor, the extirpation of disease, prohibition, parks and playgrounds, democratic institutions, diffusion of knowledge, arbitration, peace societies, conferences between the representatives of capital and of labor, etc. The Christian sociologist is under no such delusion. Such things in themselves are but palliatives. Some of them may, with God's blessing, in their proper place and degree help towards the reestablishing of social health; but the radical cure is to be found only in the Gospel expounded by the Church to which Christ committed it. He uses those things as far as they are just, he studies how to use them most profitably, because he looks for a day when society will come to its senses and accept without reserve the healing of the Gospel. This is the substance of the teaching of the great Leo XIII.

"Gentle is as Gentle Does"

Matthew Prior, a poet of social attainments, when twitted with his lowly origin, asked the old question:

When Adam dived and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?

It would not matter much according to W. K. Chesterton, who defines a gentleman as "a man with a particular kind of good manners produced by a particular kind of economic security and uninterrupted lineage." His manners are merely external conventions which some inherit and others, such as sailors and butchers, do not; he may be a thief or even a liar, "of a particular kind," and still be a gentleman, for it is not what he is but what he seems to be that wins the designation. Thus has the good word gentleman shared the fate of "villain," which once designated an honest farmer; so that now one prefers to be called unequivocally a man. But fortunately, though "the grand old name of gentleman" has depreciated, the thing for which it stands continues to exist. "Economic security and uninterrupted lineage" are not associated with miners, yet we have been reading lately a true story of real gentlemen in a coal mine—the last place Mr. Chesterton would look for his conventional type.

Twenty-one rough miners, mostly Slavs and Italians, had been entombed for seven days in the Cherry coal-mine, Illinois. They raised a barrier against fire and gas and then fairly divided what food remained. This was soon exhausted and the only water to relieve their burning thirst was the scanty drops that seeped from the coal walls. There was one sick man and all agreed that he should have the first share. Later two others became sick; the greater part of the water supply was given to those three and only one man of the remaining eighteen objected to the sacrifice. First-class passengers of shipwrecked vessels have not such a record. There was one pencil among the men and with that one pencil they all signed this declaration: "We, the undersigned, do not blame anyone for the accident that happened to pen us in here and we believe that everybody has done all in their power to relieve us. With best wishes to all concerned." Cardinal Newman says that a gentleman is thoughtful of the feelings of those present. These rough men were thoughtful of even the absent though their own sore straits might well exclude all other thoughts; and then, cooped up in their dark death dungeon, they continued to sing a hymn.

After seven days the barrier was broken open. The first message shouted to the rescuers was this: "Most of us are all right but there is one poor fellow, a Frenchman, who is almost gone. He'll be dead in a few minutes if he does not get fresh air." And they all denied themselves "fresh air" until Father Heaney had anointed that poor man before he died. When they heard that others were probably alive in the mine, Walter Waite, one of the rescued men, cried out: "Then I am not going out of this mine until I get the others," and he had to be carried out by force. Could a gentleman be more heroic?

Waite's son, Leonard, a little crippled boy, had thought his father dead. When he heard his father was alive he "threw away his crutches and ran without aid for the first time in his life." That the son of such a father should possess such vital force is not incredible.

The story strengthens one's faith in human nature. Gentle men are more numerous than "gentlemen." The word had a fine significance when men of English speech revered and strove to imitate "the gentle Saviour." It was then that "gentle is as gentle does" grew to be a proverb. The Cherry coal-miners have stood the test. God's image shines as brightly in coal-mines as in clubs.

In a day when no man is trusted, it is gratifying to record that the transfer of the control of the Equitable Life fund by Thomas F. Ryan to J. Pierpont Morgan, closes a great chapter in finance without question of the motive of the man who saved the fund from looters.

Portugal and its Cocoa Trade

Acting Consul-General of Portugal in New York City, A. S. Gouyea, has issued a protest against efforts to establish a boycott on cocoa from Portuguese West Africa, on account of alleged slavery and abuses of natives there. The agitation in favor of the boycott is the work of an agent of William Cadbury, cocoa manufacturer of England, and is encouraged by the Anti-Slavery Society of England. The statement of Mr. Gouyea insinuates that the attempt to boycott is engineered by those interested in the colonies of the British West Indies, cocoa from which has fared badly of late because of the great reduction in price brought about by competition of the cocoa from West Africa. The Consul-General affirms that the Portuguese Government has through its supervision of the cocoa plantations made slavery and other abuses impossible. He concedes that abuses exist in the interior of the West African islands where settled government has not been as yet established, but contends that his government has fully met this situation by absolutely prohibiting the recruitment of laborers in the remote interior.

Strike Among Manila Cigar- Makers

Labor is by no means in a settled state in the Philippines. The Manila Times of October 13 gives a graphic account of a strike among the tobacco workers of Manila who are adopting some of the methods used by American labor unions to bring their employers to terms with other features reminding us of the darker methods of the Black Hand. The strike began on September 26 and for a time it was believed that through the intervention of the Bureau of Labor in the Philippines the matter would end amicably. The hopeful were doomed to disappointment. "Last night and this morning," says the Times, "the strikers maintained guards around the factory for the purpose of intimidating those who desired to go to work, and effectively prevented them from so doing. The police have now taken a hand, but they are powerless to cope with the strikers." Accordingly an investigation was issued against the leaders by Judge Crossfield and a deputy sheriff accompanied by the chief of the secret service started out to serve the restraining order of the court. At the time the Times went to press banners were being carried through the streets of Manila bearing the inscription in Spanish:

"Union Obrera

" Filipinos!

" Strike and Boycott!!

" Against El Oriente "

Appended to the inscription was the request that all active sympathizers, especially women, should carry these banners through the streets day and night. The police took into custody four members of a mob that had attacked a party of workmen and they were held on the charge of assault and inciting to riot. What has caused most apprehension is the discovery among the striking workmen of a life-pledge or contract quite as iniquitous as the "Pacto de Sangre" of the Katipunan Society. Translated from the Tagalog it reads: "I, N. N., am a cigar worker in the Oriente factory; I bind myself firmly not to violate the compact of my brothers which was entered into on the 26th day of September of this year; and at the same time I swear that if I am unfaithful to the cause, they are at liberty to kill me without incurring responsibility for the same with the authorities of this Archipelago." Anonymous letters to various employees in the factory, threatening them with death unless they quit work prove that the strikers are determined to win at all hazards. All which goes to show how fast the little brown brother is learning. At this rate it will not be long before he is sufficiently educated in the ways of occidental civilization to enable him to assume all the burdens and responsibilities of absolute independence.

The Naundorf Claim

For some years past a family named Naundorf, living at Delft, Holland, claims lineal descent from Louis XVII, son of Louis XVI and a prisoner in the Temple during the French Revolution. He is commonly supposed to have died there on June 8, 1795, but according to the Dutch claimants he was secretly rescued from his brutal keeper, Simon, and safely hidden in Holland, where he assumed the name of Charles William Naundorf, married, reared a family, and died in 1845. His grandchildren are the present claimants. M. Boissy d'Anglas, a Senator and a descendant of the Boissy d'Anglas who was one of the judges of Louis XVI, but refused to vote for his death, is to interpellate the French Government on the claim of the Naundorfs to the rights of French citizens under the royal name of Capet de Bourbon, as great-grandchildren of Louis XVII. Should the Government deny the claim, it will be driven to make public all that its archives contain concerning the unfortunate Dauphin and his supposed descendants. Premier Briand, like Clemenceau before him, promised thoroughly to examine the Naundorf papers, but since then, like Clemenceau, he has maintained a sphinx-like silence about them. The interpellation of the Premier on this subject is looked upon with suspicion by the Royalist party as a clever move to divert public attention from the Duc d'Orléans and his followers who have recently come into prominence by adhering to the collective letter of the French Episcopacy on education.

The citizens of Rochester, N. Y., are to erect a monument to the late Bishop Hendrick. It was from there he went to the Philippines. A solemn pontifical Mass of requiem was offered for him in the Cathedral of Rochester, Thursday, December 9.

LITERATURE

Habit-Formation and the Science of Teaching. By STUART H. ROSE, Ph.D., Head of the Department of Psychology and the Principles of Education, Brooklyn Training School for Teachers; Lecturer on Educational Psychology, Adelphi College, Brooklyn, N. Y. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

The importance of the formation of good habits has been emphasized almost to triteness by writers on education. The nature of habit has been extensively treated, it has been differentiated from instinct, propensity, and habitude, its relation to hereditary has been minutely discussed, and many attempts have been made to formulate its laws. But the methods by which good habits may be formed have received the scantiest attention, and the teacher has been left to discover by experience how this very important and much emphasized work of education may be compassed. A little more than twenty years ago Dr. Paul Radestock wrote on habit a monograph which has been translated into English; this little work is interesting and suggestive in many particulars, but it hardly more than hints at the method of habit-formation. Dr. Rowe has made an attempt, which must be pronounced fairly successful, to give something like adequate treatment to the neglected subject. His book is designed to present "in scientific form the relation of habit to education," and to point out the way by which the child may be assisted to form good habits. The book contains fourteen chapters, a short appendix giving the method-form employed in the Brooklyn Training School for Teachers to impart knowledge and to form habits, a comprehensive bibliography of works dealing with some phase of habit, and an excellent index. A good idea of the scope of the work may be had from the titles of the various chapters. There is a brief summary at the end of each chapter.

The book of course makes a strong appeal to those engaged or about to engage in public-school teaching, and it is but natural that Catholics should not be satisfied with such statements as, "Education is most satisfactorily defined in terms of its aim, which in its turn must be derived from the end of man as determined by ethics," and "We throw the limelight on a man's belief and fail to emphasize his conduct." The dissatisfaction is due to the partial character of the statements, since Catholics maintain that the end of man is determined by religion, and that faith without works is dead. But Dr. Rowe evidently had no intention to be unfair, and he has not entirely overlooked Catholic writers in his bibliography. Slightly modified, he takes Father Maher's definition of habit instead of Radestock's. Radestock's cumbersome definition is the following: "Habit is the disposition of a psycho-physical organism by which it is enabled on given (outer or inner) inducements directly to perform relatively similar functions, simple or complicated (directly, that is, in a being more highly developed psychically, without any preceding consideration and arrangement of separate actions by a decided impulse of the will)." Father Maher's definition states directly, "By a habit is now commonly understood an acquired aptitude for some particular mode of action."

One of the results of the Herbartian pedagogy has been the formalization of the steps of instruction in practically every subject of the elementary school course. Not long ago, however, it became evident that the formal steps of instruction have to be modified when applied to subjects in which the purpose is not the attainment of knowledge but the acquisition of skill. Dr. Rowe now makes clear what every teacher ought to be aware of, but which formal pedagogy has tended to confuse, viz., that lessons involve habits as well as ideas. He points out that good teaching involves the recognition of the distinction between ideas and habits so as to determine what automatisms should be formed, or, in other words, what are the points that require drill. Of course Dr. Rowe does not advocate the purely formal drill of the memoriter type. Thus, in discussing the teaching of reading, he says: "The habit of getting and rendering the meaning is to be striven for from the first," and "In composition, evidently, the habit of speaking and writing in sentences, in dividing them into clauses and phrases for a closer glimpse of the parts, is essential. But before that a habit of free expression must be developed." He does not omit specific mention of the various automatisms that have to be acquired in order that the main habit may have a chance to be formed. Nor is the discussion of habit-formation limited to the acquisition of good habits of study.

Discipline comes in for a fair share of treatment, and reference is made to the very prevalent tendency among teachers to follow exclusively systems of teaching the various subjects of the school course, whether these systems are the embodiment of their personal experience or the formulation of plans as found in text-books. One of the good results to be expected from the careful reading of books such as Dr. Rowe's is in the habit the teacher forms of seeking the principles underlying the several activities of the class-room, and of making the methods employed the application of the principles with due consideration of the attainments of the pupil and of the end proposed in the activities themselves.

Les Contresens Bibliques des Prédicateurs, par J. V. BAINVEL, S.J. Deuxième édition, revue et augmentée. Paris: Lethielleux. 2 fr.

The first edition of Father Bainvel's work on misuse of Scripture-texts appeared in 1895. A second edition is now called for in France and elsewhere. The purpose of this Jesuit professor of the Catholic Institute of Paris is to call attention to some of the texts of Holy Writ that are very commonly used, rather, abused, by an accommodation that is not borne out in the sacred text. Catholic exegetes commonly lay it down that there is only one literal meaning to Holy Writ. The face value of the words that is inspired and God-intended is one and only one. Besides this God-intended word-meaning of Holy Writ, there is also a God-intended type-meaning in certain portions. Some persons and actions of the Bible are types of other persons and actions thereof. The Fathers speak of the blood of the lamb that washed the posts and lintels of the houses of the Israelites in Egypt as the type of the Blood of the Lamb that washed away the sins of the world. This type-meaning is not a meaning of the words. The words have one and only one meaning that is inspired. To give this one meaning of Scripture is to interpret the Bible. To apply the words of the Bible to any other meaning than this one inspired is called accommodating the Scripture.

Until the time of the Reformation, the fitting of the Bible-words to a meaning that was never intended by God was a very common practice. St. Bernard uses the very language of the Bible to such an extent that one may say his style is Biblical. In St. Bernard's day there was no danger of misunderstanding his meaning; he ran no great risk to lead the people into a wrong interpretation of the Word of God. Now the state of things is altogether otherwise. Protestants have been so arbitrary and fantastic and multiform in their interpretation, that it is of the utmost importance to insist on the one and only one God-intended meaning of the Holy Writ. Hence we should do more interpreting than accommodating of Scripture nowadays; we should rather use the inspired meaning than play with the uninspired words of the Bible.

When we interpret, we should make use of the original text; we should look at the context. Scripture is not a heap of isolated texts, but a living and jointed whole. If we rely merely upon the works of past preachers and ascetical writers, we shall often make egregious blunders. Again and again we hear the preacher insist: "This is the will of God, your sanctification."

He interprets it as if St. Paul meant that our striving after the perfection of the counsels were God's will in our regard. If he only looked at the whole text, he would read: "This is the will of God . . . that you keep from fornication." (I Thes. iv.) The one and only inspired meaning of the text is that we keep from fornication. To use the text in any other sense is not to give the meaning of Holy Writ, but to fit the words to a meaning that neither the writer nor the Author had in mind.

If we accommodate and do not interpret, Catholic exegetes are unanimous in saying that it is fit to apply the words to a kindred meaning and not to far fetched or contrary meaning. Not only the text but the context, too, should fit in with the person to whom we accommodate Scripture. We often find on the pedestal of a statue of St. Joseph the words: "Posuerunt me custodem." The context goes on: "Non custodivi." The Sisters would never apply to St. Joseph so uncomplimentary a text, if they knew its context! Take another instance. Cardinal Newman writes: "Quickly they go, the whole is quick; for they are all parts of one integral action. Quickly they go; for they are awful words of sacrifice, they are a work too great to delay upon,—as when it was said in the beginning, 'What thou doest, do quickly.'" Here the great cardinal fits to the priest the words that mean the treason of the first bad priest. It is against such abuse of Scripture that Father Bainvel writes. His collection of misused texts is most instructive and useful to the priest.

WALTER DRUM, S.J.

Trauer und Trost, an den Graebnern unserer lieben Toten, von ANSELM FREIHEREN VON GUMPPENBERG. Regensburg, New York: Fr. Pustet.

In this collection of 170 funeral sermons the author's intention is not so much to serve as a model, as to open a source of thoughts from which priests may draw the subject-matter of their short addresses at funerals. What pastors look for in such works is not ready made sermons, but a variety of appropriate thoughts, which will enable them, after a short meditation, to pour the balm of consolation into bleeding hearts. This book undoubtedly offers a great wealth and variety of thoughts; but we would have preferred had the author arranged these thoughts under more definite headings, instead of giving us ready sermons. The book would have lost in bulk, but gained in merit, if he had omitted the detailed sketches of the lives of the deceased; for the incidents in the life of the deceased, the application of the thought to a particular case, cannot be found in a book, but must be taken from the circumstances in that particular life. The very extensive index (pp. 594-632) will be of great help for a ready selection of the desired subject-matter. Wherever the tradition of the parish compels the busy pastor to preach at every funeral, the book will be both useful and welcome.

C. F. A.

A Source History of the United States, by HOWARD WALTER CALDWELL and CLARK EDMUND PERSINGER of the University of Nebraska. Chicago: Ainsworth & Co.

This work is brought out "in the hope that it may aid in solving the problem of the better teaching of history." It is to be used in secondary schools in conjunction with the text-book, or as the basis of class work with access to other authors.

The bane of a teacher's life is an unintelligent, parrotlike recitation from a student who seems to be only an animated phonograph. The pupil who not merely memorizes but also learns to reason, to compare, and to draw conclusions is the promising pupil. The ideal which the authors have in view is high and not without its difficulties; but by quotations from documents and references to the better known school histories they have made personal investigation and comparison at least feasible.

Our High Church Anglican friends will sniff at the "Protestant Episcopal Church" of Henry VIII (p. 34). The burly Tudor autocrat was no Protestant and no sympathizer with them. The reference to the Anglican John Wesley, whose posthumous child was Methodism, should not be shut up in a class book: "Mr. John Wesley, who had come over as a clergyman of the Church of England, soon discovered [manifested] that his aim was to enslave our minds. At last, all persons of any consideration came to look upon him as a Roman Catholic [for] he most unmercifully damned all Dissenters of whatever denomination." (p. 142).

It is well to note (p. 315) President Jefferson's opinion of the Louisiana Purchase: "The Constitution has made no provision for holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union." Besides the great and historical facts and principles of the republic, many delicious tid-bits bearing on social and political matters have been diligently gathered together for the student's benefit. The great constitutional questions and the events hinging on them are handled with perspicacious impartiality.

The Christian Philosophy of Life, by TILMAN PESCH, S.J., translated from the German by M. C. M'LAREN. St. Louis, Mo.: B. Herder. Price $4.50, net.

"Amid the eager rush to secure the means of life, there is danger lest the purpose of life be ignored." These words from the author's preface are an exhortation to take up the study of this world's problems under the guidance of the unfailing light of faith. From the love of truth and fidelity to conscience we are led by the imitation of Christ to the glorious consummation. Six hundred and fifty pages attest the keen spiritual discernment no less than the unflagging industry of the reverend author who here sums up in almost aphoristic utterances what he had taught in the pulpit, in the confessional and in retreats, but especially by his own living example, during almost half a century of religious life. The work is an amplification of the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius. As they can be followed with great spiritual advantage not only by religious but also by those whose vocation is in the world, so Father Pesch's encyclopedic book will furnish solid instruction to all who take seriously the object of life and strive after those "better gifts" to which St. Paul invites us. Open it at random and find in a line matter for serious reflection.

The Faith of Catholics, compiled by REV'DS. J. BERINGTON AND J. KIRK, with Preface, etc., by RT. REV. MGR. CAPEL, D.D., Domestic Prelate of His Holiness, Leo XIII. New York: Fr. Pustet & Co.

A third and enlarged edition of this work speaks well for the good taste and discernment of Catholic readers. The Church is often charged with having drifted away from the teachings of the early Councils and from the purity of faith which characterized the first centuries of our era. To meet this objection of our adversaries, the authors made a diligent study of the Fathers of the first five centuries and drew up in orderly fashion their testimonies on the authority and inerrancy of the Church, on the Scriptures, on private judgment, on the sacraments, and on the many other questions in which the views of the various sects are not in harmony with Catholic teaching. The Rev. J. Waterworth spent four years in patiently revising the work, in verifying quotations from the Fathers and in adding fresh references, the fruits of his own deep researches. The final touches have been given by one whose established reputation for theological learning adds materially to the worth of the work. In divinely guarded security, the Church looks back upon the past and its trials and without misgiving, contemplates the future and the ordeals that may come. This is the heartening lesson set before us in a most erudite work.

Reviews and Magazines

In a learned and interesting article in the December Ecclesiastical Review Dom Feasey, O.S.B., reviews the festivities and external observances of Christmas-tide and shows that they are largely Christian adaptations of customs that antedate Christianity. Rev. T. Campbell's eloquent plea for a more extensive study of positive theology from Scripture and the Fathers is equally remarkable for soundness of view and literary suggestiveness. Fra Arminio, in an illustrated article, urges a resumption of the chasuble form adopted by St. Charles Borromeo as more artistic and ample, but the model he offers scarcely bears out his contention. Rev. A. Brucker, S.J., commences a series of papers on Ecclesiastical Heraldry with the object of correcting errors in the coats-of-arms of church dignitaries. His story of the rise and fall of the "noble science of armory" is instructive and often amusing. His implication that Sir Bernard Burke is always reliable requires limitation. Among the Studies and Conferences we would particularly commend Rev. Arthur Dunne's "Remedy for Mixed Marriages" to the careful consideration of every pastor in the country. The "Farewell Sermon" is bringing Canon Sheehan's great story to a noble close. In this connection it is but just to state that the Catholics of the United States as well as general literature owe a debt of gratitude to the editor of the Ecclesiastical Review, whose enterprise and literary insight first introduced Canon Sheehan to the American public. To have been sponsor for "My New Curate," "Luke Delmege," "Lisheen" and "The Blindness of Dr. Gray" is an achievement of which any editor might be justly proud.

The Catholic World's Christmas number is so full and finished that it is impossible to do it justice in a short notice. An account of the Nativity pageants of Catholic England, by Rev. R. L. Mangin, S.J., marks the contrast between their "mingling of innocent mirth and childlike devotion, their depth of spiritual suggestion, with the frank vulgarity and thinly-veiled lasciviousness of many of our modern fairs. . . . The 'glorious' reformation gave the mystery plays their death-blow," with the result that "to-day 'Merrie England' sounds like sarcasm." There are two excellent Christmas stories, one of the Tyrol, by Jeanie Drake, and the other truly Irish, by Pamela Gage; also a pretty Christmas poem by Katharine Tynan. The same author's serial, "Her Mother's Daughter," introduces the reader to high English society whose talk is reminiscent of Oxford, but the hero will soon visit Ireland, where "those Kerry fjords in June will be simply ripping." Rev. C. Plater, S.J., reviews the condition of modern democracy in "The Background of Life," and finds the most hopeful sign in the Retreats for men that have lately found a new development in England and the United States. "Catholics and the Public Library," by E. L. Haley, is a thoughtful and practical contribution on a matter of pressing importance; the story of the Manchester Catholic Conference and Canada's First Church Council will also afford instructive reading to Catholics. Rev. T. V. Moore, C.S.P., exposes Professor James' latest fallacies and palpable contradictions, and Maurice Francis Egan contributes a fine poem from Elsinore.

In the literary section of the New York Times of December 5, Maurice Francis Egan, American Minister to Denmark, writes on "Hamlet as a Real Dane." The paper is a review of Shakespeare's great tragedy in a Danish environment. After a study of the Castle at Elsinore, Mr. Egan finds it not difficult to believe that "Shakespeare in some capacity or other, perhaps as a young man too unimportant to be mentioned in any list of actors, visited Denmark and the Castle of Kronborg" (Elsinore). He shows that many points in the tragedy are cleared up if one grants in the playwright an acquaintance with the court of Christian IV, whose sister was Queen to James I. As an instance, the dumb show, performed in the body of the play, is quite in keeping with Danish traditions.

An explanation that is illuminating is given of the word "crants," which occurs in the lines:

"Yet here she is allowed her virgin crants,
Her maiden shrewments, and the bringing hence Of bell and burial."

This word which to-day in every flower window in Copenhagen is spelled "Krans," is evidently another Danish importation, says Mr. Egan. "The very name Rosenkranz, according to the family legend, is due to the zeal of one of its earlier members for the wreath of roses, the 'rosary,' or beads, who took it with a Pope's blessing, as his surname to show his zeal."

"Hamlet," he concludes, "can only be understood in relation to its background—the thought, the point of view, the philosophy of the sixteenth century, and the key to the heart of the mystery lies in Denmark of that century."

The Cosmopolitan puts first in its December number a gossip commentary on a set of pictures of "Children who will be Kings." The story is told attractively, but pictures and commentary provoke sad thoughts. Who can tell in these changeful times whether the lot of these little-ones will not be exile or even a cruel death, instead of the ancestral crown? From this point of view they are, perhaps, timely in the last month of the dying year. But there is another year less known to the readers of the Cosmopolitan. The last month of the civil year is the first of the ecclesiastical. In it we dwell constantly upon the coming to men of the one Child whose throne was to be for ever and ever, whose earthly Kingdom must endure to the end of time. But of this Child and this Kingdom the popular magazine has nothing to say. Its function is to please the children of this World sitting in darkness and the shadow of death and loving their darkness rather than the light.

EDUCATION.

The banquet and reunion of the "old boys" of St. Gabriel's School, New York, held at the Marlborough Hotel, November 30, should not be allowed to pass with a word of mere chronicle. The two hundred and fifty of the former pupils of this "notably successful parochial school, among them men of distinction from every sphere of the active life of the metropolis, in their welcome to their old pastor, now Archbishop of New York, celebrated that evening the golden jubilee of an event which marked a most important step in the early growth of Catholicity in this part of the country. Some old-timers will recall the circular issued by Archbishop Hughes in 1850, in which he placed himself in the forefront of the movement for the building of the parish schools. Shortly before the State legislature had enacted laws looking to the organization of a system of general education in which, under the plea of excluding sectarianism from elementary education, they attempted to divorce all religious instruction from the public schools. In his circular Archbishop Hughes made no attempt to conceal his views concerning the new law. "I hope that the friends of education may not be disappointed," he wrote, "in their expectation of benefit from this system, whilst for myself I may be allowed to say that I do not regard it as suited to a Christian land, whether Catholic or Protestant, however admirably it might be adapted to the school conditions of an enlightened paganism." It was in this same circular, whilst instructing his people, as good citizens, to pay the taxes the new law imposed upon them, although they might not accept "the doubtful equivalent which is to be given for the taxes collected," that Archbishop Hughes first made use of the slogan that was thereafter the rallying cry of Catholics in their work for Christian education—"I think the time is almost come when it will be necessary to build the school-house first and the church afterwards."

In the founding of the parish of St. Gabriel's there was exemplified for the first time and to the fullest extent Archbishop Hughes' motto: "The school before the church." When, in 1859, the Rev. William H. Clowry was appointed pastor of the then newly constituted parish his first care was to erect a school-house. On a number of lots donated by Prof. Henry James Anderson, of Columbia University, a distinguished convert, he erected two large, well-equipped school buildings, one for the boys and one for the girls. The church was not built for five years, being completed in 1865, and in the meantime the congregation used the school building as a temporary church. That school, but recently torn down to make way for a thoroughly modern school edifice, made a worthy record in the history of parish school training in New York. St. Gabriel's school has trained many of the clergy of the diocese, and in law, medicine, as well as business and political life, many of its former students have won distinguished place. No wonder Archbishop Farley, guest of honor at the reunion, who had presided over the destinies of St. Gabriel's parish for seventeen years previous to his elevation to the Archbishopric of New York, was deeply moved as he looked out upon the familiar faces before him. "Fifty years," he said, "fifty glorious years have passed since the day of the venture which made St. Gabriel's the pioneer in carrying out the principle of erecting church and school together." His Grace in his address made ringing appeal for justice in behalf of parochial schools and deplored the fact that Catholic parents are compelled to pay a double tax in order to educate their children in the love of God. A feature of the enthusiastic reunion was the presentation of $2,500 to the present pastor of St. Gabriel's, Rev. William Livingston, a sum donated by members of the alumni to help along the work of Catholic education.

In the Philippine Catholic of October 29 there is a very interesting sketch of the history of the College of S. Juan de Letran, the accompanying pictures of which show that it is an institution equipped with all the modern conveniences to be found in the best colleges of Europe and America. The college dates from the year 1630, when its foundation was laid by the charitable work of Brother Diego de Santa Maria, a member of the Dominican community of Manila. The college is still under the direction of the Dominican Order and is affiliated with the famous University of Sto. Tomas. We know so little about our "little brown brother" that it will probably surprise many to learn that the students at this college numbered 2023 in 1883. The list for 1909 contains 746 names in spite of all the drawbacks that the results of the war of occupation and the revolution offered to the prosperity of educational institutions in the Philippines.

The Advent lectures of the extension course of the Catholic Summer School of America are being delivered on Friday evenings at the Catholic Club, by Dr. James J. Walsh and Mr. Thomas Augustine Daly. The lectures begin at 8.30 o'clock. The annual musicale and reception of the Alumnae Auxiliary Association of the Summer School will take place at the Hotel Astor on the evening of Wednesday, December 29.

SCIENCE

Dr. Thomas Jonnesco, Dean of the University of Bucharest, Roumania, and associate member of the medical faculty of the University of Paris, who has merited the title of "the man who has dared," is visiting America to demonstrate to the medical profession his discovery of a compound of stovaine and strychnine as an anesthetic. He claims that patients, under the influence of the drug, have watched the operations performed on them, have laughed and talked while these were in progress, and when they were over, have left the operating table and walked to their beds.

On Dec. 6, Drs. Leo Berger and Benjamin Jablons are reported to have operated on Mrs. Ida Muskowitz, in the Har Moriah Hospital, New York, applying the anesthetic, novocaine, their own discovery. During the operation, which necessitated a cut of several inches, the patient felt no pain and, though afflicted with heart trouble, experienced no injurious results. The details of this operation are not given minutely; but exact details are given of four operations directed by Dr. Jonnesco on the following day, Dec. 7, at the Rockefeller Institute, New York, in the presence of 50 eminent physicians. All the patients were perfectly conscious during the operation, and felt no pain nor hurtful consequences.

Professor T. J. J. See, director of the United States Naval Observatory at Mare Island, whose so-called "capture theory," intended to supplant the nebular hypothesis of La Place, has already been noted in AMERICA, announced to the Astronomical Society of the Pacific a few days ago a novel explanation of the origin of the lunar craters. Since the time of Galileo it has been generally believed that these craters are volcanic; but this Dr. See denies. In proof he points out that the typical crater on the moon is a very large circular depression with steep walls inside, sloping walls outside and a small central peak with its top below the average top of the crater surface, and assumes that volcanic eruptions could in no wise cause a depression nor could any force directed from within hollow out a circular trough about the peak in the center. Another difficulty which he judges the volcanic origin fails to meet, is the overlapping of the craters.

Dr. See holds these craters to be indentations caused by the impact of the smaller satellites upon the moon's surface before it was drawn by the earth into its present orbit. The roughness of the moon's surface, he thinks, favors his theory, a roughness unaffected by atmosphere or water as in the case of other planets that have been similarly pelted.

Father Searle, C.S.P., gives a detailed forecast, in the December Catholic World, of the appearance of Halley's Comet. It will probably pass the perihelion at 4.30 A. M., Greenwich time, April 20, 1910, and across the sun's face between 7.30 P. M., May 18, and 1 A. M., May 19, New York time. The transit will probably be noticeable in Northern Europe, Asia and the Pacific Ocean, but hardly in the United States. The comet itself, if seen at all, would be an indistinct blur on the sun's surface, unless there is a decided concentration or a solid mass about the nucleus. Its distance from us will be one-sixth that of the sun and "its hundred thousand miles of coma and several million miles of tail should produce some effect on the light coming through it." Its tail will point directly towards us but will do us no harm, affecting only sensitive scientific instruments. It will appear early in April and can be seen best before sunrise. It will remain until the end of May and then, going behind the sun, can be again caught by telescopes in the winter of 1910-1911.

Emulating the Germans, the War Department designed a balloon-destroying gun. Its trials at Sandy Hook, however, proved it a failure, twenty explosive shells fired at the close range of 1,000 feet missing the target. Experts who were present refused to say whether the failure was due to poor marksmanship, difficulty in finding the range or the gun's mechanism. The Department of Ordnance, however, is understood to be preparing further experiments to find a means to cope successfully with the aerial foes which may play an important part in future military operations.

The growing use of radium salts in medicine has raised the price of that rare substance enormously. Experiments have therefore been made in the hope of discovering a mechanical means of obtaining rays of the same nature as those emitted by radium. A Philadelphia physician stated lately before the Maine Medical Association, that cocoanut charcoal can absorb radio-active rays to a high degree. It is charged in the following way. Air from a compressor is passed through a wash-bottle into a tube containing a solution of radium, and thence into a tube of cocoanut charcoal, which thus acquires a radio-active energy it will retain for weeks. This charcoal can be administered internally or applied externally.

ECONOMICS.

In his annual report the Secretary of the Interior recommends that the Government retain the title to all water-power sites, leasing them to responsible parties for periods of which the maximum shall be thirty years, with rights of renewal upon specified terms. The lessees shall deposit plans and specifications of their proposed work and pay a substantial fee; they shall be bound to develop 25 per cent. of the power within four years unless for adequate reasons the Secretary of the Interior grant an extension of time; a moderate charge shall be made on capital or gross earnings, to be adjusted every ten years; failure to fulfil conditions or combination to extort unreasonable prices, or failure to keep the works in operation shall cause the forfeiture of the lease; the books shall always be open to the inspectors of the department.

The tunnel through the Andes to connect Argentina and Chili has been completed, so far as boring is concerned, and it is expected that trains will be passing through it about next April. It is about 10,300 feet long, that is, nearly two miles, and is about the same height above sea level. Work was begun at the Argentine end in October, 1905, but was carried on with little energy. At the Chilean end more work was done. In February, 1908, Messrs. Walker & Co. (limited) took over the work in Argentina, and in December of the same year that in Chili.

The Jesuits of Madrid, Spain, have opened, under the title of El Instituto Católico de Artes é Industrias, what an enthusiastic writer styles an Industrial University. The program includes forging, casting and fitting metals, and mechanical and electrical engineering.

"The preponderatingly theoretical nature of our teaching," says M. H. Villaseca, "was and continues to be in most cases a true national calamity. From our institutions of learning do not come forth ordinarily young men equipped to compete successfully in the struggle for existence, but rather charlatans unprovided with common sense, champions scantily endowed with what they need to occupy an honorable position in the arena of life."

The school is amply provided with fine workshops and laboratories. The hours of instruction are from 8 A. M. to 6.30 P. M., with an intermission of an hour and a half at midday.

Reports from the charitable societies in New York that fewer came to the Thanksgiving dinners than they had provided for indicates that the condition of the workers has improved. City officials confirm this by observation and assert that the general situation is most gratifying.

SOCIOLOGY

A Catholic Women's League has been organized in London, under the patronage of the Archbishop of Westminster, with Father Bernard Vaughan, S.J., as spiritual adviser. Its stated object is to appeal to all Catholic women to recognize the greater efficacy of organized over unorganized work, and of corporate as contrasted with individual influence, and to band themselves together on the strength of the interest and the privileges which they have in common. And it calls upon them to do this in order that the following ideals may be realized: (1) That the practical work which lay women do for the Catholic cause may reach the highest state of efficiency and may more effectually meet the immediate needs of the time. (2) That the moral and intellectual influence of Catholic women may be more directly exercised in counteracting the anti-Christian propaganda of the day. (3) That the experience and knowledge of those who come of Catholic families, and the experience and knowledge of converts, may, by a closer co-operation, be employed to a greater advantage. (4) That the waste of energy, of time and of money which result from overlapping, or isolation, may be prevented. (5) That the number of Catholic social workers may be greatly increased. (6) That practical training in the various branches of social work may be brought within the reach of all. (7) That solidarity and a habit of concerted action may be established among Catholic women, which will be invaluable when some Catholic interest or principle is at stake. And that those members of the League who have enjoyed special opportunities for studying the various social problems and perplexing questions of the present day, may help others to form opinions consistent with the teaching of the Catholic Church. And that thus Catholic women of all classes may be better enabled to range themselves upon the side of Christian progress.

The program of the League for the current year includes ten lectures on social science in two courses.

Mayor Galvin of Cincinnati has issued an order to the police to arrest all theatre owners and billposters who persist in flaunting illustrated vice in the face of the public by indecent theatrical posters and play bills depicting crime.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The flourishing state of the Church in the New York Archdiocese is indicated by the number of cornerstones of churches and schools recently laid and the number of new schools and churches dedicated. Since September 1 the total number is eleven and their value more than $600,000. Besides these a number of important buildings are under construction. Among the new churches are Our Lady of Mercy, Fordham; St. Brendan's, in the Bronx; the Immaculate Conception, Stapleton, S. I.; the Incarnation, on the upper West Side; St. Athanasius' Church, Hunt's Point; and the latest, Our Lady of Mount Carmel, Mount Vernon, which was dedicated by the Right Rev. Thomas F. Cusack, Auxiliary Bishop of New York, on December 5. The new Chapel of St. Sebastian, at Fort Slocum, was solemnly blessed by His Grace Archbishop Farley on November 14. The chapel is for the use of the Catholic soldiers at Fort Slocum and was built by the voluntary contributions of the parishioners of the Church of the Blessed Sacrament, New Rochelle, of which the Rev. Thomas P. McLoughlin is the pastor.

A meeting of the parochial branch of the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews was announced to be held in the Town Hall, Kensington, England. Lord Swaythling and other Hebrews of standing protested against the letting of the Town Hall to help "the turning of bad Jews into worse Christians." Notwithstanding, the meeting was held, the Bishop of London presiding. A Jewish gentleman asked how many converts the society had made, and whether it be true that each costs £2,000. The Secretary put the question aside by answering that the society's object was to set Christianity before the Jews and leave them free to accept it or not.

The Universal Association of Catholic Children, founded by the Countess Clotilde de Hamel de Manin, to unite children of every nationality in a crusade of prayer for the defense and preservation of Catholic education, numbers two million members. The Pope has sent his blessing to the little crusaders, and all who assist them in their work.

Of the amount needed to decorate the Chapel of the Sacred Heart, in Westminster Cathedral, London, $1,750 remains to be subscribed. It is believed that some American Catholics might wish to assist in finishing this shrine, and for this an appeal is made to their generosity during the Christmastide.

Last week the Good Shepherd Sisters of Newark held a three days' celebration in honor of Blessed John Eudes, founder of the Religious of the Good Shepherd, who was recently beatified by Pope Pius X. On the last day of the Triduum solemn Pontifical Mass was celebrated by the Right Rev. John J. O'Connor, D.D., Bishop of Newark, and a sermon was preached by the Very Rev. J. R. Meagher, Prior of the Dominican Convent, New York.

PERSONAL

Mr. Louis Brennan, inventor of the Brennan torpedo and of the gyroscopic mono-rail, of which he has recently given a successful exhibition in London, was born in Castlebar, Co. Mayo, Ireland, and married a daughter of Mr. Michael Quinn, of that town. He was from 1887 to 1896 superintendent of the Government Brennan Torpedo Factory, of which he is at present Consulting Engineer. The first mono-rail for commercial purposes will soon be in operation in Cashmere, India. Mr. Brennan estimates that it can easily attain a speed of 140 miles an hour and that danger is practically negligible.

Archbishop O'Connell of Boston celebrated his fiftieth birthday on December 8. He was born in Lowell, Mass., on December 8, 1859. "All that I am," he has said, "I owe to my mother." To few men of our time has it been granted to offer so interesting and distinguished a career of fruitful work as the result of lessons so lovingly acknowledged.

In the recent appointment of Denis McCarthy, of Syracuse, as Fiscal Supervisor of State Charities, Governor Hughes has selected one of the representative Catholics of this State. Mr. McCarthy is peculiarly fitted for the duties of this position inasmuch as he has had a wide business experience, and has long been active in charitable and philanthropic work.

The Rev. Dr. Leo McGinley, of Philadelphia, has been appointed Secretary to the Apostolic Delegation in Washington.

The Rev. Dr. Thomas C. O'Reilly has been appointed Chancellor of the Diocese of Cleveland, succeeding the Right Rev. Mgr. George F. Houck, who has held the office for the last thirty years.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"Septimus," Hackett Theatre.—Rarely does a novel lend itself to successful dramatization, even though its story be in itself dramatic. This is largely due, no doubt, to the fact that when once a subject is fitted into a certain literary form it is difficult to recast the mould. But a novel of a purely psychological character is above all others least adaptable to the stage, and Wm. J. Lockes' "Septimus" in dramatic setting is an anomaly. The interest of the book is so purely psychological that even its perusal grows wearisome. Transferred to the stage the lights and shades of the story and the subtler delineation of character almost entirely disappear. Mr. Arliss' impersonation of Septimus Dix is in many respects admirable. The irresponsible, whimsical, inconsequential and unselfish elements of the character are brought out with fineness and delicacy, but the pathos—and in this lies the intensely human interest of the book—is entirely missed. Septimus on the stage is ridiculous simply; in the book the ridiculous side of his character is redeemed by the pathos of his unselfish and unconscious devotion to his ideal. In Mr. Arliss' characterization Septimus is laughable but scarcely lovable; in the book he is indeed laughable but very lovable. The story consists in the generous and impulsive act of a young mechanical genius in marrying a fallen girl in order to shield her from shame. This phase of the story as exploited on the stage is over frank and bold and grates on refined sensibilities.

"His Name on the Door," Bijou Theatre.—A play dealing with a fraudulent insurance company and dishonest lawyers, with the addenda of a love story whose course does not run smoothly. Its construction is loose and its situations crude. The love story is subordinated entirely to that of dishonest financiering and has little vital interest on the plot. It is hard to discover the raison d'être of "His Name on the Door."

"Arsène Lupin," Lyceum Theatre.—A melodrama much above the average. It is of the "Raffles" type, the story of a gentleman thief, who follows burglary simply to gratify his desire for excitement and adventure. It is based on a series of daring robberies by Arsène Lupin, who as the Duke of Charmance has ingratiated himself into the favor and friendship of a wealthy family, even to the extent of becoming engaged to the daughter of the people he is robbing, for the furtherment of his plans. Meantime the companion of the young woman to whom he is engaged falls in love with him and becomes the unwitting accomplice of his crimes, and even clings to him when she discovers, through his own confession, that he is the perpetrator of the robberies. The incidents are well worked out and a good deal of wit and humor interspersed, without violence to the movement, to relieve the tension of excitement and smooth away the sometimes highly exaggerated melodramatic moments. The denouement leads to nowhere; Lupin, entrapped by the officers of the law, escapes and disappears. The story is simply melodrama; utterly improbable and without the slightest ethical significance. It is, however, thoroughly well constructed and sustains the interest unabated from beginning to end. It is the cleverest play of its type that has been presented on the American stage for years.

"Inconstant George," Empire Theatre.—A clever, clean and humorous play. Inconstant George is typical of his name, and his inherent weakness of falling in love with every member of the fair sex whom he chances to meet, with consequent and embarrassing complications, furnishes the theme of the comedy. After wooing and winning three fair ladies, he falls captive to a whimsical young lass who finally holds him, much to his own surprise. The texture of the plot—if plot it can be called—is very fragile indeed, but withal it is highly amusing. John Drew, who essays the rôle of the Inconstant One, is a bit too staid in his delineation of the character and does not altogether rise to its youthful and ebullient feature. But Mr. Drew is no longer young and Inconstant George is very young indeed.

The return of Barrie's "What Every Woman Knows" to the Empire Theatre will be welcomed by theatre goers. The play is wholesome and full of human interest. It is a story of womanly devotion, wit and sanity. One of its most admirable points is its keen exposition of the folly and sheer silliness of what is wont to be called in modern drama and fiction a problem under the high-sounding name of "sex affinity."

Mr. Barrie has a delightful way of showing up the folly of what some moderns, under the stress of a view of life all awry, have distorted into tragic problems. Ibsen would have made a lugubrious drama out of one episode of "What Every Woman Knows." Mr. Barrie has depicted it as it really is, the nonsense of some seriousness. "What Every Woman Knows" is worth while knowing.

OBITUARY

The Reverend Henry J. Dumbach, S.J., for years a popular and efficient member of the Jesuit Community of Chicago, died on December 3, from prostration following a shock that came to him whilst engaged in the round of his regular duties the day before. Father Dumbach was noted for his personal kindness, which perhaps more than any other characteristic had made successful his long years of service in prominent position in Chicago and won for him the sincere regard of a numerous following in that city. He was born in St. Louis, August 17, 1862, and after completing his college course in the Jesuit University of that city he entered their novitiate at Florissant, Missouri, July 26, 1879. Father Dumbach spent the subsequent years until his ordination in 1893 in study at Woodstock, Maryland, and in professorial work in the colleges of the Society in St. Marys, Kansas, Chicago and Cincinnati. Following his ordination to the priesthood the deceased priest was sent again to Chicago, where he filled a subordinate executive position in St. Ignatius' College until September 3, 1900, when he was promoted to the charge of President of that institution. His term of office will be memorable for the perfecting of the plans for the development of a University out of the college course, which began in 1870. As a preliminary step to the material expansion of the institution Father Dumbach secured a large piece of property along the north lake shore and well removed from the commercial and manufacturing districts. Here a new parish was organized and arrangements were made for the immediate erection of Loyola Academy, the first of the imposing group of educational buildings planned by the Jesuits in their new home. Father Dumbach lived to see the happy completion of this first step in this great undertaking, not, however, as President of the institution. Failing health led to his retirement from office early in 1908, since which date, although frequently urged to take a long rest to recuperate his failing strength, he insisted upon filling some active charge in the parochial work of the Holy Family Church attached to St. Ignatius' College. Father Dumbach will be affectionately remembered by the many who came into contact with him in his unselfish labors in the cause of Catholic education in Chicago.

The Rev. Victorinus Scheppach, S.J., died in Buffalo, N. Y., on November 28. He was born in Bavaria, February 14, 1848, and entered the Society of Jesus in 1870. After his ordination he was stationed in Portico, England, in Jamaica, and came to Buffalo in 1887, where he taught at Canisius College. He was next pastor of St. Mary's Church, Cleveland, for eight years, and then went back to Buffalo as rector of St. Ann's parish.

The Rev. A. Reineke, the oldest priest in the diocese of Belleville, Ill., who had been pastor of St. Dominic's Church, Breese, for fifty-one years, was buried on November 30. He was 77 years old.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I beg to thank you and all the editors of AMERICA for the kindness in sending me a bound copy of the first copy of this Review. At the same time permit me to offer you my sincere congratulations for the great success of AMERICA, and for the great good which it is doing amongst our people. May God bestow upon all the co-operators of this great Catholic work his choicest blessing.

Yours truly in Christ,
D. FALCONIO, Apostolic Delegate.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I wish to thank you very much for your courtesy in sending me the first volume of AMERICA. Your new venture has passed through its period of probation and has not been found wanting. Its praise is on the lips of many, and it has succeeded in meeting the desires of our best people, who have been looking forward so long for something of this kind. Praying God's blessing on the enterprise and the writers, I am,

Very sincerely yours in Christ,
JOHN M. FARLEY,
Archbishop of New York.

A CORRECTION.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the issue of November 20, p. 160, the paragraph on the blessing of the 65th regiment armory, at which I was present, states that the Archbishop gave his blessing after the laying of the crowning stone. To be correct, as your paper always endeavors to be, you should have said that the crowning stone was blessed before the laying by Sir Frederick Borden took place, i. e., that precedence was politely given to the Archbishop. I take the liberty of mentioning this fact for the sake of future reference.

Yours sincerely,
D. MASSON.

Montreal, Nov. 23, 1909.

I firmly believe your fine paper is bound to produce much good fruit.—Rev. Joseph Hallé, Levis, Canada.

CHRONICLE

The Week at Home.—In his annual report to Congress Attorney General Wickersham makes explicit statement regarding the intentions of the Government in the Sugar Fraud cases. "While it is feared," he says, "that the statute of limitations may have run in favor of many of the malefactors who are responsible for these frauds, yet no effort will be spared to ascertain the precise amount of which the Government has been defrauded, to recover all moneys due, and to punish all those who may be found to have participated in any respect in the frauds, whether as officers or agents of the importers, or as officials of the Government." He makes special request for an appropriation of $50,000 to prosecute this work effectively. Equally clearly does the Attorney General state his purpose to undo as far as can be the frauds "which have been for so long a time perpetrated in the procuring for private individuals of portions of the public domain contrary to the conditions under which Congress has authorized these lands to be patented."—A deadly harvest was reaped by the terrific storm which passed over Lake Erie last week. Late reports show that fifty-nine lives were lost and more than $1,000,000 worth of shipping was laid waste.—Food prices just now are higher than ever before known in this country during December, and within a small fraction of one per cent. higher than ever known at any time according to Bradstreet's Review for the week.—A legal fight which will be followed with unusual interest began this week in the United States Circuit Court sitting in Buffalo. Backed by a million dollar corporation the Wright brothers are endeavoring to prove that Glen Curtiss and the Herring-Curtiss Company have infringed their aeroplane patents. The action presents a striking contrast to the attitude of the Wrights three years ago when they offered to sell to the Aero Club of America all their patents and to build ten aeroplanes for $100,000. The sole condition attached to the offer was that the club bind itself to present all the secrets of the invention to humanity. Equally striking is the fact that some of the present-day stockholders in the company ready to spend a fortune to defend the Wright patents declined three years ago to invest one dollar in the same patents.—The interminable friction among civil, military and diplomatic officers on the Isthmus ever since the work of canal construction was placed in charge of Col. Goethals, has been the subject of discussion in frequent conferences of late between the President, Secretary Knox and Secretary Dickinson. It has been decided that it will be for the best interest of both this Government and of Panama to abolish the post of Minister to Panama and to combine the diplomatic and civil duties in the office of Governor of the Canal Zone.—After years of fruitless endeavor, submarine mines have been placed in the deep waters of the "Race" at the eastern entrance to Long Island Sound, thus better fortifying New York against attack by sea than ever before. The announcement of the solution of this difficult problem comes from Gen. Arthur Murphy, chief of the Coast Artillery, in his annual report to the Secretary of War.—A temperature near the zero point over practically all of the Middle West, following the snow-storm of last week, caused considerable distress for several days throughout that section. Telegraph companies found themselves handicapped in transmitting messages because of broken wires. These breaks were quite general, every line out of Chicago being disturbed. The difficulty interfered more-over with the dispatching of trains. Officers of the companies said the conditions were as bad as at any time in years.

Report on White Slavery Traffic.—But one ray of comfort leaps out of the most revolting disclosures of an international system of traffic in the degradation of men and women contained in a report of the white slave trade submitted to Congress by the United States Immigration Commission. The commissioners report that they were unable to find any evidence of "a great monopolistic corporation whose business it is to import and exploit unfortunate women." The most vicious feature of the sensational charges in recent magazine literature thus goes unconfirmed. But almost every other phase of the fearful story finds a place in the striking setting forth in the report of well attested facts as to the compulsory consignment of innocent immigrant girls to an evil life. "It is unnecessary," says the report, "to comment on the ruinous influence upon domestic and social life or on its horrible effects which come alike to the guilty and the innocent." The report fully bears out the President's declaration in his recent message: "I greatly regret to have to say that the investigations made in the bureau of immigration and other sources of information lead to the view that there is urgent necessity for additional legislation and greater executive activity to suppress an evil which, for want of a better name, has been called the white slave trade."

National Rivers and Harbors Congress.—Probably the most interesting features of the sixth convention of the Congress were the enthusiastic reception tendered to the President and the strong address in favor of waterways improvement made by Mr. Taft in response to the hearty greeting. The President based his approval of the purpose of the Congress on the influence the desired improvement would exert on the reduction of railroad rates, as well as its value in transportation of that kind of freight that the rivers were especially adapted to handle. He warned his hearers of the need of tact, telling them that "the test of your strength will come when you get off this platform and begin to favor a project instead of a policy." Cautioning the delegates to remember that there was great opposition in Congress to the issuance of bonds to meet the expense of the improvement, he urged them to go slowly in insisting upon that project, advising them to labor first to get from Congress a declaration of policy in the shape of a vote that a certain improvement ought to be carried out, and to have the declaration spread upon the minutes in the form of a resolution or a statute. The work would thus begin with an ordinary appropriation, and once launched in the enterprise Congress would be obliged to provide bonds unless the revenue of the country should be sufficient for the work.

New Policy in Negro Appointments.—President Taft in his ante-inauguration speeches had already forecasted the policy his recent declarations affirm. In appointing negroes to Federal offices he proposes to reverse the rule of Mr. Roosevelt regarding the selection of negroes for good places in Southern States. Hereafter such negroes as are chosen for Federal positions will be in the North. There appears to be no reason to assume that in carrying out this policy the President will name more than the usual few that are provided with good places under every Republican administration. The change of policy arouses much interest.

Railroad Troubles in the Northwest and East.—Regarding the freight-handlers' strike in the Northwest, President Earling of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad made light of a situation which threatened last week to be a serious one. "The strike is about over," he affirmed, "and freight is moving promptly over the St. Paul lines. It will be impossible to grant an increase in wages unless higher rates per ton are received for handling freight." President Earling reported business conditions in the Northwest to be in an exceptionally healthy state. In the East indications were strong that the demand of the Brotherhood railroad men for a ten per cent. wage increase would not be granted by the managers of the thirty-two Eastern roads. In explanation of their stand the managers claim that a wage increase would have to be met by an increase in freight rates, to which the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission would have to be obtained. The conviction rules that a conference lasting months will precede a final conclusion in the matter.

British Empire.—The coming election occupies public attention almost to the exclusion of any other business. Mr. Balfour states that the reform of the House of Lords is urgent.—The cotton manufacturers have decided to continue their mills at short hours, 40 a week instead of 55½, till February next. AUSTRALIA. The coal strike in New South Wales has been paralyzing business for some weeks past. The acting-Premier announced in Parliament that the Government was determined to use every constitutional means to end it, going, if necessary, to the extreme measure of a compulsory wages board. INDIA. The talukdars (land owners) of Oudh have elected under the new laws the Rajah of Partabgarh to the Viceroy's Council, and the Rajah of Balrampur to the Provincial Council. The Rajah of Mahmudabad in an address to the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh expressed his fear lest the Socialistic tendencies now visible in Great Britain should find their way to India and that the talukdars there should be attacked as the peers in England.

Canada.—The New York Herald publishes an interview with M. Danserau, editor of La Presse, one of the chief French Canadian papers, on the subject of Canada's connection with the British scheme of Imperial defence. M. Danserau objects to the project on the grounds that Canada gets nothing from the Empire under existing conditions and that British Consuls actually work against Canadian merchants in favor of those of England.

Ireland.—The Irish Party abstained from voting against the Lords on the Budget on the ground that the Government had not yet made Home Rule a part of their immediate program, which alone would induce them to join in the fight against the Upper House. The Liberal Premier has now made the required pronouncement. Addressing in Albert Hall, London, December 10, "the most representative and militant Liberal meeting since the days of Gladstone," Mr. Asquith said: "Speaking last year before my accession to the Premiership, I described the Irish policy as the one undeniable failure of British statesmanship. I repeat to-night what I said then, and on behalf of my colleagues and, I believe, on behalf of my party, I reiterate that this is a problem to be solved only in one way—by a policy which, while explicitly safeguarding the supreme, indivisible authority of the Imperial Parliament, can set up in Ireland a system of full self-government as regards purely Irish affairs. There is not, and cannot be, any question of separation. There is not, and cannot be, any question of rivalry or competing for supremacy subject to these conditions. That is the Liberal policy. For reasons which we believe to have been adequate the present Parliament was disabled in advance from proposing any such solution, but in the new House the Liberal Government, at the head of a Liberal majority, will be in this matter entirely free."

Though this announcement commits the Liberals, if reelected, to introduce a Home Rule measure, more or less on the lines of Mr. Gladstone's, it does not clearly define its scope, as there is much difference of opinion on the lines of demarcation between local and imperial affairs. The interpretation will largely depend on the Irish members' control of the balance of parties. The new Attorney-General for Ireland, succeeding Mr. Cherry, who has been made Lord Justice of Appeal, is Mr. Redmond Barry, and he is succeeded as Solicitor-General by Mr. Serjeant O'Connor, Q. C. It is the first time since 1860 that the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General are both Catholics. Mr. D. F. Browne, K. C., also a Catholic, succeeds Judge Shaw, a non-Catholic.

The School Question in France.—The question of the lay schools, says a Paris cablegram of the 10th inst., is still in the foreground, daily giving rise to fresh incidents. In many places in the department of Marne, the primary school pupils, encouraged by their parents, have refused to write an historical composition, the subject of which was the Reformation, according to M. Despiques' manual, which appreciates very harshly the conduct of King Charles IX and the Catholics with regard to the Huguenots. There is talk of expelling the recalcitrant pupils. The curé of Fourqueux (Seine-et-Oise) gave a lecture on school neutrality, in the course of which he said: "We Catholics are not rebels. We respect the laws of our country, but we demand that these laws be applied in entire good faith and that they cease to be employed as weapons against us and against our faith. The law on school neutrality is not applied. We demand that it be respected, and that the beliefs of the children shall not be undermined by an anti-Christian education." Even M. Briand, the Premier, has been moved to protest in a speech in the Chambers, against the hostility toward France manifested in reports that appear in foreign publications concerning the religious policy of his government.

Germany.—Through the explosion of two huge gasometers in the city gas works of Hamburg, much damage was done to life and property. The cause of the catastrophe was the bursting of a new gasometer which had but recently been put in place. The many workmen engaged in the immediate neighborhood were caught in the sea of fire that swept in after the explosion, and of their number thirteen have been taken out dead, fourteen more are reported missing, whilst many others were severely injured. Emperor William and Prince Henry of Prussia telegraphed their sympathy immediately after news of the accident had been received.—Eleven of the twenty-one fishing smacks belonging to the fishermen of the Island of Finkenwärder reported missing since the fearful tempest which recently swept the coast are announced safe in the harbor. The remainder of the fleet is thought to be surely lost. More than forty fishermen were in the smacks thought to have gone down in the storm.—Two submarines, the U 3 and U 4, lately built at the imperial shipyard in Dantzig, have just completed a record trip from Cuxhaven to Kiel, passing around the northernmost point of Jütland. The journey, which was made without any convoying ships, marks a run of 540 miles and was completed in forty hours.—The United States Consul-General in Berlin reports a marked increase in exports to the United States. In his own district the increase for the months of October and November amounts to nearly five million marks.—Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg made his maiden speech in the Reichstag. He announced that the Government would stand aloof from parties and factions. Measures would be submitted to the Reichstag, but no reference was made to the parties from which the Chancellor expected support for these measures. "Germany needs," he affirmed, "not party government but continuous and steady policies both at home and abroad to satisfy the people in order that their work, either material or intellectual, may be undisturbed by disorders or experiments."

Austria.—For the first time this year a direct discussion of the questions of policy dividing the German and Czech members of the Reichsrath took place, but no compromise was effected. The desired understanding between the parties is lacking because of one principal difficulty. The Czechs insist upon a reconstruction of the Bienenrath cabinet before they shall assent to the cabinet provisions demanded by the Government. Against this position the German members take a united stand. Their program calls for an immediate settlement of the budget question, after which, they declare, they will be ready to consider the question of the mooted ministerial changes. The final outcome of the bitter controversy cannot be foreseen.—It will be recalled that in the course of the recent Balkan controversy the well-known historical writer, Dr. Henry Friedjung, published an article in the Reichspost, which charged that the Servian representatives from Croatia to the Hungarian Parliament were in the pay of the Bulgarian Government, and that they were intent upon the separation of Bosnia and Herzegovina from Austria in order that with Servia these provinces might form a new kingdom, Greater Servia. It was hinted in addition that Francis Kossuth would use their attempt as an occasion for the separation of Hungary from Austria. The twenty-two Servian representatives entered a suit for damages against Dr. Friedjung and the Reichspost and the case came before the court this week. The trial proceedings will probably consume ten days and sensational revelations are looked for. In well-advised circles the report is common that Count Aehrenthal, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, is backing Friedjung. In an address which he was permitted by the court to make, the accused author declared he wrote the article from a motive of patriotic duty at a time when war between Austria and Servia seemed imminent, and that he is prepared to prove every statement made when he accused the Servian Government of endeavoring through its agents to incite a popular rising in Bosnia, Croatia, and South Hungary, and the plaintiff deputies of receiving Servian bribes to promote such risings.

Italy.—Lieutenant Natale Imperatore, a Garibaldian from 1848 to 1860, who managed the plot of 1863 for the assassination of Napoleon III, has just died. He was sentenced by the imperial tribunal to twenty years imprisonment, but was released in 1870.—The Superior Council of Fine Arts has caused the Roman Municipality's plan of modifying the piazza of Michel-Angelo on the Capitol to be given up.—Baron Sidney Sonnino, the new Premier, to whom was delegated the task of forming a Cabinet in succession to the retiring Premier, Giovanni Giolitti, has named the new ministry. The Premier and Minister of the Interior will be Baron Sidney Sonnino, and Count Guicciardini the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Roman Affairs.—The Pope's episcopal Jubilee was closed November 28. Great crowds assembled in the principal churches to sing the "Te Deum." Cardinal Rampolla, Archpriest of the basilica, presided at St. Peter's.—In receiving the Catholic officers and men of the British battleship Duncan, the Holy Father assured them that he could never forget the services they had rendered during the Messina earthquake.

Nicaragua.—Conflicting and contradictory reports about the condition of affairs appear daily. It has been learned that the arms shipped from New Orleans for the insurgent troops in spite of the protest of Consul Altschul, consisted largely of Mauser rifles and Remington cartridges, which cannot be used in rifles of that model. United States Consul Caldera has cabled from Managua that an attempt to incite an uprising against Americans has failed. Ex-President Cárdenas of Nicaragua has set out from Costa Rica with 500 troops to attack Zelaya, who drove him out of office in 1891.

Honduras.—President Dávila has placed the whole republic under martial law. Ex-President Bonilla of Honduras, who was deposed by the present incumbent with the help of Zelaya, is at the head of a revolution to oust Dávila and regain control with the ultimate object of forming a confederacy among some or all of the Central American republics.

A Strong Hand in Finland.—To quell possible resistance to Russia's plans in Finland, the Emperor has chosen his second cousin, Grand Duke Nicholas Nickalaievitch, to take full and direct charge of affairs in Finland. Grand Duke Nicholas, until recently President of the Council of National Defence, is noted for ability to deal with disturbing elements. A half-dozen attempts upon his life have been made by the revolutionists, and one such conspiracy resulted in the shooting of seven conspirators.

Greece.—The political unrest continues. A requiem was celebrated in the cathedral at Athens for Cretan revolutionists who fell some years ago in attacking the monastery of Arkadi. The Bishop of Larissa, denounced to the Government, forbade his clergy to give evidence before the Bishop of Messina, who was sent by the Synod to investigate the matter. The Synod then summoned him before it in Athens. He refused to go and has appealed to the nation against the authorities in the capital.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Three New Books

The publishers have sent us three new books which we find interesting from a variety of reasons. The authors are clergymen—Catholic, Anglican, and Congregationalist—and they have stepped out of the pulpit to seek an audience that is shy of homiletic eloquence. We have no fault to find with such stooping to conquer, especially if the purpose aimed at is to lead souls from the contemplation of the things they know to a higher knowledge and correspondingly nobler standards of conduct. On the contrary, we are inclined to be of the opinion that there is not enough effort made on the part of clergymen to synthesize the natural with the supernatural. The two spheres are allowed to appear as if they were entirely separate, instead of being for all their distinct difference, as closely united in the concrete as soul and body.

The danger, of course, in a synthesis of this kind is that the supernatural is apt, in less orthodox hands, to be completely absorbed in the natural, somewhat like the union of the lamb and the lion in the unmillennial fable. Whereas, if the supernatural means anything at all, it is obvious that it is the important element in the union, purifying nature, elevating it, and, in the bold words of St. Peter, even deifying it. Remembering, then, the danger besetting the path of the clergyman who goes out into the streets with his message, the three books we have referred to convey an instructive lesson, besides furnishing us incidentally with a large portion of literary pleasure.

In "The Temple" (New York: The Macmillan Company), Lyman Abbott, who is properly speaking, a retired clergyman and an editor of the Outlook, says many wise things well. For instance: "There are some knowledges that are real and are important to the few but are valueless to the majority. The doctor needs to learn the names and places of all the bones in the body; but the layman does not. If I call him when I am sick, he needs to study my symptoms and understand what is the disease. But the less I study my symptoms and think about my disease the speedier will be the recovery.

. . . Most of us would better leave psychic research to specialists who have time and talent for it. Half-knowledge is often the worst form of ignorance."

We really are tempted to say, "Tu quoque!" There are very many pleasant and valuable observations and reflections in Dr. Abbott's book; but we would have enjoyed them more if the reverend author (reverend, because he really preaches in this little volume) had not made his lamb swallow the lion. In other words, his synthesis of the natural and supernatural is too thorough; is indeed a transformation in which the supernatural is entirely eliminated. He talks about "Socrates and Jesus of Nazareth." The connumeration is sufficient to fix in our minds Dr. Abbott's position on the supernatural. We feel, moreover, a bit annoyed at the Doctor for his easy acquiescence to the Protestant who "looks with self-satisfied pity upon the Roman Catholic who repeats the Pater Noster and keeps account of the number of the repetitions by her beads." The context shows that the author believes it to be a stupid performance. And yet he must admit that very wise persons have been guilty of it. The old saying that "repetition is the language of love," might help him to capture the Catholic point of view and to forget about the pity.

Rev. F. J. Grierson, A.M., Rector of Oldcastle, does not precisely go out into the streets in search of listeners; he invites them into the library of his parsonage and in "De Libris; Being Six Chapters on Books" (Dublin: Sealy, Bryers and Walker) he sits back in his arm-chair with good books all about him and discourses most engagingly and in a sensible manner upon the subject of reading. He loves to quote and to make literary allusions after the manner of Miss Repplier—a manner which we confess to have a liking for—and so helps us to review the reading of our life-time and to renew old recollections and old motives for confining ourselves to the greatest and best in literature. But the reverend Mr. Grierson also reminds us painfully of the hazy and uncertain state to which religion is reduced even in such a conservative quarter as Anglicanism. We hope we are doing him no injustice when we suspect (he is very vague on the point) that he confuses the inspiration of the scriptural writers with that of profane authors. "For what is inspiration but genius?" he asks; and continues: "As inspiration in its noblest intention is divine illumination with respect to religious truth; so, in its more popular sense, it is that light of the spirit of God within a man's soul which compels him to speak out whatever of truth, righteousness, or beauty he may find within himself."

We need no such exaggerated claims for genius in order to respect and revere it. The lamb, again, contrary to all laws, swallowing the lion! Does not Christ speak of the existence of "a world" which would be forever in antagonism against His Church, and for which He, the Incarnation of Love, would not pray? How can He be said to inspire the prophets of that world in the same way that He inspired Isaiah?

In the "Art of Life," which is not strictly speaking a new book, but rather an old one in a new edition (Dublin: The Catholic Truth Society of Ireland. New York: Benziger Brothers), the Rev. Frederick Charles Kolbe discusses the paramount issues of human existence with deftness and literary allusiveness, and yet with a seriousness and sense of truth that keeps his appeal to lovers of beauty from being a disgraceful surrender of supernatural truth to the prejudices he aims to overcome. On its first appearance this little book received wide welcome and notice. Father Kolbe shows amply enough that to forget the supernatural is to close the eyes to illimitable oceans of beauty and to fasten the attention upon faint reflections, as who should shut his eye-lids upon the golden sunlight to study the curious glow effects produced by the stimulated nerves within the eye. The synthesis of the natural and the supernatural is not easy, because the theme is the loftiest a writer can select. But the author of the "Art of Life" makes a brave and interesting attempt, and he leaves us the hope that some day another St. Thomas may arise who will gather the best experiences of current life and transfigure them with "bright shoots of everlastingness." This writer of the future will not make the lamb swallow the lion, or the reverse. He will teach what the Church teaches, the Church that feared Pelagius and would have naught to do with Calvin.

What is Morality?

The tradition of an English quarterly review is to bully. A monthly literary magazine may indulge in a certain arrogance; but conscious of its lightness and its transient influence, it is seldom utterly in earnest in its arrogance. The quarterly is with us for three months; its articles may be studied; it is ponderous. Had Jugger-naut's car been conscious, it would have said to itself as it crunched the prostrate devotees: This is my proper function. Should the British take it from me, I am no better than a brewer's dray. So, too, the quarterly: If I am to give up crushing and grinding, I may as well come down from the heights; for I am little better than a monthly. The Edinburgh Quarterly in its October number bullies not a little, and, as is the custom of the ponderous, talks much nonsense so ponderously as to make it appear real sense.

An article, "What is Morality?" in praise of two volumes by Edward Westermarck on the origin and development of moral ideas, bullies the Christian moral system as a matter of course. The reviewer rails at his opponents as men of little intelligence, incapable of comprehending his theory. Mr. Snagsby was always on his guard against "putting too fine a point on it." The reviewer makes his points so fine that they are Euclidean in their character. Whatever the case may be with others, Catholics read very carefully the books of their adversaries; and, not lacking in either parts or training, have good reason to presume that they comprehend the theories these propound, as far as they are comprehensible to minds accustomed to measure all such by the principle of contradiction. Moralists such as Westermarck and his reviewer do not always treat us in the same way. The second, indeed, despite his arrogance, either is a very weak philosopher or else he has never read a Catholic treatise on Ethics. Had he done so with the most ordinary intelligence (for in this subject we are as averse to ultra-refining as Mr. Snagsby) he could never have asserted that the system of morality of mankind at large, by which terms is indicated not obscurely the Christian system, has no particular relation to men's welfare on earth; that it is not deducible from first principles; that it derives both its sanction and its compulsory character from the rewards and punishments of another world; that it is accepted as a revelation, and that its followers refrain from violating its precepts merely to avoid the pains of hell. Even Mr. Snagsby would not think it too fine a point to distinguish "compulsory character." This may signify the exterior force that ensures the submission of the recalcitrant, and then it is identical with sanction, and the reviewer's copulative conjunction is out of place; or it may signify the intrinsic power of the moral law to bind the intellect and the will, in which case no Christian will admit that it has anything to do with the hope of heaven or the fear of hell. However cloudy may be the minds of others, we have very clear ideas on the distinction between the obligation of the law and its sanction. Moreover, we admit, not only the revealed supernatural sanction, but also a natural sanction taught by reason and the sanction of civil authority charged by the Creator with the office of protecting social order. Lastly, the sanction of the moral law is no more the ordinary motive of its observance by Christians than is the fear of the policeman the ordinary motive of their obedience to the statute law.

All this, useful as it is to meaner intellects, is thrown away upon such as the reviewer, who in his own theories has reached such sublime obscurity that he finds unanswerable the question: Is political assassination murder? not because he thinks the dispute as to its rightness or wrongness, interminable (for this, though erroneous, would not be irrational), but on the ground that to attempt to define it would be to envelope it in one's own sentiments, to yield to the strong tendency of an unphilosophic human nature to "objectivise" morals, or, in plain English, to recognize that there is such a thing as right and wrong. We may, therefore, turn for a moment to Professor Westermarck. The practical man is struck at once by the disproportion of the professor's ponderous work to its subject. Of their very nature morals in general cannot be a very recondite study. The world at large can get on very well without knowing anything about quaternions and the fourth dimension; but nobody can keep clear of morals. From morning to night every one is acting morally, that is, in conformity with or against a standard of right and wrong; and acting rationally, or in other words, with a sufficient knowledge of this standard which, all are convinced, is entirely independent of their likes or dislikes. As Professor Westermarck has undertaken to prove the whole race of men with the exception of himself and the little school of which the Edinburgh reviewer and he are shining lights, to be in the blindness of utter error, the practical man does not fail to understand why he has produced laboriously two volumes, the second published two years after the first.

Among the many assumptions necessary for his thesis that morals originated in mere emotions of indignation and approval which became stereotyped by natural selection, since those who were moved by indignation, knocked on the head such as were mildly submissive, is the absence of any morality in primitive man. He tries to justify it on the testimony of missionaries and travelers that there are savages to-day without any idea of moral obligation. One of the most provoking things about such scientific people as he, is their ignoring of the clearest rules of logic. They pretend that the inductive method is the only road to truth. One expects them, therefore, to use this method with the utmost care, and naturally is put out to hear them drawing gravely the widest conclusions from observations quite insufficient. Even if the missionaries and travelers be right, Professor Westermarck must prove, what no man yet has proved, that these unmoral savages are not degenerates before he draws from their condition a conclusion so sweeping. As a matter of fact the missionaries and travelers are hardly to be trusted, since their testimony is contrary to that of such Catholic missionaries as have got closest to the barbarous mind. The missionary or traveler is too often of the arrogant scientific type. Filled with the notion of his own vast superiority he looks upon the natives of the countries he visits merely as subjects to be investigated. He never dreams that to these he is an object of horror; that his color, his ways, his contempt of their most cherished traditions makes him abominable in their eyes, and that even should he acquire their language sufficiently to seek into their mind, it is most improbable that they would disclose to him their innermost thoughts. Imagine an inquisitive Japanese or Hindu swaggering through one of our villages and questioning its people. It is not hard to conceive the answers he would get, and what a travesty upon our moral ideas would be the report he would carry to his own people. Such as he cannot even reach the secret thoughts of the Italians, Hebrews and Slavs that come to our shores, and how can they expect to fathom those of the African and the Australian aborigines? Besides, Professor Westermarck fails to see that one may have a very definite idea of moral obligation, the inevitably binding will of a superior being, and yet be unable to formulate it in other words than, it is right. Such would naturally escape from the difficulty by having recourse to ancestral customs and traditions.

Professor Westermarck, then, has written two volumes, not because he is a seeker after truth, but because he is a special pleader against Christianity. When Christians shall be courageous enough to despise the clamorous praises the world heaps upon such false science, they will recognize the utter worthlessness of its flatulent professors.

Church Spoliation in Mexico

IV.

While Juarez was thundering from Vera Cruz, his troops were gaining substantial victories and slowly approaching the capital. Miramon, Zuloaga's successor, finding his soldiers driven back and his supplies cut off, stole out of the City of Mexico between two days and succeeded with great difficulty in reaching the coast, where he boarded a French vessel for Europe. After a residence in Vera Cruz of two and a half years, Juarez re-entered the capital in triumph but not for a peaceful stay. During the two years that followed, several other decrees were issued against the Church. The first forbade street processions for conveying the Holy Viaticum to the sick; the second declared all hospitals and charitable institutions under the control of ecclesiastical corporations to be national property; the third confiscated the archbishop's seminary, but permitted the seminarians to take possession of a part of the former convent of San Camilo. Finding himself sorely pressed by the French "army of intervention," by a fourth decree, dated February 26, 1863, Juarez seized all convents of nuns and all their community property, the sisters being allowed one week in which to find accommodations in private houses, where they were permitted to live as individuals but not in community. The Sisters of Charity were exempted by name from the effects of this decree. Priests were forbidden to wear in public any garb distinctive of their profession.

Seeing that he could not hold the capital against the French, Juarez retired northward to San Luis Potosí, where he set up his government for a time and then gradually withdrew as far as Paso del Norte on the Rio Grande. After the overthrow and death of Maximilian and the restoration of the government to the capital in July, 1867, the name of the little town which had been the capital was changed to Ciudad Juarez (Juarez City) and a bust of the wandering President was placed in one of its public buildings. A more imposing monument is now in course of construction.

The remaining five years of Juarez' rule were spent in rigorously enforcing the laws against the Church and in suppressing insurrections which broke out at short intervals in all parts of the country. His re-election in 1871 made many say that the republic was at an end. Among his active opponents was one who as a barefooted boy had trudged over the mountains from his home in Oaxaca to defend the capital against General Scott's army of occupation, who had later borne arms against President Santa Ana, who had fought the French with a price on his head, and had rejected the overtures of Maximilian towards reconciliation with the mushroom empire. Turning his weapons against Juarez, under whom he had fought, he took the field and called for recruits. Porfirio Diaz was in arms against Juarez! He was in open, armed rebellion when the President suddenly sickened and died after a few hours' illness. Diaz haggled in vain with the new President Sebastian Lerdo de Tejada y Corrial for more favorable terms of amnesty but was forced to return to the Liberal fold without having gained any special favor or recognition.

Lerdo signalized his administration by forbidding all religious demonstrations outside the churches, by expelling the Sisters of Charity, who had been spared by his predecessor, and by securing incorporation in the Constitution as amendments (!) the savage decrees published by Juarez against the Church.

Diaz was soon in the saddle again. Towns, cities and states "pronounced" in his favor. After desperately trying to check the revolution, Lerdo, seizing all the funds he could, including $5,000 from the national pawnshop, gave up the fight and fled to New York. His successor, José Maria Iglesias, played president for a while, published a brave manifesto to the nation and escaped to San Francisco.

Diaz became provisional President on November 28, 1876. At the election which followed over 90 per cent. of the votes were in his favor! He stepped out of the presidential office in 1880 and gave way to his friend, José Manuel del Refugio Gonzalez y Flores, who retained him in the cabinet. In 1884, Diaz returned to power—and stayed. Since November 28, 1876, we may say that his hand has been on the throttle. Though no new laws against the Church have been made, the Juarez and Lerdo laws remain; some of them, however, are less rigorously enforced. We can see with what tremendous difficulties the Mexican bishops have had to cope. Deprived of their property and revenues in a country impoverished by half a century of intermittent war, they have had a mighty struggle to educate their seminarians and keep the light of Faith burning. Their success and progress show that, in spite of appearances, Mexico is largely and soundly Catholic, and her people are far from being unanimous in their approval of what was done against religion in a fit of desperation during a time of bitter and bloody political dissensions and divisions.

The Sermons of Cardinal Newman

Men of different temperaments and creeds, Gladstone and Wiseman, Dean Church and Sir Francis Hastings Doyle, Shairp, Mozley and James A. Froude have borne testimony to the lasting effect produced upon them by the sermons of Cardinal Newman. The St. Mary's sermons stirred Oxford to its depths. The Catholic discourses showed no less of power; there was a gain even in breadth and warmth of feeling. These masterpieces are to-day a storehouse of spiritual energy, a mine seamed with lodes and veins of purest gold.

Yet John Henry Newman was not an orator. He lacked many of the physical qualities, some perhaps of the mental and emotive endowments generally attributed to the wizards of the spoken word. The sermons were usually read. There was little action, the voice was weak, the manner slightly constrained—some have called it awkward. But as Gladstone wrote, taking the man as a whole, "there was a stamp and a seal upon him; there was a solemn sweetness and music in the tone, there was a completeness in the figure which made his delivery singularly attractive." What was the stamp and seal, what was the attraction?

In every speaker certain elements ultimately determine and gain success. A commanding personality; sound, noble ideas, even if not highly original; the gift of exposition, coupled with a persuasive charm of style that wins the heart, never fail. Of these qualifications, the first is undoubtedly the most essential. Without it intellect, genius has failed; with it alone, the less gifted have wrought marvels. That commanding personality Newman had in the highest degree. To all who saw him at St. Mary's, or later as priest or cardinal, his presence in the pulpit must have been an inspiration. At Oxford he was the spirit of unworldliness personified, the embodiment of principle, a voice crying out: "Make straight the paths," the Atlas who bore on his shoulders the weight of the world groaning with a new life. Later when he spoke, with the authoritative voice of a priest of the Catholic Church, there was a nobler seal upon him. He had a right to speak of God, of Conscience, of Justice, of Truth. He had suffered in their cause. For them he had breasted the icy tides of sorrow; for them he had groped disconsolate amid the encircling gloom. He could point the way of Faith; that Faith had ever been his guiding star. He could call men to holiness and humility; for pride and worldliness he had ever loathed. The man's saintly life, the sacrifices he had made, the sorrows which had waylaid his path, his chivalrous loyalty to Truth and Principle, shone from his brow, spoke in conquering accents on his lips. He dwelt on those serene heights, where he saw life's rounded orb as God wants us to see it. To use a phrase of the Schoolmen he viewed that life, not, "sub specie temporis," not from the standpoint of time—too often distorted—but "sub specie æternitatis," from the standpoint of eternity. Hence the recurrence of a few leading thoughts in ever new, original and striking form, the organ-like undertone of his sweet and solemn music.

A sermon on "Human Responsibility" weaves together in one sentence ideas which seem to have mastered him. "It has always been the office of Religion to protest against the sophistry of Satan and to preserve the memory of those truths which the unbelieving heart corrupts, both the freedom and responsibility of man, the sovereignty of the Creator, the supremacy of the law of conscience within us." Ideas such as this, especially the idea of the Creator's supreme dominion over us, the Creator's right to rule His rational creatures by ways and means and an economy of His own choosing, are the very warp and woof, the core, the central theme of the sermons.

Consequent to this is the concept of that visible Kingdom of Christ on earth towards whose dimly-seen border-land he groped so long, but the sight of which gladdened at last his straining eyes, that Kingdom "coming to us from the very time of the Apostles, spreading out in all lands, triumphant over a thousand revolutions, exhibiting an awful unity, glorying in a mysterious vitality, so majestic, so imperturbable, so bold, so saintly, so sublime, so beautiful." To extend that Kingdom, to make the followers of the King less worldly, more knightly, was his dream.

To press home these thoughts Newman had some peculiar gifts. In the pulpit, he evidently felt ill at ease before those broad, general questions common to some even of the great preachers. He narrows his field. He selects a very limited, a circumscribed subject. "Forms of Private Prayer," "The Mental Sufferings of Our Lord in His Passion," "The State of Grace," "Religious Emotion," "Secret Faults," "Perseverance in Grace," "Intellect the Instrument of Religious Training," "Neglect of Divine Calls and Warnings," such are the subjects he prefers. Generalizations he could handle brilliantly, but these practical subjects suit his apostolic purpose better. His subject thus chosen and fenced in between the limits of this narrow but not barren field, he fastens upon one or two central thoughts, with one end in view, to make his audience not merely understand but realize them.

Here lies his power. He flashes the subject before you as on a screen. He seems at the same time to be thinking your thoughts, evoking the subject out of your own heart and soul, realizing it with you and for you. So true is the artist's stroke, there is such sureness of outline and brilliancy of coloring, that the canvas once painted never fades. That power is heightened by the use of apt and telling illustration. No one understands better the art of building windows into the solid structure of discourse, through whose spacious openings his clear intellect pours its white lambent beams. Add the cumulative effect of his work, for we see the marble shaft of thought capped block by block before our eyes. Steadily he moves on "with extreme orderliness, masterly elaboration and unchecked progress" to the foreseen, predetermined end.

Newman's gifts of persuasion are no less remarkable. How characteristic his motto: "Cor ad cor loquitur," "Heart winneth heart!" He had an unerring insight into the state of mind, the views, the prejudices of his hearers. Walter Bagehot describes him as "a consummate master of the difficulties of the creeds of other men." With the instinct of the dramatic poet he could project himself into the moods, the feelings, the temperament of his fellows. He possessed the magic "Open Sesame," which unlocks the secret chambers of the soul. His diagnosis is faultless, relentless; but there is a pathetic tenderness, a restrained emotion which finally beats down the hearer's guard and wins him. The sermons, if the comparison be allowed, have something of the slow, silent, all-conquering power of grace.

One factor of that power is the style. His style is stamped with a note of urbanity to be found in the same degree in very few of the great English writers. Yet its rich texture is shot through and through with bits of solid homespun. For that style is idiomatic, familiar, colloquial; it is never crude or clumsy. It is individual, but it is neither manneristic nor odd. It is sufficiently emphatic, yet mindful of proportion and reserve. "It employs," says Mr. Birrell, "a vast vocabulary and it does so with the ease of the educated gentleman, who by a sure instinct ever avoids alike the ugly pedantry of the book-worm, the forbidding accents of the lawyer, and the stiff conceit of the man of scientific theory." It addresses the intellect, and it sounds its message full and clear; it appeals to the imagination and it glows with color to the heart, and it has pathos and tenderness, sometimes a compelling, resistless power.

The traveler standing before the frescoes of Fra Angelico, feels what the canvases of Raphael or Rubens can never inspire. On the stainless, untroubled brows of those Madonnas, in the eyes of that radiant company of saints and angels buoyant with immortal life, he reads the beauty and splendor of a soul adorned with sanctifying grace. In reading the sermons of John Henry Newman, we listen not merely to a clear and lofty intellect, we not only catch the strains of a great prose-poet and master of melody, we hear the very heart-throbs of a pure and saintly soul. JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

The Chances and the Forces of the French Monarchy

III

The Monarchists are not blind to the fact that their party is in the minority. One of them has even written, "We know that France is not monarchical." But they do not think it necessary that she should be monarchical to accept the monarchy. The history of the past hundred years shows that an energetic minority is sufficient to effect the triumph of a political party at the most unexpected moment. The very fact that the Republican State has exiled the pretenders to the Crown of France proves that the régime feels it is at the mercy of Chance or of a bold stroke.

The energetic minority does exist. It is served by clever and powerful organs, such as La Gazette de France, le Soleil, and above all, L'Action Française. There are quite a number of monarchic papers in Provincial France especially in the South and Southwest. A very active and very enthusiastic nucleus of traditionalism is already discernible among the young men in the schools and in the universities. The monarchic ideas are getting to be "the fashion" with the students, and that in France is always a significant symptom. Finally we have already pointed out a certain disaffection in the world of letters and of learning toward the revolutionary and republican ideas. Remarkable conversions have taken place, among others, of two very well-known writers, Paul Bourget and Jules Lemaître. The latter has related the stages of his political development in an eloquent and witty pamphlet entitled: "Un nouvel état d'esprit," which has been published by M. Charles Maurras in his "Enquête sur la Monarchie." (Paris, 1909, Nouvelle Librairie Nationale.) Slowly but with continuity the monarchical idea is making its way.

The provinces, the regional groupings of the South and of the West, Avignon and Bordeaux especially, are active centres of Royalism. One of the serious mistakes of the Revolution has been its upsetting of these natural subdivisions of the provinces which once constituted countries, and still survive, to some extent everywhere: Quercy, Limange, Agenais, Médoc, Bigorre, Armagnac, etc. These have been replaced by administrative abstract divisions, the departments that have nothing real. We have seen that this centralization was a logical necessity for the Republican State. But by causing the life of the nation to flow into Paris a certain condition of irritation, of secret opposition towards the metropolitan policy has been created. Moreover, it is in the rural districts, in the small towns that respect for traditions is deeprooted and genuine, and that is where the monarchy will find its natural allies. This phenomenon, it seems to us, is already indicated by certain regional literatures. Thus the beautiful Provençal literature has retained its purely Catholic and monarchic traditions. On the other hand we know how obstinately Brittany resists the invasion of Jacobin ideas. Whether it be passive resistance, as it is with the Breton country, or spirited and active opposition as in the South, these are so many counter-revolutionary currents the force of which may be found formidable.

And yet, if the monarchic idea is to be realized in France, it will be through the union of the Catholics. It is well known that the Catholics first made a loyal attempt to be on good terms with the Republican government. At the outset it did not seem that there was irreconcilable antagonism between the régime and religious liberty. But very soon the French State wished to have its "Kulturkampf." It provoked the conscience of Catholics and made them feel the full weight of its despotism. Since then a social Catholic party was formed whose leader is M. de la Tour du Pin who wishes to establish the closest solidarity between the French Monarchy and French Catholicism. The Church herself remains outside and above this political movement, but it is obvious that she cannot refrain from having preferences for a political system which would favor her spiritual liberties and interests. The Neo-Royalists have understood that the new monarchy implied a "re-Catholicizing" of France. We have even witnessed the curious spectacle of certain minds brought back to Catholicism through their monarchical convictions, and who returned to the Faith because they were Royalists. Such has been the case with M. Paul Bourget; and M. Jules Lemaître himself, after having been a sceptic, feels a Catholic soul reawaken within him. He exclaims: "I have seen so many virtuous, humble lives whose secret nourishment was in the catechism and nowhere else! The anarchism of the persecutors, their inability to construct, make me naturally relish what there is in the Church that is well-ordered, hierarchic, conducive to unity among men and to the preservation of human society."

Finally, another powerful and unexpected auxiliary of the monarchical restoration may present itself: the working class. In the departments where there are already thirty fairly powerful royalist organizations the groupings made up entirely of laboring men are the most numerous. In the suburbs of Paris, such as La Villette, St. Denis and St. Martin, thought to be largely won over to the revolutionary cause, there are, nevertheless, intense centres of Royalism. A monarchist writer says: "Were the people of Paris brought face to face with the accomplished fact they would wake up Royalists." There is no doubt that an atavism of many generations has fashioned in the French a monarchic soul in which neither the Revolution nor the Empire has succeeded in impairing its unconscious loyalism. It has often been noticed with what naïve enthusiasm the people cry: Long live the King! whenever a foreign sovereign visits Paris.

But there are weightier and more direct reasons to believe that the working class would take kindly to a monarchy. These reasons we see in the present syndicate movement, looked upon with hostility and distrust by the Republican régime, and which the future monarchy might be able to conciliate. The clear and lofty mind of the Count de Chambord had foreseen the importance of this current. He devoted to it numerous essays every one of which tends to show that Royalty has always been the patron of the working classes, and that the "establishments" of St. Louis, the "regulations" of crafts, the system of "guilds" were already anticipations, so to speak, of the modern syndicate movement. The reconstruction of professional groups, demanded by the Socialists, would be more surely guaranteed and favored by monarchy than by Social Revolution. (Cf. Lettre sur les Ouvriers, 20 Avril, 1865.)

On the whole, the program of the French Neo-Royalists shows a curious evolution of the monarchical idea. The latter is so anxious to adapt itself to the temperament of the nation that it becomes realistic, positivistic. Should the day come when the nation will recognize that the Republican régime and true liberty are incompatible, on that day the Monarchists will become the undisputed directors of French consciences and the monarchy will be an actual fact in the eyes of the people. To use M. Ch. Maurras' own words, "all that will then remain to be done will be to realize it as the postulate of public opinion generally."

Interesting documents on French Neo-Royalism can be found at the Nouvelle Librairie Nationale, 85 rue de Rennes, Paris. This house also publishes a periodical, La Revue critique des idées et des livres, which gives precise information on the movement of traditionalistic ideas in France.

LOUIS CONS.

The Present in the Light of the Past

In the lull that follows the storm there will be found time and occasion for calm reasoning. If personal feeling and national antagonism could be eliminated from the judgment that we pronounce on public events, truth would be better served and justice would have fewer foes.

It is now nearly a quarter of a century since the republic was stirred to its very centre by the perpetration of a crime which brought violent death to some and terror and dismay to many, for it was the first great treacherous onslaught on our civil institutions that the country had witnessed. It was past ten o'clock at night on May 4, 1886, that a meeting was being held in Desplaines street, Chicago. There were three speakers, each of whom urged his hearers to acts of violence. The throng, estimated by different witnesses at from eight hundred to two thousand, filled the street. As they listened to the harangues which with the most exciting and most persuasive arguments urged them on to bloodshed, they gave noisy expressions of approval.

Then the police appeared. Under two hundred in number, they were led by Captain William Ward, who approached the wagon from which the speeches were being delivered and, as directed by the law, "in the name of the people of the State of Illinois" commanded the crowd to disperse. Not a blow did the police strike, not a threat did they utter. Then came a blinding flash and a terrific detonation. Not from the wagon but from the sidewalk an explosive bomb had been hurled into the closely formed ranks of the keepers of the public peace. Sixty-six officers were injured, of whom seven died of their wounds.

Eight men, including the three speakers at the meeting, were brought to trial for murder. When the tragedy took place, the city was not under martial law and the case was conducted throughout in strict conformity with the criminal code of the State. No attempt was made to connect any one of the eight with the actual throwing of the death-dealing bomb. They were tried, in the words of Judge Gary, who presided, "for procuring murder to be done, and being therefore themselves guilty of murder."

Nearly a thousand men were summoned before a jury satisfactory to the prosecution and the defense could be secured. According to the Illinois law a jury in a criminal case not only determines the guilt or innocence of the accused but also, in cases of conviction, fixes the penalty. The judge, therefore, in passing sentence is simply the spokesman of the jury. The trial lasted six weeks. Legal talent of the first order appeared for the State and for the accused.

Long before the case now before us, the Supreme Court of Illinois had decided on an appeal: "If several persons conspire to do an unlawful act, and death happens in the prosecution of the common object, all are alike guilty of the homicide. The act of one of them, done in furtherance of the original design, is, in consideration of law, the act of all, and he who advises or encourages another to do an illegal act is responsible for all the natural and probable consequences that may arise from its perpetration."

Such was the law of the State, declared by its highest tribunal, and under that law the jury fixed the death penalty for seven men who by their frantically written and spoken appeals to pillage and murder nerved the unknown hand that hurled the Haymarket bomb. Whoever will take the trouble to reread the handbills which were scattered broadcast in Chicago in that eventful spring of 1886, and go over once more the ferocious calls to loot and bloodshed which appeared from day to day at that same season in the Arbeiter and The Alarm of the same city will have an excellent translation into German and English of the Spanish program and manifestoes which appeared in Barcelona last July. But we live in America, and Spain is far away. Righteous indignation for one set of murder-provoking miscreants and snivelling sympathy for others of the same litter! We Americans should need no other lesson than the Chicago Haymarket to teach us the worse than criminal folly of applauding a system whose chosen agents are lawlessness, arson and murder. But perhaps a lesson similar to that of Barcelona may yet come to warn the republic against cherishing a serpent in its bosom. D. P. S.

Christianizing Japan or Modernizing Buddhism

"Will Japan become a Christian Nation?" by Thomas E. Green, in Hampton's Magazine, is in many ways a striking article. Shintoism and Buddhism have been the religions, and Confucianism the moral code, of Japan for more than twenty-five centuries. Shintoism is merely "a mechanism for preserving the continuity of the nation's veneration for its ancestors." It has no dogma but "recognizes the immortality of the soul and the existence of supernatural power." Buddhism, which exists side by side with Shintoism, supplies the dogma and ritual. There are thirty-five sects differing radically in theory and practice. The Shin-Jodo, a kind of Japanese "High Church," believes in "but one god; that salvation is by faith, and faith to be vital must show its works in morality." It is significant that Dr. Green mentions as a distinctive Shinist plank: "They provide for the salvation of women." But the Shin sect is apparently a small minority and, "much of it (Buddhism) is hopelessly decadent." The people, however, pray and worship mechanically in the traditional way, not bothering about theories, though gradually their deities have grown into an innumerable multitude. The high-class Buddhist temple still suggests the exclamation of the early Catholic missionaries who "wondered if Satan were not mocking them with a wicked mimicry of their own worship."

The intellectuals are agnostics though they admit that religion is necessary for the people. Prince Ito and the Mikado had planned to make Christianity the religion of Japan, merely as a political device, and, "had we possessed a united religion instead of 157 different forms and kinds of religion, Prince Ito's plan might have been carried out." Some Japanese intellectuals became Christians just "to see how it would work." They found that Christians of their class were no better than themselves and had little faith in the Bible, which, like their own sacred books, was "unscientific." Hence why should the nation become Christian?

Dr. Green has no convincing answer to the question. On his own showing the belief and practice of the Shin sect are quite as good as anything his "hundred and fifty-seven sects" have to offer. He has no more faith in the Bible or Christian dogma than the Japanese experimenters. He would have the "over thirty different Protestant denominations of every sort and shade of belief now at work in Japan besides innumerable independent evangelists whose cult is their own," discard dogma and "take the Golden Rule spoken in almost the same syllables by Gautama, by Confucius and by Jesus." But if the Japanese have the Golden Rule already why should mission societies pay out millions to take it to them? And how can Japan "become a Christian nation" by adopting a code from which everything distinctly Christian is carefully excluded?

The writer, who has been "a prominent minister for many years and a profound student of theology," would throw all theology overboard. The title of his article is a misnomer for the Christianity he would give the Japanese would bring them no nearer to Christ. He would have his gospelers abandon "the archaic creeds whose usefulness, if they ever had any, long since passed away," and confine themselves to secular teaching, Red Cross nursing, Y. M. C. A. socials and "the universal gospel of high and holy living." This he says, is "the supremest epitaph of Jesus of Nazareth of whom it was said, 'He went about doing good.'" But Christ also taught many truths, among others that He is God; and should the Japanese, who include the Bible in their literary course, ask their creedless teachers and nurses, "Who is the Christ?" these could not answer: "He is the Son of the living God," nor could they declare the Bible "the word of God," for to many of "the hundred and fifty-seven sects" such beliefs are "archaic." But the Japanese could very logically insist: "If your Christ is merely a human teacher, why should He replace our Confucius and Gautama who for ages have moulded our lives and who also went about doing good? If your Bible has no more authority than our sacred books, why would you force it upon us, especially as you yourselves only accept of it what you choose? We also find it good as literature and make selections from it for our school-books."

The details of "high and holy living" would prove equally embarrassing. Divorce, which flourishes in Japan only a little more extensively than in the United States, could not be consistently denounced by creedless evangelizers who held to it even when they had a creed; nor could they have any better grounds than have the Japanese for proving that women have immortal souls, if indeed the elimination of "archaic creeds" should leave them belief in immortality of any kind. Excluding supernatural motives they could add nothing to the natural objections against murder, lying, theft and other immoralities nor logically impugn the Shinto creed: "Follow your natural impulses and obey the laws of the State." A free gift of godless schools and hospitals would no doubt be appreciated by the Japanese who have many such of their own. Such institutions, when motivated by Faith and animated by Charity, have always exerted a powerful spiritual influence throughout the Catholic world, but creedless nurses and tutors are not the propagandists one would select for the spread of Christian ideas. Pagan philanthropy is not Christianity.

It is no wonder if "non-Christian nations do not want to become Christian" and "the foreign missions are not getting adequate returns for the millions expended in Christianizing foreign peoples." Christianity, not money, is what the evangelizers need. "Had we been able to approach Japan two decades ago with a Christianity united in its operations, agreed in its dogmas, one in its structure . . . the mind and heart of Japan might have turned to the lofty ideals of Christianity." But now, to secure unity, the sects must abandon Christian ideas and ideals and, while holding to the name, discard all that means and makes Christianity. This might modernize or Americanize the outward aspects of Buddhism but it will never make Japan "a Christian nation."

And yet there is a Church that has labored and still labors successfully in Japan and possesses all the qualities that Dr. Green considers essential. He barely alludes to St. Francis Xavier, and altogether overlooks the fact that the only time Japan was in the way of becoming "a Christian nation" was when Catholic missionaries preached to its people all the doctrines and moral precepts of Christ—a Christianity one in doctrine, structure and operation—and did not trim Christian truths to the measure of Elder Statesmen or public opinion. Then Japanese Christians were not experimenters. They were so sincere that the only way to kill the faith was to kill the faithful, which the government, instigated by members of the sects, proceeded to do with unparalleled rigor.

But relentless persecution failed to exterminate them.

The 90,000 Catholics in Japan are mostly descendants of Christians who, persecuted and priestless, handed down the faith unbroken for two hundred years. Their presence will serve to recall to their countrymen the memory of the most heroic of their ancestors and, should the question of adopting a form of Christianity again arise, they are most likely to select that which alone is unchangeable and logical, adequate to their mental and moral needs, and identical with that for which so many of their fathers laid down their lives. When some fifty years ago a French priest discovered the Japanese Christians, they asked him: (1) if he obeyed the great Father in Rome; (2) if he revered the Virgin Mother of Christ, and (3) if he also was a virgin. Those who may not stand such a test can never Christianize Japan; the picture of St. Francis Xavier, publicly exhibited by the Japanese Government, points out the creed and character of the apostles who alone can make her Christian.

A By-Path of International Politics

In July last a few lines appeared in the daily press about a prospect of trouble between the South American Republics of Peru and Bolivia over a boundary dispute. The incident soon gave place to other news, and was forgotten. Although treated in a light fashion because of the comparative unimportance of the states directly involved, the matter was more significant than appeared on the surface, and nearly resulted in a change of the map.

The inside facts are these: The President of Argentina, having been appealed to by both Peru and Bolivia to decide the vexed question of the boundary, fixed a line which gave 3,360 kilometers of the disputed territory to Peru, and 3,310 to Bolivia, saying frankly that the ancient treaties and other documents adduced as evidence of their claims by the contending states, were so obscure and contradictory that the only solution lay in the practically even division made. Anti-administration forces in Bolivia claimed the result unjust to their country and incited disturbances in the capital, La Paz, during which Peruvian business houses were sacked and the Peruvian Minister and his Argentine confrère were attacked.

Chile, Peru's ancient enemy, was bound by treaty to remain neutral, but was strongly in sympathy with Bolivia. Dr. Arce, Bolivian representative in Santiago, Chile's capital, was refused official assistance in arranging a war loan, but a hint was quietly given him as to where this could be obtained. He succeeded in negotiating the loan; succeeded, too, in securing a supply of rifles and ammunition, ostensibly from private parties, freighted a ship with them in Valparaiso under the peaceable guise of china and glassware, and telegraphed the result to his Government at La Paz. Unfortunately for the success of a little plot in which the crockery was to figure, the message fell into the hands of a spy of El Comercio, the leading Lima daily, who deciphered it. It appeared in full in that paper, to be promptly denied by Chile. Dr. Arce was accused of inventing the contents, and, not being of the stuff of which martyrs are made, he at once made a statement laying bare the entire transaction.

Peru, at her wits' end, by agreeing to relinquish certain claims in another boundary dispute which she had with Brazil, induced the latter to intimate to Chile, in no uncertain terms, that any open or secret assistance of Bolivia would lead to serious results. The ship with the fragile cargo was virtuously forbidden to land it at the port of Antofagasta, the Chilean terminus of the railway to La Paz; a large contingent of Chileans that were gathered in La Paz, as individuals, returned to their country by the same road, and the incident was closed. Current gossip made it an open secret that the intention had been to swoop down upon and occupy the other railway leading from La Paz, through Peruvian territory, to the Peruvian port of Mollendo. Once in possession of this line, a status quo would have been established with the unspoken support of Chile, and Peru, to regain her own, might have had to go to war with both, which she was entirely unable to do. Thus Bolivia would have attained her great need, a seaport, and the map of South America would have been considerably changed. Once again a scarcely known newspaper has played the principal part in an international complication. L. C.

A communication from Piqua, Ohio, contains some interesting information as to the manner in which Catholic fraternal organizations can exercise in a practical way their power for good. A member of one of these societies declared in a meeting of his council that the librarian in the local public library had requested him to obtain for the library a set of "The Catholic Encyclopedia." The council took the matter up at once and decided that the five other Catholic fraternal bodies in the town should be asked to cooperate with them in purchasing and presenting the work to the library. As a consequence representatives of the six independent societies met and appointed one of their number to confer with the Library Board and petition them to purchase the Encyclopedia; but the Board anticipated the representative of the societies by sending him a letter empowering him to obtain the work at their expense. And so the torch of learning is passed on from hand to hand and the cause of truth furthered by a display of initiative on the part of one Catholic fraternal society. If similar interest in the work of Catholic publication agencies were shown by other councils and societies Catholics would have less occasion to complain of prejudice and misrepresentation. The average man and woman are willing enough to see the light if it is held up to them. We should not blame them for stumbling over us when we shirk our duty of contributing something to dispel darkness.

CORRESPONDENCE

Social and Charitable Activity in Germany

MUNICH, NOVEMBER 29, 1909.

A paper in a late number of the Allgemeine Rundschau in which the author deals with the tasks and prospects lying before the Catholics of the German Empire, contains some very interesting data regarding the charitable and social activities of German Catholics. The writer claims that the Kulturkampf was a blessing to Catholics in that it gave them occasion to learn the singular advantages which organization affords. In the happy following of this knowledge German Catholics have undertaken and thus far carried to successful outcome a war upon the destructive evils which the economic and cultural progress of the empire brought into being. The charitable and social developments among them in this struggle show the inherent strength of Catholicism, while they serve at the same time as admirable proof of the talent for organization and the adaptability to meet the conditions of the times characteristic of German Catholics as well as a striking argument of the material progress achieved by them.

The many millions which year after year are collected for definite work by the various social and charitable Vereins established by Catholics do not represent, it is true, interest-bearing principal laid by in banks or invested in profit-bearing paper of trusts and corporations, but they are an evidence of a spirit of sacrifice, of a readiness of submission to the Church and its teachings, and in a manner, too, of the ever growing material well-being of German Catholics. I have thought that the readers of AMERICA might find a summary account of these activities interesting reading, mayhap that they might see in them an impulse to fuller and wider organization along similar lines themselves.

Zeal for the spread of the Church and interest in the work of the Catholic missions among the heathen deserve the honor of first place on the list of good works encouraged by our Catholic brethren here. Reliable authorities declare that at least four million marks yearly are contributed by the associations favoring this interest. The well-known Bonifacius Verein, the Francis Xavier Verein, the Ludwig's Mission Verein, largely a Bavarian association, and the association for the care of the Holy Land, are the principal workers in this field. In the field of active charity towards the needy poor the Society of St. Vincent de Paul naturally leads. Within the past year the members of this admirable body have collected more than a million marks, but the fact that more than 14,000 men lend their personal service in the carrying out of the society's objects is strongest evidence of the influence the organization exercises among the Germans.

In close accord with the aims of the Vincentians, are those of the Elizabeth Verein and the association for the protection of the young, whose yearly offerings to meet the expense of their effective purpose total more than half a million marks. Complete statistics are lacking concerning the sums collected each year for the upkeep of numerous institutions for the protection of young girls, refuges for abandoned children and infants, nursery schools, orphan asylums and mercy homes for young women. But some idea of the excellent spirit that rules our people here may be gathered from the single fact that 1,450 hospitals throughout the empire with accommodations for 80,000 patients are supported by Catholic charity exclusively. In addition to these there are in existence Catholic homes for the blind, the deaf and dumb, for cripples and for idiots. All told 3,500 well equipped institutions devoted to charitable and social work are in charge of some 34,000 members of religious congregations of men and women; while (a work of mercy cultivated in a marked degree with us in Germany), in their own homes nearly 80,000 sick have been cared for during last year by the grey nursing sisters.

Equally excellent results are to be noted in the matter of Catholic effort in lines of more strictly social development and progress. Space will not allow me to cover in detail the aims and purposes and the specific organization proper to associations flourishing here in Germany, which have been called into being to safeguard the faith and the moral growth of men and women, young and old, in the conditions that meet them in their different avocations.

For the present it may suffice to affirm that much of the splendid efficiency of the guilds which flourished in Catholic times is reappearing in our day through the organizations devoted to the interests of working men, business men and professional men. Unquestionably the spirit shown by Catholics in these latter years and their readiness to unite for the safeguarding of the common welfare are to be traced to the wide influence of the Catholic Press in Germany. The Catholic dailies among us have a subscription list of some two million Catholics, whilst the list for Sunday papers and magazines totals more than four million and a half.

Political Outlook in Spain

ROQUETAS, SPAIN, NOVEMBER 25, 1909.

The impression grows stronger each day that the Moret cabinet will be short-lived. A month has passed since the Liberals came into power and yet they still hesitate at reopening the Cortes, though Sr. Moret has stated on several occasions that the reopening of the Cortes is now an absolute necessity in order that the Government may receive authorization to meet the heavy expenses of the war in Africa and to solve many economic difficulties. Some of Sr. Moret's colleagues do not favor his proposal; they are fearful of a crisis and the downfall of the cabinet. The Conservative opposition seems to hover as a ghost before the eyes of the present Ministry, even though Sr. Maura has intimated that the Conservatives will do nothing in the Cortes to impede necessary economic legislation. Many reflecting Catholics fear that the fall of the Moret cabinet may bring into power the rabidly anti-clerical, Liberal element under Canalejas, of "Association Law" ill-fame.

For Catholic interests it was a misfortune when Moret rose to power; it will be a worse misfortune if Canalejas or his rival in anti-clericalism, Romanones, comes into control of public affairs. One month of Liberal Government has made many a Spaniard suspect that the Liberals care but little for the best interest of the country and are only striving to remain in power as long as possible. By attempting to suppress the printed process of Ferrer the Liberals have left their Government open to the serious charge of having but little regard for the fair name of Spain and of seeking to place Sr. Maura and his cabinet in a false light before the world in order that the Liberal Ministry may continue in power. Every concession is being made to the Republicans and Radicals who but four months ago plotted the ruin of Spain. Lerroux, Sol y Ortega, and other revolutionary fugitives have not only returned to Spain but have been honored by representatives of the present Government. Law abiding citizens who passed through the "Sad Week" in Cataluña, marvel at the Liberal interpretation of patriotism.

The Vickers, shipbuilders, find themselves in an awkward position in carrying out their contract for the construction of the new Spanish warships. The appointment of Sr. Concas as Minister of Marine puts the English firm in an unpleasant position. When the awarding of the contract was under consideration by the former Government, Sr. Concas openly and strongly opposed the Vickers. Now that he has been appointed to the Ministry of Marine, those familiar with naval affairs claim that the mutual misunderstanding between officials and builders can have but one effect—the delaying of the construction of the thirty-one vessels which were planned by the Conservative Government.

The present Government is releasing many of the imprisoned Anarchists of the July disorders. The newspapers are recording the fact that coincident with the release of the pupils of Ferrer there has been a notable increase in the number of reported cases of burglary and highway robbery in the suburbs of Barcelona.

The New Biblical Institute

ROME, NOVEMBER 26, 1909.

The new library of the Biblical Institute which was formally inaugurated by Father Funck in a learned discourse on November 22, was thrown open on the following day to the general public desirous of visiting and admiring it. Although the present place is provisional, still its size and the convenient arrangement of shelves, none of which are against the walls, make it a credit to the Institute and to the librarian. Naturally, the library is far from complete so early in its existence, but it already has a remarkable number of works of great price and rarity.

The library is composed of thirty sections cast into three grand divisions. In the first division is found introductory matter, such as bibliographical material and recent biblical periodicals and reviews. In the second, we find a collection of commentaries on the sacred text, historical, didactic, prophetic, poetic, Pauline, apostolic, apocalyptic, etc. In the third division, there is a selection of complementary matter, dogma, geography, archeology, philology, liturgy, and the like.

In an annex to the library proper, there is an interesting museum of botany, anthropology, zoology and mineralogy, embracing whatever may be of assistance in the pursuit of biblical studies.

The number of students and hearers is on the increase. At present it reaches one hundred and twenty, of whom the majority are Italians.

L'EREMITA.

A Zealous Serb Catholic

There died recently in Dalmatia, an exemplary priest and ardent Serb patriot, whose name will not soon be forgotten on the Adriatic coast. Father Bernard Markovitch, of the Order of the "Petits-Frères," was beloved for his many winning qualities and esteemed for his intellectual attainments. Besides his unwearying ministry to souls, Father Bernard took interest in academical studies. He found time, moreover, to cultivate music, painting, and numismatics. Unlike most of his brethren, in religion Father Bernard was a stout advocate of Serb nationality and did not conceal his antipathy to the Austro-Magyar propaganda in Dalmatia. A native of Fiume, erstwhile a Serbo-Croat city and now under Magyar domination, he never ceased to plead the cause of the Dalmat Serbs, and to uphold their language and political rights.

He was himself a splendid specimen of the hardy, virtuous Dalmat population, finest branch of all the Serb race. From men like these a yeast of Catholicity might be formed to leaven the mass of their kindred, sunk in the torpor inevitable among the half-hearted adherents of Orthodoxy. Under the black robe of the Roman Catholic monk beat a heart devoted to his people, and these sentiments well known in Ragusa and Fiume led to his appointment as chaplain to the Austrian Legation in Montenegro.

Here he was persona grata to Catholic and Orthodox alike, the prince himself delighting to honor him in public and treat him as an intimate friend in private. For the first time, perhaps, a Serb by birth and feeling filled this important post, a living refutation of the axiom that no true Serb can be other than Orthodox.

By his writings Father Bernard did much to further a better understanding between Serbs of different creeds. The citizens of Ragusa, irrespective of politics and belief, united at his burial to manifest their respect and affection for this worthy member of a distinguished Order.

BEN. HURST.

A report of the U. S. Vice-Consul at Mukden, Manchuria, exposing the secret methods of Japan in that district, has been published by the New York Times. General Fred. D. Cloud dates his report from Mukden, China, September 4, and states that while Chinese and foreign importers have to pay heavy duties on all Japanese imports, Japanese merchants are allowed to bring in their goods to Manchuria free of duty. He submits figures in proof of his contention that the complaints of the Chinese and foreign importers against the Japanese on this head are well founded, and that Japan has nullified the "open door" agreement following the Russo-Japanese war.

The Narodny List of Zara (Dalmatia), has an interesting account of President Taft's visit to Montana and his conversation with the Catholic Serb and Catholic Croat population. The President assisted at the laying of the foundation stone of their new college and remarked on the solid moral and intellectual qualities of the Southern Slav emigrants to the United States. He sympathized deeply with their wrongs and said the policy of forcible denationalization which was driving them from home could not, in the face of the world, be condoned or justified. A Dalmatian priest, the Rev. J. Medina, describes the President as easier to approach and more modest and genial in converse than the lowest clerk in any Austro-Hungarian administrative department.

Official statistics compiled by the British authorities show that in spite of all efforts to stop the drain, emigration from Ireland still continues. The returns show that during the ten months ending 31st October, 41,461 emigrants left Ireland as compared with 35,473 for the corresponding period of last year. Theories have been put forward from time to time to account for the growth of emigration, but no employment is the cause.

Nicaragua's First American President

Like a meteor, he made his appearance in that little Central American world; he flared up and flickered out. Such in brief is the life story of the Tennessee lawyer, physician, newspaper man, William Walker, one time President of Nicaragua.

The caldron of life was still fiercely seething in California when Walker, then barely thirty years old, organized an expedition in San Francisco to establish an independent republic in Sonora, Mexico. He landed at La Paz, Lower California, decreed the union of the peninsula with Sonora, and proclaimed a republic with himself as president, assisted by a competent corps of adventurers and vagrants as civil and military aides. But the benighted Sonorans put so little faith in Walker and his philanthropic schemes in behalf of liberty that they chased him and his rabble out of the country.

Walker's breast was still a fiery furnace of freedom. The same spirit which prompted James Buchanan while our minister to Great Britain to advise either the purchase or the forcible seizure of Cuba from Spain, led our hero at the head of a motley following to Nicaragua in 1855, when that republic was enjoying one of its wonted military taffy-pullings. Leaguings himself with the "outs," he was made colonel of fifty Americans and twice as many natives. Having almost succeeded in capturing President Estrada, he was made brigadier-general and made himself military dictator to the government of Patricio Rivas, who became provisional president when Estrada fled to Honduras.

By direction of Walker, Rivas was deposed and was succeeded by Fermin Ferrer, who ordered a presidential election. With no regard for constitutional provisions, Walker was declared duly "elected" and was at once recognized as president by the United States Minister, John H. Wheeler. One of the new president's first acts was to reestablish negro slavery.

Walker was soon attacked on all sides, not only by Nicaraguan forces but also by troops from the neighboring republics, those from Costa Rica being led by President Mora in person. Cornered beyond hope of escape, Walker surrendered to Commander Davis of the United States corvette St. Mary's and was conveyed back to this country. He at once organized another expedition and sailed from New Orleans for San Juan del Norte, but he was arrested before he could do any mischief and was again sent home.

A third time he headed an expedition to Central America. He effected a landing at Trujillo, Honduras, where he seized the funds of the custom house. Pursued by a body of Honduran troops, he and his men cut their way through the tangled masses of tropical vegetation, stumbling and staggering through quagmire and stream, until, ready to perish from exhaustion, they laid down their arms.

Walker was tried by court martial and shot, September 12, 1860. Though a Protestant of Scotch ancestry, he gratefully received the last ministrations of the Catholic Church. He was buried at Trujillo. The Great Seal of Nicaragua, which was found among his effects, was sent back to the people whom he had terrorized. Thus ended the leader of four hostile expeditions against friendly states, the president of two republics, the first noteworthy contribution of the United States towards the betterment and civilization of Central America.

A Lesson for the Laity

In an appeal to the Catholics of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia for a generous contribution to the annual collection for the Catholic University of America, His Grace Archbishop Ryan refers with special commendation to the recent action of Walter George Smith, who resigned as a member of the board of trustees of the University of Pennsylvania rather than countenance by the retention of his official position the immoral opinions of a professor of sociology in that institution. "As dogma is essential to religion," says the Archbishop, "giving motive for the self-sacrifice necessary for its exercise and clearing the intellect of many delusions, so are some principles of action the first essential of liberal education. Hence the importance of watching most vigilantly the principles taught and the men who teach them. Hence we approve most heartily the recent action of an enlightened, pure and fearless Catholic of this community, who, having been for nearly twenty years closely connected as trustee with the University of Pennsylvania, resigned this honorable position sooner than countenance the election of a professor whose principles of sociology—the very subject he is employed to teach—are in direct antagonism to Christian teaching, and expressly favor the destructive doctrine of divorce, with power to marry again." "We certainly need a Catholic university," is the Archbishop's evident deduction, "with the great influence which as an educational head it must have on all the schools of our system."

Civil Service Pensions

It has long been taken for granted that the huge burden of taxation placed upon the American people by its pension system in the natural course would become less heavy year by year. A purpose to perpetuate the burden and even to increase its hardships seems, however, to be gathering strength in certain quarters. One of the projects of the National Civil Service Reform League, it appears, is to extend the principle of the pension system to the army of civil service employees now on the pay-rolls of the Government. In the meeting of the League last week Dr. Chas. W. Eliot, its president, delivered the principal address and pleaded earnestly for the principle of civil pensions. No doubt our law-makers will note the wisdom of a prudent discretion in regard to the project. The experience other peoples have known because of the building up of an aristocracy of civil servants does not appeal to the democratic spirit of equality our institutions are supposed to foster. The principles of just and fair taxation will afford ample opportunity to pick flaws in the reasoning of one who defends the pension system as a means of providing humanely for men and women who have been long in the governmental service and whose efficiency is reduced by advancing age. Sound economics have it that the State should not attempt to do for the people what the people themselves can accomplish by private enterprise. And it is difficult to recognize just why men and women who are pleasantly situated as are our government employees, who have good salaries, who have reasonable hours of service, who have tasks not particularly burdensome, should be especially favored in provision for a care-free old age in comparison with the mass of the people whose toil is not brightened by a similarly felicitous prospect.

After Death What?

Professor Cesare Lombroso, the alienist Professor of Psychology of the University of Turin, was for most of his life what he called a monist—there was but one source of energy in the world and that was inextricably attached to matter and while he deprecated the word materialist, practically that was the term which best designated his philosophic outlook. He became interested in spiritism and by experiment and observation came to the conclusion that there were forces in the world quite apart from matter and absolutely independent of it. He also secured proofs as he thought of the existence of human beings after death. In spite of the protests of his friends he determined to publish a book on the subject. As he tells in the preface they said to him: "You will ruin an honorable reputation—a career in which after so many contests you had finally reached the goal (Lombroso was never accused of over-humility); and all for a theory which the world not only repudiates, but worse still, thinks to be ridiculous." The book that results from his determination bears the title "After Death What?" Shortly after it was published and indeed before the publication of his English translation by Small, Maynard & Company, Boston, its author died. It represents then his last words to the scientific world on an important subject.

Lombroso's career is a type of much modern university work. Early in life he worked out a sensational conclusion supposed to be founded on scientific data. This was that criminals are not responsible as a rule, but are born with criminal tendencies and are scarcely to be blamed for working them out. Much of the work done in this line created a bitter controversy and most of it has now been discredited. Lombroso proceeded to show that men with certain irregularities of skull were of the criminal type and over and over again it has been pointed out that some of our best men, such as Lincoln for instance, would be thus placed in the category of criminals-born. All of this work in criminology was founded on monism or materialism and the necessary denial of free will that these involve. His last book is more or less inevitably a recantation of much of the earlier teaching, though he himself has not seemed to have recognized that nor to have realized how far the ideas most prominent in it make for a rehabilitation of old-fashioned philosophy.

"After Death, What?" is a type of modern professional book-making in many ways just as Lombroso's career was of that of the professor. It is a jumble of every sort of evidence, real and supposed, except philosophic evidence for the continuance of existence after death. For instance, there is a chapter in which a number of old ghost stories of haunted houses is supposed to lend its weight of evidence. Then there is a chapter on the beliefs in spirits among savages and among ancient peoples in which a number of curious but scarcely critically selected stories are thrown together. Next comes a chapter of Transcendental Photographs and Plastiques, that is, the impression of spirit hands and features in paraffin and plaster. Finally, of course, there are the spiritistic phenomena, even mediums and magicians in savage tribes have their place. All of this is supposed to be cumulative evidence and yet a good deal of it would be dismissed with a smile by any serious scientific investigator.

The one thing that is interesting about Lombroso's book and also valuable is recognition of existence after death. Every distinguished scientist of the modern time who has given himself seriously to the study of this problem has come to the same conclusion. At times it seems very clear that it is not so much the evidence that convinced them as the inevitable tendency of their own natures to belief in continued existence leading them to accept the evidence as it was presented. Monism or materialism is dying. Dying by its own inertia—since men refused to study philosophy, yet occupied only with material things they are finding even in them the proofs of immaterialism. Lombroso's book is extremely interesting then, but scarcely at all as its author intended. Very few except those already spiritists will find any convincing evidence for human survival of death in it, but as a symbol of the curious topsy-turvydom of thinking that has come as the result of the neglect of the study of philosophy it is an absorbing summary of present-day educational tendencies.

The Socialistic Budget

Many an honest Englishman of the hearty, rosy, "God bless my soul" type will, during the next few weeks, be running about denouncing the rank Socialism of the Budget and imploring every elector he meets to save Old England from the Socialistic ministry which is hurrying it to ruin. Mr. Lloyd-George, Mr. Churchill and their friends will flout him, sneering at his ignorance of what Socialism really is (a method of defence much affected by Socialists), and asserting that they might as well be called Ascetics or Fire Worshippers as Socialists. "We found," they will say, "the country in a hole, needing money to pay its bills, so we set to work to levy it wherever we could find it."

The hearty John Bull Englishman is no fool. He lacks, it is true, the facundity, the brilliant epigrams and happy repartee that make Mr. Lloyd-George and Mr. Churchill so acceptable to certain audiences; and having devoted his leisure to better things than the dreary wranglings between the followers of Marx and those of Lasalle, he is not able to define and divide the incongruities of Socialism. On the other hand, he has a wonderful faculty of seeing into things in a practical way; and if in his choking, disjointed speech he reiterates that the Budget is Socialistic, it is guineas to greengages that he is right.

Socialistic, like every other such term, has two meanings. It may express a tendency only, or the actuality, in the subject of which it is predicated. In styling the financial policy of Mr. Asquith's Government, Socialistic, one may mean, either that the principles which move its authors are such, and therefore it is a policy tending towards perfect Socialism; or that it is Socialism so reduced to practice that the taxes it proposes can be defended only on principles strictly Socialistic.

The taxes most criticized are the super-taxes on incomes over £5,000, and on inheritance and succession with respect to large estates, and the tax on unimproved urban lands. Considered in themselves they can not be called Socialistic. Had Mr. Lloyd-George said frankly: "We are in difficulties. There is no way of reducing expenditure: in this all agree. The greatest part of our expenditure is for defence. Therefore we propose to lay the burden chiefly upon such as have most at stake," there might have been grumbling, some might have doubted whether in the making up of the Budget distributive justice had been observed, but no one could have stigmatized the increasing and the grading of income, inheritance and succession taxes as socialistic. As for the special tax on unimproved urban lands, there exists in New Zealand, British Columbia and, perhaps in other colonies, a similar tax which no sensible person connects with Socialism. In the early days of those colonies speculators took up near the newly founded towns large tracts of the choicest land, which they kept unimproved, waiting to sell at a high price what had cost them next to nothing. So much valuable land withdrawn from settlement was a public detriment, checking the growth of towns and hindering immigration. The Governments therefore laid a heavy tax on such lands with the avowed intention of forcing them into the market. Some may challenge the justice of the tax; but, again, it clearly is not Socialistic. Neither could Mr. Lloyd-George's special tax on unimproved urban lands have been so termed had he connected it in a similar way with the general welfare of the towns in which such lands lie.

But such were not the ideas of Mr. Lloyd-George and Mr. Churchill, who seem to dominate the Asquith cabinet. Behind all these taxes lurks the socialistic principle, that there can be no private ownership in land lying at the foundation of all wealth; that the sole efficient cause of wealth is labor essentially one's own, and therefore the wealth of the rich is the usurpation of the fruits of the labor of others. Hence, the attack upon incomes and inheritance and succession, the talk of unearned increment in connection with unimproved urban land, and the sneers at dukes as representatives of the landed proprietors; while the distinction between earned and unearned incomes and the discrimination against these in the scheme of taxation is purely Socialistic. Hence, too, in speaking to sympathetic audiences of the working classes, both those cabinet ministers said openly what they could only hint at in Parliament. The honest Englishman then is right.

Why Italy is Anti-Clerical

Some of our contemporaries have animadverted on the anti-clerical tone of the pro-Ferrer meetings in Italy. What other tone could those meetings have? Let us remember that for more than a generation the Church has been maligned and misrepresented by Italians in official station and scandalously illtreated by writers and cartoonists. Whatever could bring her into bad odor and disrepute has been industriously spread among the people with an utter disregard even for decency. The present generation in Italy came into existence and has grown to manhood in an atmosphere simply saturated with all that could make "church" and "religion" a veritable stench in their nostrils, for in a campaign of scurrility the Italian is not a whit inferior to the Frenchman. But what about the justice of thus holding up to shame an organization which has displayed and still displays so much activity for the betterment of men? Why this hostility to the Church should be shown in an ostensibly Catholic nation seems to be a puzzling question; but the answer is not far to seek. Among our Catholic immigrants, the Italians have not conspicuously excelled all others in their knowledge of Catholic faith and practice. Not a few, it appears, have developed much as Topsy did; all the dwellers in the little village were Catholics, the air was Catholic, the spirit was Catholic, but the knowledge of things religious was surprisingly and painfully meagre. The easiest task of our American bishops to-day is not that of providing Italian congregations with suitable priests from their own fair land. The intricacies of our English language have not always been a terror to one who would strive wildly to wind his way among them rather than to pour out upon his compatriots floods of fervent eloquence in tones familiar to his tongue and their ears. The half-hearted attempt to counteract by a moderate antidote of religious instruction on Sunday the poison of a school week given over to a deliberate attack on religion is as vain in Italy as elsewhere.

Our Common Duty

It is well now and then that an object lesson come to us to prick the consciences of easy-going Christians, else were there danger that our practical indifference might forever kill the hope of suppressing viciousness through the united stand of good men and women in opposition to its wantonness. Such a lesson may be read in a recent happening in Chicago. The notorious "First Ward Ball," which has been held annually for the past twelve years in that city, and which each year had grown more brazen in its public flaunting of hideous vice has been stopped owing to a combined attack of reformers and of church organizations, Catholic and non-Catholic. Grand Jury action was threatened and the mayor, it is reported, forced the politicians behind the project to abandon their plan. The ball has been worth $30,000 annually. It was a tax on the vice district and the money returns were supposed to go to campaign expenses of those who managed the disgraceful show. We are glad to record the fact that a particularly strong protest against the ball was sent in by the members of a Catholic Young Men's Society of a Chicago parish.

The Pope, on December 14, appointed the Rev. James O'Reilly, Minneapolis, Minn., to the bishopric of Fargo, N. D., and the Rev. M. F. Fallon, D.D., of Buffalo, now Provincial of the Oblate Fathers, to the bishopric of London, Canada.

LITERATURE

CATHOLIC AND DEVOTIONAL BOOKS

The past year has been, we think, more than usually rich in the production of Catholic devotional books of a high standard. The English translation of Father Meschler's "Life of Christ," which has been reviewed in these pages, will remain a classic in its field of literature for some time. An English nun deserves our thanks for that treasure. We are indebted to another for a similar classic. "Practical Devotion to the Sacred Heart, for the Use of the Clergy and the Faithful," by A. Vermeersch, S.J., and translated from the French by Madame Cecilia, a religious of St. Andrew's Convent, Stratham (New York: Benziger Brothers), is a work well known to nearly all but English readers. The translation is from the latest French edition, and, with its storehouse of devotional thought and suggestion, it will not fail to stimulate the religious spirit of its readers.

Rev. Henry C. Schuyler, S.T.L., of Norristown, Pennsylvania, has contributed a small and interesting volume to the devotional study of the life of Christ. "The Courage of Christ" (Philadelphia: Peter Reilly. London: Kegan Paul, French, Trübner & Co.), is the first of a proposed series treating of particular virtues in the life of Christ. The present volume makes admirable Advent and Lenten reading, and ought to be a means of encouragement at all times to the faint-hearted and the suffering.

Devotion to the Blessed Virgin will be helped by "The Glories of Lourdes," by the Chanoine Justin Rousseil, and translated from the second French edition by Rev. Joseph Murphy, S.J. (New York: Benziger Brothers). This book is recognized on the Continent as a standard work on the events of the famous Grotto of Massabielle. It is beautifully bound and generously illustrated and combines devotional spirit with historical accuracy of statement.

"The City of Peace" (Dublin: Catholic Truth Society of Ireland. New York: Benziger Brothers), has reached a second edition. It is written by seven Catholic converts who tell the history of their conversion. A glance at their names—among them those of the Rev. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.; the Rev. Joseph Darlington, S.J.; Mrs. Bartle Teeling, Susie Teresa Swift, formerly Brigadier-Organizer of the Salvation Army in the United States and now a Dominican nun—will guarantee the high value and interest of "The City of Peace."

The Reverend Martin O'Donoghue, of the Baltimore Archdiocese, is the author of "The Gospel Plea for Christian Unity" (Washington: Press of Gibson Brothers). In brief compass we have here the present divisions in the Christian Church submitted, without prejudice or bias, to the test of examination according to leading texts in the Gospel. The result is the inevitable conclusion that Christ intended His Church to be One and Universal.

Books of interest to priests and ecclesiastical students are "Sermon Delivery, a Method for Students," by the Rev. George S. Hitchcock, B.A. (New York: Benziger Bros. London: Burns and Oates); "Cereemoniae Missarum Solemnium et Pontificalium Aliarumque Functionum Ecclesiasticarum," a newly revised Latin handbook by George Schober, R.R.; and an "Officium Pro Defunctis cum Exsequiarum Ordine," in a small and convenient form. The last two publications are from the press of Pustet (New York and Cincinnati).

The Papacy, the Idea and Its Exponents. By GUSTAV KRÜGER of the University of Geissen. Translated by F. M. S. BATCHELOR and C. A. MILES. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

In a certain sense it was gratifying to read these pages, because they are proof of the modern world's increasing appreciation of the Church. Professor Krüger admires the Papacy and its exponents. He sees in this keystone of the Church of Rome an example of strength, durability and recuperative energy; and in its exponents the ideal of complete devotion to a cause. Such views are more or less inevitable in an age conspicuous for its interest in historical research; and at the present stage of the world's enlightenment we cannot say that we are praising Mr. Krüger very highly when we state that he, after the manner of many of his German contemporaries, might have manipulated all the common lies about her to suit his fancy, but did not. There is no mention of the excommunicated comet nor of the female Pope; he does not rave about the religious character of the Inquisition. He does not dwell unnecessarily on the vices of Alexander VI; nor does he, by clever presentation, skew Papal sublimities into the ridiculous. He might have done so; for Rome's greatness like all other greatness is open to travesty. She claims mighty rights with an unblushing coolness that to anyone disbelieving in the divine origin of her central see must appear to be the quintessence of audacity. He will not laugh with the scoffers. To him her theology is not a mass of jargon, nor her ceremony mummery, nor her spiritual rule tyranny, nor her patronage of art mere worldliness.

In spite of these concessions to the exigencies of a correct historical ideal, error has crept largely into Mr. Krüger's book. It is strange that the very man that discards so many ill-founded aspersions on the Papacy, admits others quite as baseless. The faults of his narrative show how prejudiced and out of focus his view has been, and lead us to suspect the violence he must have done his distinctly Protestant bias in order to be as fair as he is. Church authorities are accused of disregarding the safe-conduct letter given to Huss, as if this letter made him immune from ecclesiastical punishment. He was not guaranteed any such privilege. He was simply to be free from molestation on his way to the Council. This interpretation of the letter is founded on the interpretation given to it by King Sigismund, by the Bohemian Knights accompanying Huss, by the Hussite nobility and by Huss himself. The king declared that he would be the first to consign the accused to the flames in case of proven heresy. The knights, though friendly to the heretic, said: "Nor do we wish him to go unpunished, if he is shown to have uttered false doctrine." The Hussite nobility wrote a bitter letter to the Council after the burning; but not a word was said of the safe-conduct. Huss declared: "I will not refuse any punishment due a heretic, if they convict me of error." Surely these utterances are evidence of their belief in the limitations of the letter's guarantees; and the reader of Krüger's Papacy would fain see the proofs substantiating his position.

Alexander VII is represented as overstepping the doctrinal authority of the Church, in a matter of fact, in ruling that the condemned propositions taken from the book of Jansenius expressed the opinions of the Jansenists. But he had a right and duty to do so. If infallibility can not ensure a Pope certainty in seizing the real meaning of a doctrinal work, his ex cathedra pronouncements against heresy could all be easily evaded by false teachers by the simple statement that he missed their point. Pope Honorius is declared to have been condemned as a heretic by a General Council of the Church. This statement is untrue, because an Ecumenical Council could not impute heresy where there was none. But Honorius was not a heretic: for, in emphasizing the existence of one Will in Christ he was opposing the doctrine of two human wills in Christ, the one in the soul, and the other, concupiscence in the flesh, but not the doctrine that in Christ there was a divine and a human will. The fathers condemned him for negligence and for favoring heresy. It is true the word "heretic" is used by them; but the only authoritative explanation of that word was Pope Leo the Second's; and his interpretation was "favoring heresy."

Pope Clement XIV, in suppressing the Society of Jesus, is said to have accused the Order of causing divisions in various States and in the Church, of teaching doctrine dangerous to Faith and Morals and of being greedy of temporal possessions. The Pontiff makes no such accusations, but says that his purpose was to restore peace amongst the princes of Europe.

Many of the writer's statements can be partially explained by attributing them to his non-Catholic view-point. For, it would be too much to expect non-Catholics to divest themselves of their adverse historical views so completely as to put their minds in consonance with the whole truth. It is amazing how a discerning historian of the Papacy, no matter what his religious connections may be, can close his eyes to its enduring strength and can prophesy its final dissolution. For, he that runs may read that, though human forces can explain much in the marvelous past and present of the Roman See, they cannot explain all. Statesmanship, art, theology, ritual and all other natural helps at the disposal of the Popes could not have enabled the Papacy to obtain the mastery of the Oriental and Western Churches in the early days, to recover from the Schism of the West, to prosper in spite of the reforming Churches of the sixteenth century and to set the world wondering by its marvelous display of vigor in the midst of reverses in these later times. Macaulay appreciated its indefectibility; but Krüger does not. He thinks that if the New Zealander on the broken arch of London Bridge were to live long enough, he could pencil and carry away with him still another sketch of still another ruined Church.

JOHN A. McCLOREY, S.J.

Catholic Social Work in Germany. Four Articles from Dublin Review, by CHARLES D. PLATER, S.J. M. A. Oxon. With Preface by the BISHOP OF SALFORD. St. Louis, Mo.: B. Herder, 35 cents.

It is an old failing of human nature to apply to other folk lessons which are meant for us; but in reading Father Plater's pleasant and vigorous essays an American Catholic is strongly moved to the contrary proceeding—to take what is meant for an exhortation to the Catholics of England, as a message to himself. For the achievements of Catholic Germany in the domain of social work, as they are stirringly set forth in this compact little volume, are not only admirable and even wonderful in themselves, they are a stirring object-lesson of what may be done anywhere, even under hard conditions, by a careful organizing of the forces of the Faith. The author's treatment of his subject, is strong and convincing. In the article entitled "The Call to Arms," we hear the mighty voice of that gentle giant Von Ketteler, summoning his brother bishops and their faithful flocks to band together against the three great dangers of the time—State Absolutism, bent on crushing out the Church; Socialism, corrupting the Catholic workingman; and the apathy of influential Catholic men of the professional and business classes, which was playing into the hands of the promoters of both the other evils.

Their call was heeded. In 1848, there met at Mainz the first of those great Catholic Congresses which year by year have stirred and guided the Faithful of Germany, along arduous but most effective ways of agitation and reform. In the next article, "The Autumn Manoeuvres," we trace the development of the social movement, as stimulated and organized through these annual assemblies, and see the Catholic Societies reaching out, with an ever more complex and effective organization, to grapple successfully with all the social problems of the times. "The Army in Action" carries the history further, shows us the rise of the Volksverein at the summons of the tireless Windthorst, and pursues its myriad activities of personal influence, of skilled direction and advice, of timely lecture courses and a wide range of printed instruction and appeal, to the point where it numbers six hundred thousand men for active members, and pours from its presses fifteen million publications in the year. Lastly comes "The Lesson of German Tactics," in which the teaching of the previous papers is very tactfully and sensibly applied to the conditions in England. Following the natural course of things, as shown in the German movement, the author suggests that first of all a healthy interest in social work be aroused among the pupils in schools and colleges, among the educated laity, and among Catholic workmen, no less than in the ecclesiastical seminaries, to which the late Sovereign Pontiff so earnestly recommended the study of social questions of the day. Then, continues Father Plater, "we must create a Catholic platform and rally our forces upon it; we must enable our existing institutions to extend their activities, and we must facilitate the creation of new organizations to meet specific needs."

One should read the essays themselves to catch the full inspiration which they convey—but even from so imperfect a sketch it will appear how pertinent in the main are the author's suggestions and remarks to our own circumstances and needs.

Indeed when one remembers the ever-growing importance of social study, and the vital nature of the questions which Sociology, under present-day conditions, is ever thrusting upon us one can hardly lay down this timely reprint without reechoing the words with which the Bishop of Salford closes his preface: "I warmly commend this book. . . . feeling that it is likely to be productive of practical good quite out of proportion to the modest bulk of the volume." EDWARD F. GARESCHÉ, S.J.

Great Possessions. By Mrs. WILFRID WARD. New York and London. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

In most of the popular fiction of the day impossible plots introduce us to impossible characters with still more impossible adventures. Not so Mrs. Ward's novel. She sees life singly and sees it whole. The plot is simple and, without digression, unites chapter to chapter and book to book. It begins on the first page and ends with the last. At the very outset, one feels that Mrs. Ward is skating on thin ice; but as one goes on one is reassured. The thin ice—so light and delicate is her touch—is soon passed over without the semblance of a break. Strangely enough, the heroine and the villain of the story are one and the same person—a girl who, unlovely at times, is always interesting. Mrs. Ward succeeds in making us like this young woman—despite the fact that she is guilty of heinous dishonesty and of slander the most diabolic. May we not say that the gifted author, whose book is thoroughly Catholic, has caught the spirit of Christ—a spirit which hates sin and loves the sinner. The book is touched throughout with refinement, the interest is sustained; binding, paper and type are excellent; but the proof-reader has overlooked a number of typographical errors. F. J. F.

A Military Consul in Turkey, by CAPTAIN A. F. TOWNSHEND, F.R.G.S. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. London, Seeley & Co., Ltd. 1910.

Captain Townshend, a British Military Consul from 1903 to 1906, at Mersina and Adrianople, has written an excellent book. He gives in the simplest language a quantity of useful and entertaining information concerning the parts of the Turkish empire in which he has lived and through which he has travelled. Content with narrating his own experiences and observations, he abstains from the political dissertations and the generalizing from a few facts, often unverified, which too often mar the works of travellers that have not come as close as he to the people. What deductions he draws from things coming under his experienced eyes he expresses with a modesty that wins confidence; but usually he gives the mere facts and leaves the reader to use them to confirm or correct preconceived ideas.

Throughout his book he is in sympathy with the people. Tolerant of their faults as of those of children, he can enter into their graver feelings, as the following short quotation will show:

"It seems a dreadful thing to us to think of coal fields and silver reefs and other elements of potential wealth lying dormant in the mountains of Asia Minor; but it seems more dreadful still to the Turkish villagers to think of Europeans and mining plant established on the hillside, and bustle and confusion everywhere to disturb the peace of the Faithful. They think that mining companies would be but the thin edge of the wedge, and that it would not be long before the people found themselves in the position of laborers on their own lands."

This extract, somewhat weak in style, for a captain in the Royal Scottish Rifles will hardly be a stylist, proves the author to be a man with his eyes wide open to the methods Europeans follow in exploiting the barbarous regions of the earth. Captain Townshend knows how to tell a humorous story, and he tells many, some of which turn upon the corrupt practices in money matters of minor officials. To these he is indulgent, accepting their plea that they must live, they cannot live on air, and Abdul Hamid holds back their pay. For him he finds no excuse. But even in discussing the abuses of the Yildiz Kiosk, he is saved by his sense of humor from being unpleasantly denunciatory. The book is enriched with many photographs illustrating not only places, but also manners and customs. H. W.

Mexico, the Wonderland of the South. By W. E. CARSON. Illustrated. New York: The Macmillan Co.

This is the best popular book on Mexico that we have seen. Without being painfully learned, it tells the average reader all that he cares to know about ancient Mexico and gives him an excellent bird's-eye view of the country to-day.

The Spanish Inquisition gets the customary rap on the knuckles. Twelve persons were not burned at the stake in 1574 (p. 49); in fact, during the existence of the Inquisition in Mexico for two hundred and seventy-seven years only forty-one persons received the extreme penalty. At the time of Maximilian's execution (p. 84) a formal remonstrance from Washington would have prevented it. Secretary Seward's will would have been a law to Juarez, but the decisive word was not spoken. United States Minister Campbell, then in New Orleans, was advised by Seward to recommend a humane policy; but he remained in New Orleans and forwarded offensive dispatches to Mexico. The Secretary of State spoke to Romero, the Mexican Minister at Washington, it is true, but he showed no particular energy or concern until intervention was too late.

There has been divorce in Mexico (p. 158) since 1874, but it is from bed and board; under the law the marriage bond is broken only by death. The epithet "Gringo," now an offensive designation for an American (p. 175), was applied by the natives to the European troops sent into Mexico by Carlos III in 1767. The word, as we see in the Mexican Father Alegre's "History," seems to have been coined then.

The writer's account of the life of President Diaz (pp. 200, 201) is historically inexact. After having been in arms against both Juarez and Lerdo, Diaz spent less than four months in Texas, simply to organize and promote another revolution. In December, 1875, he left Mexico and established himself at Brownsville; on March 22, 1876, he crossed the Rio Grande at the head of an armed force.

"After Diaz, what?" In the light of recent events, we may well ponder the author's answer to his own question: "The people have learned the benefit of tranquillity, and they are alive to the most serious danger which would menace them were there to occur any grave civil strife. Under those circumstances it is practically certain that, in the interest of American capital and American residents, the United States would occupy and possibly ultimately annex Mexico." The dream of Aaron Burr would be more than realized.

The chapter on the Machinery of Government merits careful perusal. It teaches us that if the autocrat is of the right kind, there are worse things than an autocracy. The fine, well-chosen illustrations add not a little to the charm of the book.

The Women of a State University. An Illustration of the Working of Coeducation in the Middle West; by HELEN R. OLIN. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York and London.

The object of this book is to prove from the experience of the universities of the Middle West, from that of Wisconsin especially, the desirableness of coeducation; its occasion, the disfavor with which not a few heads of colleges and universities are coming to regard this mixing of the sexes and the restrictions they are proposing to be put on it. The author is, therefore, a pleader for women, and, apparently, a special pleader. She dwells on the arguments in favor of coeducation; the objections to it she treats somewhat inadequately. Thus, in discussing the social life of the two sexes at the university and its abuses, she does not hint at the gravest abuse of all. Nevertheless the book is full of interesting information, most useful to such as would study the problems of the education of women. Its style is its chief merit. Particularly noticeable is the abuse "to emphasize," spelt "emphasise," in such expressions as "to emphasize relations, economy, elements, and so on." The first sentence of chapter III is an example of what style is not, and on page 20 appears the common misuse of "to accompany." But this is less the fault of the author than of the neglect of pure literature in modern education.

The Speakers of the House. By HUBERT BRUCE FULLER. Boston: Little, Brown and Co.

In the preface the author takes us into his confidence. Though a historical work, there is to be set before us for our instruction and entertainment not a heavy, prosy tome but a chatty volume instinct with life and spirit. The introductory chapter on the evolution of the office of Speaker of the House of Commons leads us to the kindred office of Speaker of the House of Representatives and its gradual development from the time of the first Speaker, to the present incumbent. And the truth is driven home upon us that, in our day, if the House is the great organ of the people, all but one of the pipes are plugged, subject to the will of the Speaker. The characterization of Clay, who was "more loved than trusted" by the people, deserves careful reading, even study, especially from ambitious politicians. Periods of political stagnation or turmoil in the country at large were faithfully portrayed in the various Congresses, and were seen in their most pronounced aspect in the House of Representatives. "The Speakers of the House" gives us the political history of the republic in a series of snapshots and moving pictures. The promise in the author's preface is fulfilled to the letter.

L'Observation Solaire. Par le P. MARIANO BARCELLS, S.J. Barcelona: Gustavo Gili, Universidad, 45.

The Observatory of the Ebro, near Tortosa, in Spain, has just published a large pamphlet of 135 pages, Memoires No. 2, dealing with solar observations. Father Mariano Barcells describes the apparatus and methods used at the Observatory in studying the sun's photosphere, and how its spots are classified, located and measured. He shows how the spectroheliograph admits of photographing the sun in any color or rather in any of its constituent gases, and how the results thus obtained are to be interpreted. In a third chapter he describes how the spectroscope is used to measure the velocity of a star in the line of sight, and in a fourth how the sun's heat radiations are measured. The pamphlet is illustrated by twenty-two diagrams and eight full page photographs.

As the Observatory was completed only about four years ago, the intention of the present and of a few other publications is to enter sufficiently into the description and use of the instruments employed, and into their mathematical and scientific explanation to enable students of astronomy readily to become familiar with them, and to use these publications somewhat in the manner of text books. As soon as this elementary series is completed, none but strictly technical publications will be issued.

A Life of Christ for Children, by MARY VIRGINIA MERRICK. St. Louis, Mo.: B. Herder. $1.00 net.

What the Countess de Ségur did so admirably for her little French grandchildren has now been done for American children by one whose heart beats warm for the lambs of the flock. Here is a story book containing the greatest, deepest, most far-reaching story, given in many bright, chatty chapters. Even the wee ones can drink in the wondrous mystery of God's love for man, so simply, so clearly, so touchingly, is it unfolded before them. Only a lover of children could speak as this book speaks. Many a less-gifted lover of children will gladly read to her young pupils or to her own little ones the appropriate chapters as the cycle of the feasts of the Church brings around the commemoration of the mysteries of the life of Christ. It is not catechism, it is not Bible history. It is a powerful appeal to an innocent child whose heart is always so sympathetically responsive to the call of love. Many have the will to guide the young to the feet of Our Saviour; here we have the way.

Elementa Philosophiæ Aristotelico-Thomisticæ. Auctore P. JOS. GREDT, O.S.B. Vol. I: Logica; Philosophia Naturalis. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price $2.45 net.

The aim of the author of the "Elementa" was to produce a text-book for beginners who, under the professors' care, were to go somewhat below the surface in their research. The work is in its second edition and has been arranged for a three years' course. The division of subject-matter differs somewhat from the ordinary. The present volume contains Formal and Material Logic and Natural Philosophy. In Material Logic no criteriological questions are touched; and under the heading of Natural Philosophy is also embraced Psychology. The second volume is to contain Metaphysics and Ethics; Metaphysics covering Ontology, Criteriology and Natural Theology. As the true worth of a text-book can be thoroughly passed on only by one who has taught it, we cannot say here with full assurance just how successfully the author has done his work. Still some points are worthy of notice and praise. Aristotle and St. Thomas are followed as guiding spirits, and copious references, with quotations, are made to them. The author's style is clear and pointed. The proofs are short and in fairly good form, and present-day questions and difficulties are not neglected.

EDUCATION

The growth of the rolling snow-ball is the most apt term of comparison to describe the increasing sweep of adverse criticism directed against the proponents of the elective system in our schools and colleges. Professor Charles Terry, of the Columbia School of Law, is the latest to bear witness against it. Writing in the December issue of the Columbia Quarterly, Professor Terry passes this judgment on Dr. Eliot's pet educational hobby:

"The introduction of the system when it was first proposed was hailed with acclaim as an inspiration of genius. In fact, it was no such thing. What boy of seventeen, which is the average age at which the student enters college, is capable of selecting from a mass of subjects those which are best adapted to the training of his mind? What does he know at that age of the probabilities of his future? How can he tell what his life work is going to be? And if he did know, what difference would that make? He might accumulate a few facts along the line of his intended work, which he would be just as likely to forget, and meanwhile he would miss the real purpose of his college course, which is not at all the accumulation of knowledge."

The Professor's theme is: "Law as an Educational Study," and in his development of his concept of the significance and process of education, he takes occasion to administer a second sharp rebuke to the President Emeritus of Harvard. Describing a certain misconception of education Professor Terry says it "has found recent illustration in a statement by a well-known educator that any person may educate himself by spending ten minutes a day on five feet of books, provided he, the educator, were allowed to select the books. This is a good advertisement of the books, but a sad blow to education." It is unfortunate that Professor Terry in his generally strong and commendable paper failed to state with precision just what he understands by education. He tells us in crisp, pithy phrases what it is not, but beyond a general insistence that the mind is "rather like a set of muscles to be strengthened and made flexible and accustomed to hard and varied exercises, until its use becomes perfectly natural, yes, even automatic, and until it is a delight to the student to use it," he does not clearly set himself down as a defender of the old notion of education as a process of mental drill and discipline. That he means to hold this thesis, however, one may gather from the drift of his paper. His orthodoxy, though, on this point makes perplexing Professor Terry's stand in opposition to the rule now obtaining in some institutions which requires previous college training as a necessary condition to admission to law schools. Surely the wider and fuller the educational drill a candidate may have received, the more general the cultural work through which he has passed as a preliminary to his special and professional studies, the greater the likelihood there will be of effective development in his more advanced studies. And it is but a weak objection to affirm that "we have all seen men in law schools who have had the advantage of the so-called college education, whose minds seem to be almost, if not quite untrained." Did it not occur to the Professor that their lack of training might have had some other explanation, especially in the prevalent strength of electivism which he so rightfully condemns?

The necessity of religious instruction as an element of our educational system is being insisted upon by an ever-widening circle of men interested in educational work. The spread of sentiment in this direction leads to the proposal of strange suggestions, strange at least in the sense that they evince complete lack of perception of what religious instruction requires. Thus, at the opening session of the annual convention of the National Reform Association which met in Pittsburg this week, there was submitted to the delegates a text-book explanatory of the principles of Christian government for pupils in the American public schools. The book contains abstracts of the laws against blasphemy, Sabbath desecration, profanity and immorality, with court decisions sustaining these laws. It is unique in its methods of removing all occasion of the imputation of sectarian instruction, but the sanction it alleges for its moral and Christian lessons scarcely brings it within the category of religious text-books.

A delegation representing the Board of Education of Freeport, Long Island, recently afforded Dr. A. S. Draper, State Commissioner of Education of New York, opportunity to express himself on a matter of school discipline in a manner which it may be well to set down for future reference. Following an order of the Commissioner prohibiting the reading of the Bible in the Freeport public schools* during the regular school hours, the Board of Education of the town fixed the time of the opening of the schools at 9.15 A.M. in order to allow teachers to read the Bible from 9 to 9.15 for those pupils who desired to attend that exercise. The delegation of the Board waited on Dr. Draper to ask his opinion on this action. The Commissioner's reply, while not final, is sufficiently explicit. Briefly summarized it contains these points worthy of record: (1) The State does not upon its own initiative object to the reading of the Bible in the public schools. It does prohibit such reading when patrons of a school object, on the ground that all citizens have common rights in the schools, and there must be nothing in the procedure of the schools to which any may object on conscientious grounds. (2) The State education department has never held that a board of education might not hold religious exercises in the fifteen minutes prior to the opening of school each day, provided attendance thereupon was not compulsory. (3) There is no law, although there is a very general usage, about opening the schools at 9 o'clock in the morning. It is the policy of the department to leave boards of education to their own judgment about such matters until objection be raised to any course they may take. If the objection can not be settled by conference between the objector and the board appeal is taken to the department of education. (4) The education law provides for the determination of such appeals. All the parties are heard, either in writing or orally, so that no one may complain that he has not had his day in court. The decision of the matter by the Commissioner of Education then becomes binding upon the parties interested and also becomes the rule of procedure for the entire State. "The matter presented in the Freeport case," he concludes, "is one of such character that I think it should be left to determination upon appeal. In the meantime your Board of Education would have the right to carry out the action taken September 6, 1909, opening the schools at 9.15 A.M., and it would have the further right to hold religious exercises at which attendance of pupils was not required, in the fifteen minutes preceding the opening of school. If there are any who object to this they can bring about a determination of the validity of their objections by an appeal to the Commissioner of Education in due form."

The property of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, adjoins the St. Mary's Seminary building, one of the oldest Catholic institutions in the country. The University has purchased the Seminary structure and grounds and this institution will now be moved by the Sulpicians to a more desirable and suitable location in a suburban district.

SCIENCE

Perhaps nothing is more interesting than the change that has come over medical opinion, in the last few years, as regards the tissue degenerations caused by over-indulgence in alcohol. It used to be considered definitely settled that arterial changes of many kinds were a common consequence of alcoholism. After arterial change nephritis was supposed to be the next common result, and following this came cirrhosis of the liver, the hardening and shrinking of this organ. Now every one of these supposed characteristic changes due to alcohol is in doubt. Probably none of them is due to alcohol alone. They do not occur in the worst cases of alcoholism and they do occasionally occur in people who have not indulged in alcohol to any extent, and sometimes in those who have been abstainers from spirituous liquors of any kind. This is true for all forms of alcoholic drinks. The mild beers and wines and the strong liquors apparently have about the same results, and these are not the organic changes that we have just mentioned. It seems important to call attention to this because, as supposed knowledge has spread in recent years, the mention of certain affections, especially nephritis and cirrhosis of the liver, have almost come to carry with them the implication of alcoholic indulgence.

The autopsy records of poor-houses and general hospitals in Massachusetts, in which a great many inebriates, men and women who have indulged in alcohol to excess for many years, were carefully analyzed in a paper read by Dr. Cabot of Boston, before the American Medical Association at its Atlantic City meeting five years ago. The conclusions were a surprise to all present, for they contradicted most of what physicians thought they knew with regard to the tissue changes produced by alcohol. Prof. Osler commented on this and suggested that our supposed knowledge was evidently much less well founded than we thought and that much more remained to be done. A recent German contribution to this subject, then, is most interesting. Professor Fahr reported the autopsy findings of over 300 cases of men who had been inebriates for many years and who had died usually as a consequence of alcoholic indulgence. It is easy to understand that in the Harbor Hospital of a large seaport like Hamburg a great number of victims of chronic alcoholism would be among the patients. In nearly all of the cases, as is true generally of sailors, the alcohol had been taken in the form of spirits and not as beer or wine.

The result of these autopsies was reported editorially in The Journal of the American Medical Association, November 27, 1909. They are not in harmony with the idea that alcohol is a poison which produces widespread and gross anatomic changes throughout the body, or that it is a common cause of either arterio-sclerosis, that is, arterial degeneration, or nephritis. With regard to cirrhosis of the liver, less than five per cent. of drunkards suffer from it, while the autopsy records of patients without any alcoholic history in Hamburg itself show that it may occur quite apart from alcohol. Evidently some contributing cause is needed for its production, and this may act without alcohol, though alcohol predisposes to its action.

What was found, however, and is of the greatest importance, were changes in the nervous system which predisposed to the sudden deaths so common in alcoholism, and to that lack of resistance to all other diseases which characterizes the alcoholic subject. Fahr suspects that changes in the ganglion cells of the heart may be responsible for the sudden heart failure so common in this class of patients. Protracted feeding on alcohol fails to cause, in guinea pigs and rabbits, any of the changes that used to be considered so common in men, and even does not produce the fatty degeneration in heart and liver which is very common, but does produce a marked tendency to sudden and unexpected death. It seems important that knowledge of this kind should be widely diffused, because it adds another motive to the cause of temperance. At the same time it is very interesting to realize that most of the teaching of physiology in the public schools concerning what were the accepted conclusions as to the effect of alcohol upon the tissues is quite wrong and must now be corrected. It is this tendency to teach mere scientific opinions as absolute facts that has been deprecated by many scientists who have dwelt especially on the necessity for care in this matter as regards the young, since they will later have to be asked to correct previous false notions, to the serious detriment of what they think of science.

A cablegram from the Kiel observatory announces that Professor Poro, of La Plata, Argentine, observed Winnecke's comet on October 31, midnight, G. M. T. It was then in right ascension 17 hr. 11 m. 51.6 sec.; declination 27 deg. 18 m. 43 sec. The comet is visible in small telescopes. Winnecke's comet last made its perihelion passage on January 22, 1904. Its period is 5.828 years, its perihelion distance 0.92338.

The opinion that sand-filtering is an unsatisfactory way of purifying drinking water is being adopted by many sanitary engineers. Those of the German Imperial Sanitary Office and of the Pasteur and Koch Institutes have long since been of this mind, and it is now announced that the Russian Government has discarded sand filters and is substituting the ozone process of sterilization, which has proved the safest means of destroying water bacteria.

An invention for preventing collisions on railroads has recently been perfected by the well-known Father Adrian D'Antonio, O.F.M., who came to America from Italy a short time ago to negotiate with American railroads who are interested in what promises to be a marked advance in existing methods.

The inventor has been engaged for nearly two years in perfecting his new system, and hopes in the near future to demonstrate its efficiency and practical character. If adopted it may mean the revolutionizing of railroading as regards signalling and protection of trains against collision. Father D'Antonio is at present residing at the Franciscan Monastery, Brookland, Washington, D. C.

Artificially crystallized rubies are claimed to be such perfect imitations of natural stones that experts have been obliged to resort to the microscopic test to distinguish them from natural stones. As the public is willing to pay from $75 to $100 a carat for these synthetic stones, importers of natural gems begin to fear a loss of trade.

Professor Thoulet, the French oceanographer, announces some interesting facts concerning the movements of sand, the result of waves and tides. They are, for the most part, in a zigzag direction. He calculates that each grain travels at least 8,000 yards up and down the beach. The lateral movement he estimates to be about one-tenth of an inch a minute.

A new comet was discovered on December 6, by Mr. Zaccheus Daniel of the Princeton observatory. The position is as follows: right ascension, 6 h. 16 m. 30 sec.; its declination, plus 33 deg. 50 min. The comet has a slow motion north and is readily discernible in a small telescope.

The invention of Padre Maccioni of an instrument giving warnings of an approaching earthquake is a notable step in the science of seismology. The instrument is based on the theory that every displacement of the earth's crust is preceded by an electro-magnetic disturbance.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"Divorce"—Lyric Theatre—A dramatization of Paul Bourget's novel by the author himself. The English version is by Stanislaus Stange. As is usual in such cases the story suffers in the adaptation from its original form. As a drama it loses all the shadings and gradations which blend and harmonize the development of its theme as a novel. The result is crude and somewhat mechanical. We perceive the manner of its makings, the piecing of its parts. This is regrettable, as it detracts materially from the effect intended i. e. the evil of divorce leading as it does to the destruction of family life and the subversion of religion. A woman has divorced her first husband, the Count de Chambault, by whom she has had a son, Lucien, married a second, M. Darras, while the first still lives. M. Darras is a rationalist and an atheist, who hates the Church, a common type in France at the present hour. He has consented however to allow his daughter, the fruit of the second marriage, to be brought up a Catholic, yielding in this to a sentiment of his wife, who on the occasion of her second marriage had given up her faith. When the time arrives for her daughter to make her First Communion, the mother, who has been instructing her child, finds that her faith is not dead and awakens to the realization that she is not truly married to Darras. Here ensues a struggle between her love and her revived conscience. This is enhanced by the conduct of her son Lucien by her first marriage. The young man has been brought up by his step-father as a believer in the absolute rights of the individual conscience. He proposes to live in free union with a young woman of socialistic ideas and is opposed by his step-father and mother. He retorts quite pertinently that they are united practically under the same arrangement much to his mother's horror and his step-father's indignation. He refuses to listen to their expostulations and departs from home. The son's attitude is a mirror to the mother's soul. At this juncture the first husband dies. Madame Darras believes that this will lead the way to the solution of her agonized perplexity and proposes a religious marriage to M. Darras. He indignantly refuses. Her conscience finally triumphs and she prepares to leave him. As she is about to depart, Father Euvrard, a priest whose advice she has previously sought and who has admonished her that she was living in a state of sin with M. Darras, enters, and counsels her to remain for the sake of her daughter, whose faith her father has threatened to destroy, and in the hope that her obedience in time may soften her husband's obstinacy. This she does and so wins Darras' consent to a religious marriage. The denouement is abrupt and not at all convincing, nor is there any explanation of Father Euvrard's counsel. On what satisfactory ground does he advise Madame Darras to live with a man to whom she is not in truth married and who has violently and bitterly denied the virtue of a religious marriage? M. Bourget's moral theology seems considerably awry here. In spite of its many crudities and its abrupt conclusion "Divorce" is strongly dramatic and tense in its emotional situations. It does drive home its lesson of the evils of divorce, a lesson quite as sorely needed in this country as in France. No dramatist in America has dared face the evil and use it as the material of a play. In France where the Faith still largely affects public morals and opinion it is an essentially vital question and the conflict readily finds expression in the theatre. In America where its religious aspect is so largely ignored, though its evils are recognized well enough by the intelligent and serious minded, no playwright has addressed himself to its presentation on the stage in the hideous aspect it bears to-day. The Labor problem, the Negro problem, the Social problem, the Trust problem, have all been dramatically propounded. Why is it that the most serious problem of them all, the Divorce problem, yet lacks dramatization by an American playwright? Is it that the religious conscience has not been sufficiently quickened in this country to realize that this monster is at our gates seeking to devour us?

"The Nigger"—New Theatre—The Negro problem, so far from even being propounded in this play is but a concomitant incident of its action. The entire matter hinges upon the discovery by a young Southerner of high social standing, who has become Governor of his State, that he has a strain of negro blood in his veins. Brought up to believe that the negro is no better than an animal, a mere beast of labor, on the level with the brute, he regards this taint in his blood, though remote—for he has but the sixty-fourth of a negro strain in him—as an ineradicable disgrace. It changes his whole view of life, determines him to resign the governorship, break off his engagement with a young lady of prominent social position and devote himself to the cause of the negro; himself sinking to the position of a negro in the social status.

The premise is inadequate to the conclusion in a character such as the playwright depicts Phillip Morrow. He is delineated as a man of exceptionally high type, of the utmost honesty, sincerity, integrity and nobility of soul. Yet he is not able to rise above the social prejudice of his surroundings, and weakly surrenders to the stigma which he imagines the inheritance of a strain of negro blood has placed upon him. He is depicted as in his decision influenced by the mealy-mouthed philanthropy of a Senator Long, who preaches as the highest motive of a man's action what he dreams will be the condition of mankind two or three centuries hence. This is simply the injection of the cant of Humanitarianism into a situation, which—so far from being saved by it, is actually damned by it. Up to this point in the third act this action has been strong and consistent. Here it weakens and flattens into a foolish incongruity and sheer absurdity. A motive is thrust in, which in practical life has not force enough to actuate a man to lift his little finger, let alone to determine him to complete self-immolation. But the author of "The Nigger" has made a significant failure simply because he has laid down as his ultimate ethical fact the Humanitarian fetich of the hour. In his first two acts he has built up an intensely dramatic situation, which completely collapses in the third under the influence of a dominant fad. The New Theatre Stock Company play very ably their various rôles and in this only can the production be termed a success.

"The Lottery Man," Bijou Theatre.—After several attempts at placing a successful play, "The Lottery Man" at this theatre bids fair to hold its own for some time to come. It is a comedy, or rather farce of a wholesome flavor. Briefly, the story is that of a young newspaper man in financial straits who conceives the idea of offering himself in marriage by lottery. The winning number turns up in the shape of an unprepossessing spinster, to the intense disgust of the living prize. At the eleventh hour it is discovered that the spinster, who has insisted upon the fulfilment of the contract, had obtained the lucky coupon fraudulently. The victim is therefore released and marries the young woman of his choice. The play is well constructed, clever, and intensely amusing, with a thoroughly competent cast. The situations are humorous with here and there a touch of sentiment to heighten the general effect of the comedy.

SOCIOLOGY

The census-enumerators for next year are to be chosen by the supervisor of the census in each district without regard to politics. As far as possible they are to be residents of the district they enumerate. Former enumerators will be preferred provided they are physically capable. An enumerator must be able to write plainly and with reasonable speed. Those wishing to be employed must send to the supervisor of the district in their own handwriting an application endorsed by two business men of the community in which they live. They must undergo a practical examination consisting chiefly of the filling up of a schedule of population or agriculture from data supplied. Enumerators may be of either sex and need not be over 21. Their compensation is to be from two to four cents for each person enumerated; from twenty to thirty cents for each farm and ten cents for each barn or enclosure of stock. When these rates are insufficient the director may fix a mixed rate of from one to two dollars a day and a suitable reduction of the fees just mentioned; or else allow three to six dollars a day for a day of eight hours. As a rule no allowance will be made for traveling expenses. Enumerators must take an oath of office, and once appointed, can not refuse to serve unless for urgent reasons. As the Government goes to great expense to obtain an accurate census, all are bound to give an exact account to the enumerator.

The Association of Belgian and Holland Priests, of which the Right Reverend Henry Gabriels, Bishop of Ogdensburg is chairman and the Reverend Alphonse Notebaert of Rochester, N. Y., is president, has undertaken the work of colonization in conjunction with the Catholic Church Extension Society. Archbishop Messmer of Milwaukee and Bishop Fox of Green Bay are also interested in the matter. The plan is to collect the scattered Catholics of Holland and Belgium in this country and to organize them in settlements of at least one hundred families, so that each settlement will be a self-supporting parish. Father Julius E. DeVos, who has spent a quarter of a century in such work, is director of colonization. He addressed the National Farm and Labor Congress during its session at Chicago, pointing out the advantages of Catholic colonization for both the immigrant and the country at large. He insisted upon the value of Italian, Slavonian and others who have lived on the land from time immemorial, and, therefore, bring to this country robust bodies and skill in agriculture. This is a point of great importance. These peoples, unaccustomed to cities, too often degenerate in unsuitable surroundings, and from this comes a certain prejudice against them.

The second International Scientific Congress on Leprosy recently held at Bergen, Norway, was attended by one hundred and seventy delegates from various countries. The resolutions that were adopted insist on the contagiousness of the disease, preventive measures, and the isolation of lepers; those who have lived among lepers should be examined from time to time by specialists; certain occupations where the danger of communicating the disease is great should be forbidden to lepers; although no sure specific is known the congress does not classify leprosy among the incurable maladies.

ECONOMICS.

The imports of paper and its products in 1899 were valued at $3,000,000. In 1909 the value will reach $12,000,000. The exports of the former year were worth $5,500,000; of the latter year, $8,000,000. This account excludes books and engravings of which the imports were in 1899, $1,333,000. In 1909 they will be $6,000,000. The exports for 1899 were $2,666,000 and for 1909 they will be $6,000,000. During 1909 the imports from Germany will be $7,000,000, from Great Britain, $1,000,000; from France, $500,000; from Japan, $300,000. The imports from Japan are diminishing. Lithographic labels and prints made up nearly one-half of the imports. The chief exports are printing paper, $2,000,000, writing paper and envelopes, $1,000,000; paper hangings, $300,000; playing cards, $200,000. Of the printing paper, Great Britain, Canada and Australasia took nearly $1,350,000. During 1909 Germany is the chief exporter of paper in the world: its exports being estimated at $36,000,000. The Netherlands is next with $22,500,000. Austro-Hungary follows, then comes Great Britain with $11,500,000. Belgium and the United States export $8,000,000 each.

Sugar was the chief import during 1909. The value of foreign sugar imported will reach a little over $100,000,000; from Porto Rico and Hawaii about $70,000,000. Next to sugar come hides and skins. The import for 1909 will be about 500,000,000 lbs., worth $100,000,000. The highest import in past years was 399,000,000 lbs., worth $84,000,000 in 1906. The average value of the yearly importation during the decade ending 1909 is $57,000,000. Since the new tariff came into force the average value of monthly imports is $34,500,000: the average value before that time having been $19,000,000 monthly. Goat skins are the chief import, their value being over one-third of the total. Hides of cattle are a little more than one-quarter. Nearly one-half of the goat skins come from the British East Indies, and of the hides over one-half are from Mexico and South America.

The domestic lake commerce for October was 12,018,212 net tons, being larger than that of the same month in 1907 and 1908. Over one-half was iron-ore, which exceeded the amount carried in 1907. Wheat, oats, corn, lumber, pig-iron, manufactured iron were larger than in 1908. Coal, especially anthracite, was less than usual. There were 8,470 departures of 13,840,365 net tons register, against 7,884 and 11,784,404, respectively, in October, 1908. The traffic for October through the Sault Ste. Marie canal was 9,127,240, being better than that of the last two years. For the season to the end of October 16,165 vessels of 39,188,066 net tons register passed through the canals, the highest figures ever reached.

Dr. Lyman Abbott, in an address to a meeting of 1,500 students of Yale University on Socialism, pointed out that Socialists would have the Government the only employer, and thus the political boss and the industrial would be combined in one person. This system would deprive the workman of the freedom in choosing his employer which he now enjoys. He urged his hearers to labor for as wide a distribution of wealth as possible, by opposing the giving away natural resources, the property of the nation, to private individuals and by helping to pass proper laws to control corporations.

At the recent Lake Mohonk Conference Vice-President Sherman, who, during his long service in Congress, had much to do with Indian affairs, paid a well-deserved tribute to the work of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions.

"The Catholic school mission located in Washington is officered by men of education and men of conscience—square men," he said. "So far as has come under my observation, this Bureau, maintained for the education of the Indian, and maintained at an expense which runs away up into hundreds of thousands of dollars, and almost entirely from private subscription, is well managed and is being conscientiously conducted, I believe, for the betterment of the Indians with whom we have come in contact."

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The Brooklyn Alumni Sodality met in Brooklyn College on December 5, its first anniversary. Mass and Holy Communion were followed by breakfast and the election of officers. There were sixty-three members present. Dr. John H. Haaren was re-elected president and Dr. J. H. Walsh vice-president. During a symposium following the breakfast Dr. Haaren made an earnest appeal to the members to cherish high ideals in Catholic life and to take a leading and active interest in all Catholic enterprises, instancing in particular educational work, the Laymen's Retreat movement and the reading of "the latest and best Catholic Review of the Week—AMERICA." He assured his hearers that he read AMERICA from cover to cover every week and found its varied articles absorbingly interesting.

A central and permanent bureau for the purpose of unifying and systematizing the charitable activities of the archdiocese has been established in Philadelphia. It has a board of directors chosen from among the Catholic laymen of the city, and Mgr. N. F. Fisher has been elected its president. In connection with the Bureau a house is to be established wherein dependent children and adults can be taken care of temporarily pending their disposition in suitable institutions. The placing of orphans in families rather than crowding them in asylums is another work to be undertaken by the new Bureau.

The Rev. Terence J. Shealy, S.J., of New York, who is conducting the Retreats for Laymen, has announced the following schedule of week-end retreats to be given during the next six months at Keyser Island, South Norwalk, Conn.: January 14; February 10 and 25; March 11 and 18; April 8, 15, 29; May 6, 13, 20, 27; June 3 and 10. Retreats from the middle of June to the middle of September will be given every week-end at Fordham University. It is the earnest hope of the Retreat Committee to begin the building of the House of Retreats in the early spring.

Archbishop Moeller of Cincinnati, assisted by a number of prelates and clergy of the province, consecrated the new Cathedral at Nashville, Tenn., on December 7. The sermon at the formal opening on the following day was preached by the Rev. Emmanuel De La Morinière, S.J., of Spring Hill College, Mobile, Ala. The occasion brought together a very numerous and representative congregation and is regarded as one of the most notable events in the recent history of the Church in the South.

Press dispatches from Rome state that on December 9 the Pope received Bishop Walsh, of Portland, Me., in private audience. The Bishop presented the Pontiff with several articles made by Indians living in the Diocese of Portland. The Pope also received Bishop Kennedy and the students of the American College in Rome in their annual audience. Among those presented was the Rev. Dr. Henry A. Brann, rector of St. Agnes' Church, New York City.

A few weeks ago the Archbishop of Westminster was invited to join the Congo Reform Association. He refused, saying that he distrusted the methods of the Society, and that the perusal of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's book, which it had been hoped would persuade him, only made him distrust them the more. Cardinal Mercier and the Bishops of Belgium have written to thank him for his prudent conduct. Speaking in Liverpool a few days ago, he took occasion, from the fact that that city is the centre of the agitation, to explain his position.

The matter involves three questions: the tenure of land, the taxes and the atrocities. With regard to the first every one is entitled to his own opinion, though Belgium had done only what other civilized powers had done. As to the second, it is quite lawful to discuss whether the natives should pay their taxes in money or in labor. Touching the outrages, the Congo is an immense territory, and no one has a right to generalize concerning the whole from isolated facts. It is just also to hear the opposite side. It has much to say which the Reform Association will not listen to. Moreover, missionaries scattered over 86 stations with 60,000 converts have nothing to say on the subject.

Five Brooklyn pastors will celebrate the silver jubilees of their ordination on December 20: the Revs. John F. O'Hara, Martin J. Tierney, Thomas J. McAleer, John G. Fitzgerald and Charles H. O'Dougherty. In the five parishes special preparations have been made for proper celebrations.

The Sisters of the Visitation of Rock Island, Ill., have been ordered to pay $10,729 to the National Copper Bank Company of New York for damages on a note by judgment rendered in the United States District Court. The case grew out of P. J. Kieran's defalcation a year ago.

The Rt. Rev. Mgr. Thomas J. Shahan, rector of the Catholic University of America, was formally invested with the robes of a domestic prelate on December 16, His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons officiating.

The Right Rev. John Stariha, who resigned the See of Lead, South Dakota, last April, because of ill health, has been made titular Bishop of Antipatride in Palestine.

In succession to the Very Rev. L. F. Kearney, the Very Rev. Matthew L. Heagan has been elected provincial of the eastern province of the Dominican Order. Father Heagan has been Prior of the Immaculate Conception College at Washington, D. C.

At the ordinations in Rome, on November 1, a young Zulu, a student at the College of the Propaganda, was ordained to the priesthood. He is the son of a chief and the fourth member of his tribe to be ordained in Rome during the last ten years.

A Catholic Converts' League was organized in Washington, D. C., on December 8.

PERSONAL

The dinner of the Boston Society of Architects at the Exchange Club, on the evening of December 6, was made a very significant occasion by the presence, as principal guest, of His Grace Archbishop O'Connell, the others being Hon. Bellamy Storer, Rt. Rev. Mgr. Splaine, D. D., Rev. Father Gasson, S.J., Judge DeCourcey, Dr. J. Bapst Blake and Mr. Pierre Chagnon LaRose. Mr. Ralph Adams Cram, who presided, in introducing His Grace the Archbishop, recalled the historical events which had brought about the present estrangement between art and the Church, and accepting the presence of His Grace as a happy omen of a growing consciousness in both of a sense of mutual loss of prestige.

His Grace the Archbishop talked of the inner meanings of art, particularly of the need of a profound conviction in the mind and soul of the artist. After some pleasant remarks by Mr. Storer, reminiscent of his earlier relations with the late Mr. McKim, Mr. Charles D. Maginnis read a paper, illustrated by lantern slides, on recent Catholic Church Architecture in England and America, in which he emphasized the superior technical and ethical standards of English Catholic art. Mr. Maginnis maintained, however, that the exercise of an equally discriminating patronage on the part of the American Church would prove that these standards were not impossible to us. He protested vigorously against the spirit of commercialism which, particularly in this country, is so grave a menace to the development of a Christian art with responsible standards.

OBITUARY

Mr. Kendal E. O'Brien, M. P. for Mid-Tipperary, died in London, November 29, of pneumonia contracted in his journey to London and intensified by his insistence on taking part in the final divisions on the Land Bill. Born in Culleen, County Tipperary, in 1849, he took part in the Fenian movement, and sold one of his farms to pay O'Donovan Rossa's expenses in the Tipperary election of 1871. He was John Mitchell's most prominent supporter for the same constituency in 1878. His knowledge of agricultural conditions, as well as his ability and wise leadership, made him a marked man in the Land League campaigns, and he suffered both eviction and imprisonment in defense of his principles. On the passing of the Local Government Act he was elected Chairman of the Tipperary District Council, and for his opposition to the Boer War was removed by the Lord Chancellor from the Justiceship of the Peace. Elected to Parliament in 1900, he rendered good service by his constant attendance and his mastery of agrarian questions. He always showed himself as devoted to Catholic as patriotic interests.

The Rev. Lawrence Heiland, for thirty-nine years a priest of the Diocese of Cleveland, and rector of the Church of the Sacred Heart, New Bavaria, Ohio, died on December 1. He was born in Germany, December 21, 1841, and with his brother, the late Rev. John B. Heiland, was ordained to the priesthood, in Cleveland, December 17, 1870.

Brigadier-General Thomas McCurdy Vincent, retired, a Catholic veteran with a record of distinguished services in two wars, died in Washington, D. C., on December 7. He was born in Ohio and graduated from West Point in 1859. He retired from the army in 1896, after forty-three years of service. He was the author of several works and monographs relating to the military service.

Sister Mary Fidelis, former Superior of Our Lady of Lourdes Academy, East Oakland, California, died recently at St. Mary's Hospital, San Francisco. She was a sister of the Rev. A. P. Doyle, the distinguished Paulist missionary, and of Sister M. Louise of the Sisters of Mercy.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

At the convention of the Evangelical Lutheran Council, held in Minneapolis, the Board of English Home Missions, in its biennial report, strongly recommended that missions be opened at great educational centres, for the benefit of students who came from Lutheran families. The board's report says:

"It is evident that, however much we may condemn the sending of Lutheran children to non-Lutheran, undenominational, irreligious and anti-religious schools, the conditions will continue. In many cases the only opportunity our young men or women have of securing an education is by means of such institutions and by the incurring of such risks. The Christian readers of our papers and magazines have no doubt been startled by the revelations made concerning the teaching in these so-called unsectarian and non-denominational institutions with reference to marriage, family, morals and the Bible. It is truly alarming when the very institutions which a Christian civilization has nourished into greatness undermine the foundations of our civilization."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

PRIESTS AND PROFITS II.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"Priests and Profits" to-day was good; warnings are always good. Yet as money and a knowledge of its care is absolutely necessary if one would get along, it is not well to decry too strongly new schemes on the money question in relation to church affairs. I therefore beg leave to submit these ideas, anonymously, so that my authority or lack of authority shall not influence the judgment of readers.

In this city there are many churches, parochial schools, colleges and other church property, the aggregate value of which is very great. It is all insured, and the annual premiums must also be very great. I have not the faintest idea of the total, so I shall not venture to say whether they amount to $25,000 per annum or twice or thrice that. Suppose now the Diocesan Council would deliberate on the matter, and enact that a certain proportion e.g. 10% or 20% of the insurance should not be renewed at the next renewal, and that the portion of the premiums so saved on the hundred or more churches in the city should be paid into an Insurance Fund to be controlled by the Council. The next year another fraction could be taken off, and in five or ten years no insurance be effected, but the premiums to continue to be paid into the Fund. This Fund would be drawn on to repair or replace church property injured or destroyed by fire. Does any reader know enough on the subject to be able to advise as to the plan, or does it look like the old plan of lifting one's self over a fence by the boot straps? I cannot recall many churches destroyed or even much injured by fire in this city, yet the merest prudence compels continuous and great outlays for insurance.

New York, Nov. 27.

G.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Allow me to thank you for AMERICA's article last Saturday, entitled "Twenty-Third Street Men." The warning to our Catholics comes not any too soon. The Y. M. C. A. is doing, as you know, an awful amount of harm to our people. It is all right, as AMERICA says, for non-Catholics; but our Catholic young men who belong to the Y. M. C. A., as far as they are permitted, soon commence to think that one religion is as good as another, and that the Y. M. C. A. is the best of all. The lamentable phase of this matter is that our brother priests do not appear to realize the danger and are reluctant to sound the warning.

With best wishes,

JOHN JOSEPH SWIFT.

Troy, N. Y.

I am a subscriber for AMERICA and am more than pleased with its contents. It supplies a want long felt in the United States. This fact was never more evident than in the one-sided accounts of the bloody and disgraceful riots in Barcelona and the hypocrisy over the death of the wild Ferrer. Wishing the AMERICA great success, (Hon.) FRANK J. SULLIVAN.

San Francisco, Cal.

It is with a sense of profound pleasure and satisfaction that I extend to you and your associates my heartiest congratulations upon the great and noble work you have undertaken in publishing a Catholic weekly review. AMERICA fills a long recognized want in the field of Catholic journalism in the United States. Its high and scholarly tone, neither too learned for the simple nor too common for the scholar, its attractive form and clear type are bound to give it a cosmopolitan character, and accomplish much in the way of elevating the standard of Catholic citizenship in America. AMERICA marks a new epoch in American Catholic journalism.—Rev. Joseph Schroeder, O.P., Washington, D. C.

It is the most welcome visitor that ever entered our sanctum. There are many able papers among our exchanges, but I can assure you that AMERICA holds the first place. I always look forward to Saturday, because Saturday brings me AMERICA and AMERICA brings me the best of everything in the news line. When the history of our times comes to be written, the historian will note the fact that the "creation" of AMERICA was an epoch-making event of the Twentieth Century.—Rev. M. J. Foley, Editor of Western Catholic.

CHRONICLE

Home News.—Advocates of a ship subsidy find encouragement in the bold stand in regard to their policy taken by the President in his message. The lobby seeking favorable action for a subsidy bill are pressing the leaders in both Senate and the House to waste no time in its passage.—Plans for the abolishment of mail wagon service in the large cities and the substitution of local transportation of the mails through gigantic pneumatic tubes are being considered by the post-office department. A special commission made up of the post-masters of Chicago, New York, Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and St. Louis, has been studying the feasibility of the plan.—Senator Cullom, of Illinois, whose interest has been aroused by the deplorable disaster in the Cherry Valley mines, has introduced a resolution in the United States Senate which is the preliminary step toward bringing about the prevention or, at least, the reduction of the number of such disasters, and in any event lessening the loss of life consequent upon them.—The House of Representatives passed the Esch bill which requires railroads to make full monthly reports to the Interstate Commission of all accidents and gives the commission power to compel railroads to provide uniform equipment for their cars.—Government lawyers have been going over the books of the National Sugar Refining Company to find out how much the treasury has been defrauded in ten years of sugar underweighing. As a result of the investigation the company, as declared by H. L. Stimson, special counsel for the Government, announcing a settlement, will pay $675,573 in back duties on sugar. This amount was found to have been withheld from the Government on importations made in nine years. The civil settlement will be no bar to prosecution of any one guilty of fraud.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States the following resolution was adopted: "Be it resolved, That the thanks of the Board of Directors are hereby voted to Mr. Thomas F. Ryan for the unselfish services which he has rendered to the policyholders of this society."—Last week was notable for railroad accidents. In the United States and Canada there were thirteen serious wrecks in six days, an average of two a day from December 13 to December 18. The record of deaths for the six days is twenty-six; the injured number over 200.—The selection is announced of Major General Leonard Wood for Chief of Staff of the army, as successor to Major General J. Franklin Bell, who will be retired in April.—The Buffalo, with 700 marines, was ordered to sail from Panama to Corinto on advices that American citizens in Nicaragua were in peril.—All opposition to the confirmation of Judge Horace H. Lurton, of Tennessee, recently named by the President Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, has disappeared. He will be enabled to sit when the arguments in the Tobacco Trust cases begin, January 8.—By an emphatic majority the people of Worcester, Mass., the largest no-license city in the world, voted for the return of the saloon and the sale of alcoholic beverages under license.—Columbia College has received in gifts a total of over $4,000,000 in seven months.—

A movement has been started to secure by popular subscription the erection at the National Capital of a building which will serve as a memorial to the Father of His Country and furnish a convenient meeting place for international and national gatherings for the promotion of science and art.—General Green B. Raum, formerly Commissioner of Internal Revenue and Commissioner of Pensions, died in Chicago.—During the big game season just closed twenty-three persons were killed by being mistaken for deer or by the accidental discharge of firearms in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and Massachusetts, and three in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Other causes added eight more deaths to the list.

A Change in Bond Policy.—Under the discretionary powers given him by the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, Secretary Mac Veagh has decided to reject State, municipal and railroad bonds as security for public deposits. This marks a notable change from the policy introduced by former Secretary of the Treasury Leslie M. Shaw. Beginning February 1, all banks using these bonds for this purpose, will be obliged to withdraw them and to deposit in their stead Government, Philippine, Porto Rican or District of Columbia bonds at par; Hawaiian bonds at 90 per cent. of par, or bonds of the Philippine Railway at 90 per cent. of market value, but not exceeding 90 per cent. of par. Only a little over $10,000,000 of deposits will be affected by the change, but its significance lies in the fact that it will strengthen the price of Panama Canal bonds. The result of the ruling will be that these cannot be sold at less than par.

A French ex-Minister's Opinion.—Former Foreign Minister Hanotaux, chairman of the recently organized Franco-American Committee designed to improve the economic and social relations of France and America, has issued an article appealing for public support of the committee. In it M. Hanotaux predicts that the United States, which, he says, now holds the balance of power in the Pacific, is destined some day to intervene in the quarrels of the great nations of Europe. "Every clairvoyant European statesman," says the ex-Minister, "now foresees the probability of American imperialistic action. It is the constant preoccupation of Emperor William."

The Trainmen's Stand.—A vote of the 130,000 men involved in the demand made upon the New England and Eastern railway lines for a wage increase of 10 per cent., has been taken. Trainmen and conductors on thirty-two lines are interested. President W. G. Lee, of the former, and A. B. Garretson, representing the latter, are tabulating the returns. Seventy-five thousand of the 90,000 ballots cast were in favor of demanding an increase of wages that will average 10 per cent. A ten-hour day will also be asked and overtime pay for all work above ten hours.

Opposition to the Proposed White Slave Bill.—The old State's Rights principle is the motive underlying a vigorous minority report of Democratic members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the White Slave bill favorably acted upon by the Republican members of that committee. Representative Richardson of Alabama, who prepared the minority report, terms the Mann bill, approved by the majority, which aims at the suppression of the traffic by regulation of interstate commerce, "unconstitutional and a gross violation of the right of States to regulate the morals of their own inhabitants." The bill in question imposes a maximum penalty of ten years' imprisonment and a fine of $5,000 for violations, and contains stringent deportation and interstate traffic provisions.

A Record Passenger List.—The President Grant of the Hamburg-American landed from the ports of Hamburg, Boulogne, and Southampton an army of 3,000 "future citizens" at Ellis Island, taxing the administration building to its capacity. The big liner not only thus set the record for the largest number of aliens ever brought over on one ship, but also for the greatest number of souls ever conveyed to this port on a single vessel. Crew and passengers arriving totaled 3,747 persons.

Nicaragua.—Nicaragua recently made a protest with threat of reprisals to Costa Rica on account of the frequent attacks made by insurgents from the Costa Rican frontier. In reply Costa Rica points out that the great extent of the frontier makes it difficult to prevent isolated attacks.—The resignation of President Zelaya has not produced any change in the attitude of the United States or of the revolutionists towards the Nicaraguan Government. José Madriz has succeeded him.

Montreal City Council Graft.—The report of Judge Cannon, Royal Commissioner appointed to hear evidence as to the civic administration of Montreal, was made public on Monday of last week. The report, which analyzes the evidence of about eight hundred witnesses, has won high praise from the press and public. After naming eight aldermen and twelve others as guilty of malversation, Judge Cannon says: The administration of civic affairs in Montreal since 1902 has been saturated with corruption. The majority of the aldermen have administered the committees and the City Council so as to favor the private interests of their relatives and friends, to whom contracts and positions were distributed to the detriment of the general interests of the city and of the taxpayers. As a result, out of the annual revenue of five million dollars, 25 per cent. has been spent in graft and abuses of all kinds, and the greater part of the balance has been employed in work of which the outcome has very often been ephemeral. "Following revelations made before me," writes Judge Cannon, "the citizens on the 20th of September adopted the reduction of the number of aldermen and the establishment of a Board of Control. As for the division and the representation of the city by wards, everybody agrees in condemning this system, which gave birth to patronage and to its abuses. I recommend to the citizens of Montreal, after a serious study of this question, to adopt another system creating a Council, composed of aldermen representing the entire city and working in unity for its growth and prosperity. The Council of to-day is composed of groups and coteries struggling among one another with such bitterness that they necessarily lose sight of the high interests of the community. As for the civil and criminal suits to which proof, as given in this investigation, could give rise, the Council elected at the next election should adopt the line of conduct to follow." Those condemned will have to pay the cost of the Cannon inquiry. Meanwhile the Montreal Star and many citizens writing to that paper, which did so much to provoke the inquiry, are clamoring for immediate prosecution by the provincial authorities, before the coming civic election, of the grafters named by Judge Cannon.

Great Britain.—The Government has issued an order to the effect that estate duties, customs and excise may be paid at rates hitherto existing, but it reserves its right to recover the difference between these and the Budget rates, should it win in the coming election. Should Budget rates be paid, this difference may be recovered by the payers in case of the Government defeat. Reports were current that in many cases payment of duties had been refused. The Times, enquiring at the Custom House, was told that they were without foundation. The tea merchants and the Burton brewers resolved to pay the Budget duties according to the above order, and the latter agreed not to change the price of spirits till the whole question is settled.—The Circulating Library Association having resolved to do something to stem the flood of immoral literature, asked the Publishers' Association to send them copies of all new works a week before their publication, that they might determine whether they would put them in circulation or not. The Authors' Association pretends that this is a demand for the suspension of publication until the committee of the Libraries shall have censured a work, and condemns it as unreasonable.—Mrs. Leigh, a suffragist, who brought action for damages on account of forcible feeding in Winson-Green Prison, Birmingham, against the Home Secretary and the authorities of the prison, lost her suit. The jury rendered their verdict without leaving the box.

Ireland.—The Central Council of the Irish National League met in Dublin last week to determine their policy in regard to English Parties at the coming elections. It was agreed, in view of Mr. Asquith's recent declaration pledging himself and colleagues to full self-government for Ireland, to advise the Irish in Great Britain to cast their votes for the official Liberal or Labor candidate. As the Liberal and Labor parties have agreed not to oppose each other, the Irish voters' task has been simplified. They are astonished at the strong tone of Mr. Asquith's Home Rule utterances and all are agreed that the only wise policy now is to support the Liberals. The Tories in insisting that the Lords' power should be retained in order to block Home Rule, are keeping that question to the front, so that, should the Liberals win, it cannot be urged that the electorate has not pronounced upon it. Only the near approach of the elections has prevented a land war in Ireland during the winter. The mutilation of the Land Act by the landlord party has prevented future sales and the expected division of the grasslands, and has disturbed many former agreements, so that threats are being made to renew "cattle-driving" and withhold payment of rents till admitted grievances are rectified. The Irish Party as a whole has repressed this tendency but the most conservative members declare that they will do so no longer unless after the elections there is a remedy in sight.—The Temperance movement has been making great headway of late especially in Connaught. Mr. Runciman, M.P., a member of the Cabinet, has called attention to it at a public meeting in London, declaring that the only drunken man he found in the west of Ireland was one of his own countrymen, and he commended to England the temperance methods adopted by the bishops and priests of Ireland. Among the most efficient workers are Dr. O'Dea, Bishop of Galway, and Father Cullen, S.J., editor of the Irish Messenger of the Sacred Heart.

India.—District boards and municipalities are now entitled to send twelve members to the Bengal Legislative Council. An order has been issued by the Government requiring these to be members of the boards and municipalities they represent. The Calcutta agitators, who were counting on these seats, are not a little disconcerted. With the same idea of keeping the disaffected out of the councils another regulation has been made disqualifying all who have been dismissed from Government service or who have received at least a six months' sentence in a criminal court. The Hindu politicians are discontented. On the other hand, the Mohammedans of Oudh are much pleased with their status under the new reforms and may be depended on to send useful members to the councils.

Australia.—The Commonwealth's naval unit is to consist of one first-class armored cruiser of the Indomitable type, three second-class protected cruisers, six river gunboats and three submarines. As the Imperial Government is to contribute £250,000 a year, and loses its subsidy from the colonies of £200,000 a year, the cost to the Commonwealth will be only £255,000 annually.—New Zealand has passed an appropriation for a Dreadnought for the Royal Navy.

France.—On December 18 President Fallières received the special Chinese envoys headed by Prince Tsai, who are sent to notify the French Government of the accession of the new Emperor. After the reception the President gave a luncheon to the envoys.—La Croix of the 11th inst. publishes several documents which prove how vigilant are the governmental persecutors of Catholics. A subprefect writes to a rural mayor, complaining that an orphan has joined a society at the head of which is a priest, and requesting the mayor to warn the boy that this may lead to political manifestations and that he must not join any society without permission of the Inspector of Public Charities. Another subprefect is surprised that another orphan should be an altar boy. His guardian is requested to insist on his ward observing religious neutrality by refraining from so close a participation in divine worship. A third document shows how shallow is the government's boast that it allows free schools. In a Côte-d'Or commune, married women who had nursed, fed and tenderly reared charity orphans, were recently deprived of these orphans because they sent their own daughters to a free school.

Portugal.—The Government's proposal to arbitrate the boundary dispute in Macao has been rejected by China, which charges the Portuguese with urging their claim through cupidity instead of justice. The disagreement is hundreds of years old.—The Portuguese ministry, which has been in power since last May, has resigned owing to certain Church controversies which have reached an acute stage. The Minister of Justice and Ecclesiastical Affairs, Dom Francisco José de Madeiros, was the first to surrender his portfolio because he could not proceed with what he considered sufficient rigor against the Bishop of Beja, whose tilt with the authorities was mentioned in our Lisbon correspondence.

Germany.—The German press is unanimous in its hearty reception of the telegram of Admiral Prince Henry of Prussia in which he declares the statement recently published in the London Daily Mail that Germany is making ready for war against England to be an infamous lie. Commenting on the Prince's curt phrase the press expresses a hope that, coming from the source it does, it will serve to quiet for some time the insinuations against the policy of the empire.—The various radical groups in the Reichstag have coalesced to form one united party to be known as the German Liberal People's Party. Last week the party program was announced. It declares in favor of the gradual reduction of agricultural and industrial taxes, the restrictions of special privileges of great landowners, progressive taxation of property and legacies, electoral reforms, including minority representation, and a liberal development of the constitution making the ministry directly responsible to the Reichstag. If this program be ratified by each of the groups, the amalgamation will be consummated at a general party convention to be held in 1912.—It is expected that at the opening of the next session of the Prussian Landtag definite reference will be made in the speech from the throne to the reform to be made in the electoral franchise.—The long looked for legislative action in regard to Potash production will soon be taken by the Prussian Government. A bill to be submitted in the Bundesrath will render the production practically a state monopoly. In case of its acceptance by the Bundesrath, and there seems little doubt of it, the present contracts with American interests shall be allowed to run for two years more.

Austria.—The announcement that the garrisons along the Tyrolese frontier facing Italy are to be strengthened, has aroused much comment. The order coming from the Minister of War in Vienna is generally accepted as a striking commentary on the official reports regarding the pleasant relations between Austria-Hungary and Italy.—Once more it is affirmed that the end of the obstructive tactics on the part of the Slav party in the Reichsrath is in sight. Reliable report has it that the different groups in the body are preparing an agreement which will make it possible to bring the protracted session to a close this week. The sittings of the week were prolonged again and again only to find all business rendered impossible through urgency motions presented by the Czechs as a means of obstruction.—Dr. Wekerle, Minister-President of Hungary, in a recent audience with the Emperor Francis Joseph, informed his Majesty that it seemed impossible to secure the acceptance of the provisional budget prepared for presentation to the Reichstag. Despite his representations Dr. Wekerle was directed to have the bill introduced in the house at once.—The Emperor has had a conference with former Minister-President of Hungary, Graf Khuen-Hedervary, in which the present condition of affairs in that country was thoroughly discussed. A temporary solution of the threatened crisis in the kingdom is looked for through the probable nomination of a new cabinet in which the leading spirits shall be Graf Khuen and former Finance-Minister Dr. von Lukacs.

Japan.—The Great Northern Steamship Company, whose steamers ply between Seattle and Japan, has decided to make Manila a port of call on both outward and return voyages. Under this arrangement a passenger may stay seventeen days at Manila. The steamship Minnesota, the largest in the Pacific, will make four round trips to the Orient during the coming year. Tourists may leave the steamer at Yokohama, proceed by rail or through the Inland Sea, and rejoin the Minnesota at Nagasaki. The first sailing has been fixed for March 22. Other sailing days are June 20, September 19, and December 19, from Seattle.—The disaster at the Onoura colliery, Japan, on November 24, caused the loss of 762 lives, only forty-three of the miners escaping.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Hosanna in Excelsis

Christians, who accept unhesitatingly the truths pertaining to the plan of Redemption as unfolded in the Gospel, rarely consider the possibility of other means by which reconciliation with God for sin might have been effected. It was possible for the Father Himself to become incarnate, or the Holy Ghost, or indeed all Three Persons of the Blessed Trinity. Again, had God so willed, the nature of the angels might have been taken up by one of the Divine Persons in lieu of the nature that had fallen through Adam or, for that matter, God could have canceled the debt and restored man to his primitive state of righteousness without exacting any payment or reparation whatever. Now, however, that we know the plan which commended itself as most acceptable to Divine Wisdom, it is easy to perceive the wonderful harmony in all that goes to make up the grand symphony of our redemption.

This accordance is all but thrust on unreflecting minds at each recurring Christmastide. The light that on Christmas day spreads over the earth from the hills of Galilee and the warmth that fills men's hearts when they contemplate the Babe of Bethlehem direct one's thoughts to the motives which influenced the councils of the Most High in decreeing that the Word should be made flesh, should be born of the Virgin Mary, should dwell among us as our Teacher and our Guide and finally consummate His life work with the tragedy of Calvary.

The Incarnation of Christ is above all a manifestation of the charity, the mercy and the loving-kindness of the Almighty such as no other method of redemption could set forth. In it infinite goodness reached the limit of its munificence in the perfection of the gift bestowed upon the human race. "God so loved the world as to give His only begotten Son." The pagan philosopher denied that there could exist any friendship between God and man, they were so far apart; but the charity of God from out the depths of His wisdom found in the Incarnation a means of bringing together in closest union the finite and the Infinite.

In this mystery the omnipotence of the Creator shines out resplendently, for it unfolds a gracious kindness which the mind of man if left to itself could never have conceived. Furthermore, who would ever dream that God's justice even when not tempered with mercy could demand so rigorous a compensation for sin as is exacted in the life and especially in the passion and death of the Son of Man? Wherein, too, could the wisdom of God be made so manifest as in the mystery of the union of two natures in one Divine Person? Thereby justice and mercy are happily united and the claims of both marvelously adjusted. The thought of the new dignity conferred on human nature should restrain man from sin, and the example of a divine Model should strengthen him in the practice of every virtue.

There is also a peculiar fitness in the Incarnation of the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity rather than of the Father or the Holy Ghost; for it is through the Son that all things have been made; through Him naturally all things disordered should be restored. The Word, too, is the substantial Image of the Father. It was the image of God, man, that was shattered by sin. How appropriately, therefore, is mankind restored by the Image of the Father to the brightness of its original representation. Add to this that the Word is by nature the Son of God. Who better than He could impart to men the grace or the power to become the adopted sons of their heavenly Father?

Nor was it seemly that the angelic nature, though more perfect than man's, should be chosen as the instrument by which salvation should come to Israel. It was not the angelic nature that was tainted, for not all the angels had sinned. But in the sin of Adam, the head and representative of our race, and in the consequent ruin the entire human family had become involved. For God to become man, therefore, was to raise the nature that had fallen and to atone for the pride and disobedience of the first Adam by the humility and obedience of the Second. Man's nature, unlike that of the angels, is composite. In it are included the material as well as the spiritual; so when human nature was assumed by a Divine Person all the gradations of being were combined as it were in a divine harmony.

Finally, in the supposition that it was particularly fitting that Christ should take into the unity of His personality human nature in preference to any other, it will be at once evident how equally befitting it was that He should be born of a mother, thus likening Himself to the other sons of Adam and enabling those whom He had made once more the sons of God to call Him brother.

The Virgin birth is a necessary corollary. Granting that the Holy of Holies was to seek a tabernacle among the children of men, no perfection that can be lavished on a creature could with propriety be withheld from the adornment of the body and soul of that chosen daughter of Eve. When a temple was to be built for the earthly habitation of the Almighty it was God Himself who drew the plans. David was not to build it, because he was a man of blood—but the wise and peaceful Solomon. The preparations were on a scale of magnificence beyond description. And Solomon tells us the reason, for it was a dwelling prepared not for man but for God. So when we listen to the words of the Magnificat we recall the bounty and the munificence of God in the gifts lavished upon the Virgin Mother. "For He that is mighty hath done great things to me; and holy is His Name"—not one great thing but great things. And He has done them to me, for to her alone are they done and in what He has done and in the manner of the doing He has shown Himself both holy and mighty.

Such was the theme of Mary's song whilst she carried in her bosom the Child through whose coming all the nations of the earth should be blessed. The Crib of Bethlehem is doubly dear to the Christian, for it marks the fulfilment of the prophecy that clearly links the Virginity of the Mother with the Divinity of her Son. "Behold a Virgin shall conceive, and bear a Son and His name shall be called Emmanuel." On the morning of the nativity when with tears of joy she beheld for the first time her Divine Son and offered Him the homage of her immaculate heart, her spirit rejoiced anew in God her Saviour. In the ecstasy of the moment she would have uttered a new Magnificat if words could give adequate expression to the joy she felt at being at the same time a Virgin and God's Mother. But the angels took up the song of her heart and awoke the echoes of the hills with the "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace to men of good will." The Incarnation is the greatest of all the works of God and reflects on Him the greatest glory. It is also the surest pledge of salvation to men of good will.

How consonant, then, are the revealed facts clustering about the Incarnation and the Nativity with what our reason, enlightened by faith, enables us to fathom of the motives that actuated the Almighty in the plan of Redemption. It is thus "by the mystery of the Incarnate Word," as the Church sings in her Preface on Christmas day, that "a new ray of glory has appeared to the eyes of our soul; so that, while we behold God visibly, we may be carried by Him to the love of things invisible."

The Saints

The sixteenth century witnessed the flight of the northern nations from their ancient home, the Catholic Church. For a long time they revelled in their freedom and indulged in orgies of mad hate towards the faith of their fathers. But in more recent days the hatred seems to have died away into a blind and inherited instinct of dislike which is not above a mild curiosity to look back and study the old ancestral Home. And so, if we read modern books and periodicals, we catch glimpses of alien faces and prying eyes on the edge of the encircling darkness gazing in puzzled wonder at the splendor and holiness of the Church. For them the Church is an invention of priestcraft and ignorant superstition; and it is an unending mystery why this abomination of the world is associated with the noblest and the purest and the most beautiful in the history of the world's best civilization. They have been taught to look at the Church as a political machine forever engaged in diplomacy and the tracasseries of court and star-chamber. It is, we confess, a function of the Church, as an organized human body, founded by Christ for the perpetuation of His message, to maintain her existence amid the political tumults of states; but it is her only purely human function and is a mere necessary means—in lieu of miraculous governance by God, directly or through His angels—for the fulfilment of her higher functions of teacher and minister of grace.

But these wayfarers from the night will not have it thus. The Church for them is solely a political entity of the worst type, and history points to many a flagrant instance in seeming support of their contention. Being unable, therefore, to reconcile this monster of political corruption with the serene and undeniable sanctity that has synchronised with every forward step of the Church through history, they are driven to dissociate the two. Notice the advanced stage of the discussion. Formerly the sanctity was flouted and denied, and the images of the saints shattered in iconoclastic rage. The present tendency is to admit—cautiously—the moral beauty and high heroisms of the saints, but to deny as quickly and as forcibly as possible the slightest connection between the saints and the Catholic Church.

Ingenuity is driven to extremes to explain away the apparent close relationship. But ingenuity is the spice of modern literature and more highly appreciated than the truth which it so often obscures. "It was not the Church that made the saints," writes one lady in the course of an article entitled "The Saints," which appears in the current number of Scribner's Magazine, "but the saints, in a real sense, who made the Church." We suspect the modifying clause in the latter part of the sentence is intended to qualify the verb, contrary to the grammatical construction. But whether it be so or not, the meaning is clear and amounts to this: That the Church is lucky because the accidents of time have given her the allegiance of noble men and women who would have been better off without her. She is presented to us after the manner of some American political organization, which craftily reaches out after a few respectable names to serve as a "blind" before the unsuspecting public for the dark and nefarious designs of the "bosses" and the less respectable candidates.

We mildly protest to Eleonora Kinnicutt against the injustice of her statement, and all the more because there is just enough of truth in it to make it the very worst kind of falsehood. We do not wish to intimate that the writer was guilty of deliberate misstatement. Probably she herself was unable to disentangle the element of truth in it from the large element of untruth, a predicament which, we fear, will be shared by many of her readers.

Let us subject the sentence to a slight analysis. The saints in a very real sense have made the Church, just as the members of any society make it a corporate association. The mere fact of my belonging to a club, or a society, or a commercial company, helps to make the body, or moral entity, of which I am a single unit. But the existence of the society does not depend upon me. I can leave the club, and the club will continue to exist as long as it has members in good standing. And so, in a very real sense, it is also true that I do not make the society.

And similarly the saints have not made the Church. Any single saint, or any group of saints, might have left the Church. They would cease to be saints thereby but the Church would continue to exist. Tertullian bade fair to become a saint and doctor of the Church until he thought he was holier than the Church herself and, turning a deaf ear to her teaching, he became a tragic instance in history of unbridled individualism.

The saints, therefore, made the Church in the sense that collectively with other of her members, less distinguished for known sanctity, they composed the external society known as the Catholic Church. But there is another very real sense in which the saints made the Church. Christ founded the Church to be an agency of Divine truth and supernatural grace. These are the only known means of sanctification. Consequently, the absence in the Church of men and women, superior among their fellows for their devotion to high and heroic ideals of holiness, would create the presumption that the Church was not the one founded by Christ, but some other, a travesty or an imitation parading under false colors. The presence of saints, then, becomes an imperative mark of recognition in the true Church. Christ gave His Church the power and duty to make saints out of frail humanity and the presence of conspicuous sanctity in any organization claiming Divine origin becomes one of its most valuable credentials. We would call the attention of the writer, whose article we are discussing, to the historical and doctrinal fact that, if the saints, in a very real sense have made the Church, it was first necessary for the Church in a very real sense to make the saints.

We search history in vain for examples of remarkable sanctity outside the Catholic Church. Protestantism and Agnosticism have given the world nothing better in the way of ideals than dull respectability and a heartless sort of bursarial philanthropy. Whenever, as in the case of the heroine in "Middlemarch," a non-Catholic feels inspired to climb beyond prosaic levels, he runs the risk of losing his friends and falling into serious trouble. Genius, without God's special grace, can never achieve sanctity. Mere natural attempts to scale the heights of sanctity lead to disaster and the mad-house.

In Protestantism and unbelief there is no vent for lofty aspiration in the great art of life. Any rising above the average in conduct is branded at once as fanaticism or folly. There is only one Church in which sanctity thrives as a natural flower. Its celibate priesthood, its religious orders, congregations, and sisterhoods, are among the many outward expressions of the Divine spirit in the Church. Catholics take their priesthood and monasteries and convents as matters of course, and much as they may admire and revere, they also take their saints as a matter of course. They see in the saint only the living embodiment of the Church's teaching which they themselves endeavor to approximate as far as human strength and God's grace will allow.

This is an age in which belief is ridiculed and belittled in comparison with conduct. The notion that conduct can be emphasized at the expense of belief is an after-glow of the Reformation. Alexander Pope has given us the formula:

"For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

This glib generality is the root of all the present prosy mediocrity in conduct and life outside of the Catholic Church. It may be inexplicable to disbelievers in a supernatural life, but it is a fact which they cannot deny that the Catholic Faith has brought forth greater heroism in life and conduct and has actualized higher ideals of purity and self-denial and charity than any form of belief or unbelief which the world knows. An historical fact like this ought to have weight in determining a valid connection between conduct and belief.

There would be less trouble in arriving at the truth if non-Catholics would turn their eyes for a while from gloating over the political scandals of the Church to the study of the long line of saints that goes back unbroken to the time of the Apostles and that gleams frequently with most dazzling brightness at the very time when human selfishness and political chicanery were most observable in some churchmen of high position.

Choose any age you please in the history of the Catholic Church, it

"did not want
Bright sprinklings of all human excellence
To which the silver wands of saints in heaven Might point with rapturous joy."

The teaching and ideals of the Church made the saints; no one has ever tried to prove that Catholic teaching and ideals ever made a corrupt churchman. The distinction is a natural one and not hard to draw. Catholic belief is not so coercive as to make even a churchman good against his will. Faith and goodness are still the result of free acts even in the case of a Pope.

We would suggest the old test to the writer of "The Saints." Let her, whilst she is perusing their lives with interest, and haply with sympathy, close the book for a space and imagine the saints back again with all their heroisms upon this sublunary planet, men and women living in the next street or across the avenue. Would they follow the preachments of "new thought" and fling the Gospels aside as so many legends? Or, if it is decided that they are to keep their faith in Christianity, can we imagine them entering any of the Protestant churches, singing vaguely worded hymns and listening at the foot of the pulpit to chilly aphorisms and exhortations to civic righteousness and a respectable life?

We need not pursue this suggestion farther. Before dropping the subject we think we ought to point out a few of the errors of fact which abound in the article before us. The Bollandists have never formed themselves into a society. They are Jesuits who are appointed by their religious superiors to engage in hagiographical research. The only society they belong to is the Jesuit Order. The latest volume of their stupendous work was not issued in 1867, as the writer states, but some twenty years later. It is not true that Normandy has not produced a single saint. It is not true that rich countries and prosperous times have produced few saints. The histories of Spain, France and Ireland, and, perhaps, Italy, stand out in contradiction of such an assertion. The joint assemblage of those belonging to the Greek, Armenian and Arabic (sic) rites in a common temple for united worship during the fifth century is not a "fine example of unity without uniformity" in the sense of the writer. There was essential uniformity of doctrine and practice. The author can still see similar fine examples of unity and uniformity in Rome to-day, where uniate Greeks, Armenians and Copts meet Catholics of the Latin rite in an identity of Catholic Faith. St. Augustine is mentioned as the patron saint of theologians. We always thought it was St. Thomas Aquinas. Finally, where did the writer discover authority for the statement that "fourteen among the great saints are called the 'apothecaries'?" We have a consuming curiosity to learn.

Midnight Mass in French Canada

In French Canada midnight Mass is the most picturesque and dramatic event of the ecclesiastical year. Holy Church concentrates on that occasion all her pomp; the lowliest chapel joins with the most imposing cathedral in this apotheosis of Christ the Redeemer. The silence of the midnight is broken by the rush of trampling feet responding to the bells that announce the coming of the Lord; but throughout the country each steeple proclaims by a joyous chime that Christ is born. The summons is sent forth not only to the village, usually built about the church, and rejoicing in the name of a patron saint, but to the more remote habitations scattered for miles around. The village streets are presently lined with people hastening to the sacred edifice at a time of night when ordinarily all is still and the habitants who keep early hours have been long wrapt in slumber. Innumerable vehicles, moreover, come speeding from all directions, often from long distances, over snowy wastes, star-lit, whence the ordinary boundaries have been eliminated. For the highroads used in summertime are now buried out of sight under piles of hard frozen snow, and the new paths lead over submerged fences and often over frozen streams as well. From time to time the silences of those snow plains are made vocal with the snatch of some Christmas canticle or the interchange of friendly salutation between the occupants of the various vehicles, sleighs and traineaux, which latter are low, railed carts much employed in the country districts during winter. Each particular church makes the festival as impressive as possible. Christmas music is rendered, a brief Christmas sermon is preached, and Christmas greens are gathered there from the adjacent forests and hills. The French Canadian, who is truly a child of the Church, enters into the spirit of the occasion with all his heart. He even defers the bestowal of gifts and the other social features of the Yuletide until New Year, and thus he regards the Nativity as purely a religious festival and the "Messe de Minuit" with the reception of the Holy Eucharist as its central point. To focus this idea of the middle night celebration, one may perhaps be permitted to dwell somewhat more in detail upon two special midnight Masses, which recur to memory, and which are both typically French and Canadian.

The first was in the chapel of a convent, and it must be borne in mind that all the convents hold such celebrations with the same essential features. This one in particular, however, had been in times past the dwelling of one of the most notable of Canada's Governors, Lord Elgin, and of some of his successors long before Confederation. It had, therefore, many bits of local history clinging about its walls to lend a special significance to the precincts. It stood, moreover, upon the side of that mountain which Cartier surnamed "the Royal," and was then and is still presided over by the Daughters of Marguerite Bourgeoys, according to Parkman, "the gentlest figure in colonial annals," and in a very real sense one of the founders of Montreal. These details may serve to emphasize the atmosphere of old worldliness and of tradition which clung about that purely Canadian institute, and which gave a peculiar character to its midnight Mass.

Without, there was a snow mist, whence moon and stars emerged with a splendor that symbolized the newly risen "Light of the World." There was no tread of hurrying feet to break the stillness, only an occasional sweep of the wind downwards from the frozen heights above. Along the corridors of the ancient edifice came the religious in their habit that has something quaint and medieval in its aspect, and the pupils in their costume of black and veils of white, passing decorously towards the chapel, which was mostly shadow, save for the multitudes of tapers on the altar and the blaze of countless colored lamps, glowing jewel-like through the dimness. The altar and the sanctuary entire were framed in evergreens, pines and fir trees, that diffused an aromatic odor through the sacred enclosure. The organ pealed forth the most jubilant strains, and at the moment of twelve, when the curtains were drawn from before the Crib, a band of tiny children began that exquisite little carol, so naive and so delightful in its simplicity:

"Il est né, le Divin Enfant, Il est venu pour nous sauver."

It is scarcely necessary to add that, listening to those infantine voices, the few privileged outsiders who chanced to be present were moved to tears. Then the Mass proceeded, sung by the choir, and at each fitting interval one or other of the familiar carols was rendered. For thence as from countless church and religious institutions sounded and resounded in one vast chorus of praise:

"L'écho, Gloria, et l'écho, Gloria,
L'écho de nos montagnes,
Redit ce chant, Gloria, redit ce chant, Gloria.
Le chant de nos campagnes:
Gloria in excelsis Deo, in excelsis Deo."

In such songs of joy, in the gay and inspiring "Noël, Noël, Noël," to the accompaniment of organ, piano, harps and violins, arose those clear and care-free voices with a marked suggestion of the choirs invisible. At the Communion time every one present, as a matter of course, advanced to receive Holy Communion, whilst the songs ceased, and like a faint echo the organ softly played "Pastores Vides Errantes." Surely that midnight celebration and the dawn of that Christmas morning belonged to some higher and purer sphere.

That other Christmas eve, which recurs so vividly to memory, was ideal in its weather conditions: the Northern night, seen to its full perfection with unrivalled brilliancy of stars, with pure, newly-fallen snow, as immaculate as the Maid-Mother of Bethlehem. It was intensely cold, icicles hung glittering from the houses and tree-tops, the leafless trees were likewise encrusted with frost and the streets covered everywhere with snow. The "Royal Mountain" arose solemnly in the background in its mantle of white, and the broad St. Lawrence lay "hard bound in the grip of the frost."

About half past eleven the streets, which had scarcely grown silent after the rush of the Christmas shopping, began again to be thronged with people hastening to the various and beautiful churches which abound in the "Rome of America." The towers of Notre Dame rose sharply defined against the deep blue of the sky, and thence a sonorous peal from its chime of bells, and notably the "Great Bourdon," one of the largest bells on the American continent, sent forth its summons and its message. The interior of that vast church—for it was in the old days, before re-decoration and electric light—was dim, its walls, stained with time and as with a rare tapestry, closely girt round with historic memories. The altar alone, set far back within the spacious chancel blazed with lights, embowered as it was in Christmas evergreens, that fairly pervaded the church, and amongst which waved softly the silken banners of the various societies. Every available spot was filled, and amongst that vast throng might be seen distinct, as though carved in marble, the Norman and Breton types, true descendants of those who wrought such mighty things for Canada in its heroic days.

Preceded by that veritably medieval figure, the Beadle, in scarlet cloak, cocked hat and staff of office, came a train of acolytes and the officiating priest in gold vestments. Just as the city clocks were tolling twelve and the bells proclaiming that mid-hour, there was an instant's pause, and a boy's high, clear voice rose in the first notes of the "Adeste, Fideles." A thrill ran through that vast assemblage, and the choir of many hundred voices, as one man, thundered forth:

"Natum videte Regem angelorum, Venite adoremus, venite, adoremus Dominum."

For at that same moment the veil was withdrawn from the Crib, disclosing the figure of the Royal Babe with the Blessed Virgin and St. Joseph bowed in adoration. It was an indescribable moment. Heads were bent in a fervor of adoration which seemed to communicate itself even to the most indifferent. The music of the Mass, one of Mozart's, was splendidly rendered by the far-famed choir of Notre Dame, with orchestral accompaniments. At the Credo there was an impressive moment, when priests and people knelt for the "Et Incarnatus est," and again, when at the Offertory, a tenor voice of exquisite quality was heard in that ringing canticle, inspiring as a clarion note:

"Peuple à genoux, attends ta délivrance, Noël, Noël, Voici, le Rédempteur!"

Once more the air was vibrant with a thrill of deep emotion. The non-Catholics, carried away like the rest, by religious emotion, seemed likewise absorbed in the Mystery of the altar, proceeding with its almost weird solemnity, and recalling those scenes in far-off Bethlehem of Juda, enacted nearly two thousand years before.

At the time of the Communion there was a sound as of rushing waters, a multitude rising to their feet and advancing to the altar. Was it then, or at some other midnight Mass, that four thousand was given as the number of communicants? When the high Mass was concluded many of the lights were extinguished, the deacon and the sub-deacon, with most of the acolytes withdrew, while the priest, going down to the foot of the altar, began a low Mass called the Mass of the dawn, "Messe de l'Aurore," followed by the third Mass of the feast. During the course of those Masses the choir sang the sweetly solemn "Nazareth" of Gounod, together with a succession of those quaint carols, a legacy from their Norman or Breton ancestors, which still delight the Canadian French and have also become endeared to their co-religionists of other nationalities since they breathe the very spirit of Christmas and are permeated besides with the spirit of the past that constitutes the charm of Lower Canada and differentiates it from any other place in North America.

When the Mass was finished, the congregation streamed forth to the broad esplanade of the ancient Gothic church, and to that noble square of Place d'Armes, where of old took place so many a notable event. The streets, silent and deserted, were soon thronged with people, and the sound of cheerful voices, together with the inspiring jingle of sleigh-bells, broke the stillness. "Merry Christmas," "Joyeux Noël," were interspersed with snatches of one or another of the Christmas hymns.

"Noël, Noël, Voici le Rédempteur," or more frequently a stanza from the Christmas hymn by excellence, the old, old hymn of our forefathers, be we of what nationality we may, the heart-thrilling "Adeste, Fideles," which is at no time and in no place heard to greater perfection than at midnight Mass in French Canada.

The Christmas Office

The Divine Office, which all in sacred orders must recite daily, is by the ordinary law celebrated publicly in cathedrals and collegiate churches, that is to say, churches served by canons, and in the monastic churches of men. Matins and Lauds are the night offices; and though by dispensation those of each day are usually anticipated, that is, celebrated in the preceding afternoon, in all such churches except those of the strictly contemplative orders, this anticipation is hardly used on the great Christmas feast. The reason is, that the Mass has its own place in the office following one of the parts called Prime, Terce, Sext and None, according to the character of the day. On Christmas day the first Mass follows Matins, the second follows Lauds, and the third follows Terce. Hence the night hours must commonly be said at their proper time, more or less, according to the hour of the celebration of the first Mass.

Matins and Lauds, always beautiful, are on great feasts a magnificent function. Let us imagine ourselves assisting at the Christmas Office in one of the great churches of the old world. It is the dead of night, but the bells are ringing joyously. On entering we see the choir a blaze of light. The vast body of the church is dim, though on every altar candles are burning brightly. In a few moments the clergy enter. First walks the master of ceremonies, then two whom we shall often see in the course of the function. They are called cantors. After them comes the celebrant, then the canons in their splendid choir dress in order of dignity, and last of all the inferior members of the chapter, all walking two and two. Having knelt for a moment or two in prayer, the celebrant goes to his place on the epistle side and all the others take their places, arranging themselves in two divisions of two or more ranks in their carved stalls arranged lengthwise along the sides of the choir. The two cantors occupy a low bench near the celebrant. When all are in their places the master of ceremonies gives a sign, and each standing recites secretly the Pater, Ave and Credo. Then the celebrant begins the opening words: "Thou, O Lord, wilt open my lips." The whole body answers, and the versicles end with the Gloria Patri and Alleluia. Now the cantors, bowing profoundly to the celebrant, go to the middle of the choir and, after saluting both sides, begin the invitatory. This is a brief call to prayer, varying with the day. Now it is "Christ is born to us; come, let us adore." It is sung to a beautiful melody, and is repeated by all present to signify the fervor with which the service should be performed. The cantors sing the psalm, "Venite exultemus Domino," and after the first verse all take up the refrain: "Christ is born to us; come, let us adore." After the second verse only the second part of the invitatory is sung. After the third, the whole invitatory, and so on to the end. Those who have heard it know how inspiring is the Venite and the invitatory thus sung.

Having accomplished their office the cantors go before the celebrant and bow profoundly. Then the higher in dignity sings to him in a low tone the first two lines of the hymn. This is a very interesting piece of ceremonial coming down from days when books were not so abundant as they are now, and the Church, never forgetting her glorious past, clings to it. Hence in the twentieth century, as a thousand years ago, this cantor carries his book, "Directorium Chori," in which are contained the first notes of every antiphon and hymn used in the service. The celebrant having received the tone, begins the hymn whose origin is lost in antiquity, full of healing dogma for this unbelieving age: "Jesu Redemptor Omnium." This ends the first part of Matins.

Now come the psalms. They are sung in three divisions of three each, and each division is followed by three lessons, from either the Scriptures or the writings of the Fathers or the Acts of the Saints, etc. Each psalm is preceded and followed by an antiphon, a verse, usually of the psalm itself. The first cantor gives the intonation of the first two or three words to the celebrant, who immediately sings them. The antiphon is then taken up by a special body of singers, for on great feasts it is as intricate as it is beautiful. The psalm is begun immediately, being chanted from side to side of the choir. The second antiphon is intoned by the next in dignity to the celebrant on his side of the choir, the third by the next in dignity on the opposite side, the cantor going to each and giving him the intonation.

The psalms finished, a preliminary versicle, response and prayer are recited, during which the master of ceremonies leads to a lectern in the middle of the choir him who is to sing the first lesson. Usually the title of each lesson is announced, as "A reading of Isaias the prophet." But to-night the Church, eager to proclaim in God's own words the glorious news of the birth of Christ, omits the titles of the first three lessons, and the lector, having bowed respectfully to both sides and reverently to the celebrant whose blessing he asks, breaks forth with the words of Isaias: "At the first time the land of Zabulon and the land of Nephthali was lightly touched," which lead through: "The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light," to the triumphant: "A child is born to us, a son is given to us, his name, Wonderful, Counsellor, God the mighty, the Father of the world to come, the Prince of peace." As these words die away the body of singers take up the responsory in magnificent Gregorian melody, professing with one voice their acceptance of the glorious news: "To-day the King of heaven has deigned to be born for us of a Virgin . . . The Angelic host rejoices . . ." The two voices of the cantors are heard alone: "Glory to God in the highest . . ." The singers thunder their reply: "The Angelic host rejoices . . ."; "Glory be to the Father . . ." sing the two cantors, and the singers renew their flood of song: "To-day the King of Heaven has deigned to be born for us of a Virgin . . ." We are carried in spirit to the fields of Bethlehem. Heaven opens above us and we hear the angels sing.

Thus through antiphon, psalm, lesson and response the service proceeds. In the olden days, when Faith ruled the world and civil society found its perfection in its harmony with religion, there was a touching practice in Rome. Just before Matins the Pope used to bless a sword and helmet to be sent to some warrior who had fought the battles of Holy Church. If in Rome this knight sang the fifth lesson, which speaks of the conflict Christ took up on His coming into the world, clad in full armor and vested in a cope, while the Emperor, were he in the holy Christian capital, sang in the same way the seventh lesson from St. Luke about the edict that went forth from Cæsar Augustus. During the last three lessons, which are from the Gospel, the celebrant and the cantors wear copes; the celebrant sings the last lesson, which is followed by the Te Deum instead of a responsory.

The first Mass follows immediately. We need not dwell upon its familiar ceremonies. When it is ended Lauds are sung. This is a short office like Vespers and when sung solemnly is as splendid. The celebrant wears the cope and has four or even six attendants similarly vested. Two of these act as cantors, pre-intoning the antiphons and hymns. During the canticle "Benedictus," "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel," the altar, the celebrant, the canons, the assistants, the singers, the people, all are incensed, and the odor of the great festival goes up to heaven.

After Lauds the second Mass is sung. Then after an interval of rest, Prime and Terce are said and the third Mass is celebrated. H. W.

Secessions From Rome

We find on page 65 of The Living Church of November 13, 1909, the following: "In a late number of the Canadian Churchman there is printed a letter from fifty-seven members of a French Roman Catholic Church in Montreal, addressed to the Archbishop of that see, stating that the parties in question have retired from the Roman obedience and associated themselves with the Anglican communion, by reason of unscriptural dogmas which are taught in behalf of the Church of Rome. At a time when much ado is raised over occasional secessions from this communion to Rome, it is proper that the public should realize that the present religious unrest works both ways."

In the motive for this alleged secession any experienced Catholic would recognize the old Protestant fallacy that all truth must be explicitly contained in some Scripture text, and would reply that the dogmas falsely styled "unscriptural" are really logical deductions from Scripture. But, as the alleged fact called for some investigation, we wrote to the Vice-Chancellor of the Archdiocese of Montreal, whose answer we now give, merely noting that the Catholic Directory contains no such name as Henry E. Benoit, and no such church as the Église du Rédempteur."

"In reply to your communication I may state that a month or so ago a document was left at the Archbishop's residence. It was written and signed by one Henry E. Benoit, Prêtre (?), Église du Rédempteur. True, fifty-six names were on the list but not their addresses. The document purported to assign the reasons of their going over to the Anglican communion. The stale objections of past ages were offered as an excuse. The Bible, it stated, did not teach the Catholic doctrines of the Pope's Infallibility, the Immaculate Conception, Purgatory, the necessity of Auricular Confession, Transubstantiation, the Invocation of the Saints and other articles of Catholic belief. It ended with an earnest appeal and a fervent prayer for the conversion of His Grace the Archbishop, the clergy and of all Catholics in general.

"The document was quite a surprise to us as no one was aware of the secession. Not one of our dailies said a word about the transaction. The clergy in charge of the different localities wherein we imagined the seceders resided assured us that they had heard absolutely nothing about the affair which seems to have caused such unwarranted commotion abroad.

"The signers are utterly unknown in the city. Quite a few names were signed by H. E. B. Many bearing the same name are on the list. There are French Canadian names, one English name and other names which suggest the foreign extraction of their bearers. As the addresses of the parties in question had not been given, we took the trouble to consult the City Directory. We found but one address that tallied with a name. This person was a member of a family which had belonged for years to some non-Catholic sect. Others bearing the names mentioned in the document residing in various parts of the city were called upon and they assured the visitors that "all at home were Catholics and had no intention of leaving the Church of their fathers." It is passing strange that the newspapers in different parts of Canada and of the United States took the matter so seriously and gave it so much prominence. It is a case of "much ado about nothing."

Changing Creeds and Changeless Faith

A recent convert when asked what determined him to become a Catholic replied: "The certainty of Catholics. They not only believe that their Church is right and the only one that is right, but they know it and feel it in their blood and marrow; they have faith. I got talking religion the other day with a bricklayer who was working for me, and asked him: 'Are you so dead sure that the Catholic religion is true and just as Christ made it?' 'Sure!' he exclaimed as he put a brick in place and troweled it with mortar; 'I am as sure of it as that this brick will never come out.' Then laying another brick, he added: 'I'm surer. Man lays bricks; God laid Peter's Rock.' That was the final impulse that sent me to seek instruction; I want to be sure."

This incident illustrates the contrast between the fixed, unchanging Catholic Faith and the shifting opinions of the sects. To-day Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, even Episcopalian, may mean anything or nothing, and every ambitious pulpiteer has a nostrum of his own. A couple of weeks ago two New York preachers of prominence, who lectured in Philadelphia, gave a painful exhibition of the reckless and irreverent scepticism to which the lack of certainty and of a standard of belief has reduced what they called "the churches." Dr. Lyman Abbott said that what was written about Christ in the four Gospels "was colored by his reporters," and Dr. Aked, Mr. Rockefeller's imported preacher, announced with an infallible air: "The Bible is not infallible." He went further and declared that "God has not yet been defined," and demanded "a new definition that shall accord with the idea of immanence and do no violence to modern culture." Thus may this Baptist light condemn God and His Word in the same breath and continue to shine in a prominent Baptist pulpit.

Though the oil of his lamp still flows, he sheds no light on the darkness he has made. He is of the type of men who destroy but cannot build; who can win notoriety by wild onslaughts against Church and State but have no solution to their own problems; who aim not to improve religion or government but are satisfied to have created a sensation. And these be the gods of the modern Israel.

Significant of the contempt in which they hold the Bible is their astonishing ignorance of its contents. Dr. Abbott informs us that "Christ said very little about heaven or hell," when even a cursory reading discloses that He spoke of nothing else so frequently and definitely. Like so many of his kind, he can add as well as subtract: "Christ taught that the things are right that are a contribution to character, and the things are wrong that do not contribute to character." Christ taught no such doctrine, and moreover it is untrue. Things that are right or wrong or neither may contribute to character, which is fashioned in the mind. Christ never mentioned "character"—He did not deal in platitudes and generalities. He spoke definitely of the things that are right and the things that are wrong, and taught that both spring from the mind, and that the right and the wrong of them are rooted in the law of God, not in the consequences that flow from them. He was "a true speaker."

The Baptist orator in decrying the Scriptures sneers at "the text that all Scripture is inspired." The reference is incorrect and misleading, nor does the Bible anywhere mark the limits of Scripture. The Catholic Church alone, being empowered by Christ to guard and teach all truth, has defined the limits of the Bible. Pope St. Damasus, A. D. 382, finally formulated the Canon of Scriptures, which was accepted by the Catholic world then and is accepted now.

Perhaps the realization of this fact, that the Catholic Church is the ultimate authority for the integrity and inspiration of the Bible, will account for the persistent bitterness with which many Protestant ministers have been recently assailing it. Besides there was little else left to protest against. Four centuries of protest against Catholic teachings had practically exhausted the subject. When men broke away from the Church, they put their whole trust in the naked Bible. It was the full fountain of all truth, inspired in every word, the sole rule of faith and conduct, and that rule every man could find and follow. Then creeds began to multiply till there were as many interpretations as interpreters, and the resulting chaos led many to think that there was something wrong somewhere. But the wrong was not in themselves—the pride of heresy could not brook such admission—hence it must be in the Bible; and so the inheritors of "the whole Bible and nothing but the Bible" began to tear it to shreds.

This was a logical consequence. If they had authority to interpret it they had equal authority to declare its value, for the Bible does not interpret or define itself. "King James' Bible," says Dr. Aked, "is the version of a version and the translation of a translation," and why should he accept the authority of King James or his scribes? There is no good reason why he should; and as the other self-appointed interpreters have just as good a right to question the infallibility of the King James production the change of creeds goes merrily on until the preachers, vaulting from negation to negation, have abandoned all creed and strive to hold their sparse congregations by attitudes and platitudes, politics and paradox—anything but the word of God. They seem to know more about the latest attack on the Scriptures than they know about the Scriptures themselves.

Meanwhile, the Catholic Church continues unchanging, through every change of social condition, to teach uncompromisingly all the truths that Christ delivered to its keeping, relying on His word divine: "I will send you the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of Truth, who will teach you all things and abide with you forever. . . . And behold I am with you all days even to the consummation of the world."

CORRESPONDENCE

My First Visit to Pius X.

ROME, DECEMBER 10, 1909.

There were no formalities except the appointment of the hour by Bishop Kennedy, the able and prudent President of the American College. A venerable form in white met us at the door of his private room, took me by the hand after I had kissed his and put me by his side on a chair. There we were, two old priests; he, a few years older than myself; and at once we became like two old friends who had not met in a very long time. In a few minutes the awe which I felt in the presence of the Vicar of Christ disappeared and was replaced by a feeling of intense affection which warmed me from the top of my head to the sole of my foot.

This was the man who represented the Divine Person and the Divine teaching to which my life had been consecrated nearly fifty years ago. Here was the successor of the other Pius, noble, brave and gentle, who had sent me forth to work in June, 1862, with the words: "As you are the first, defend me there."

I had been loyal to the instruction and therefore love instead of fear filled my heart and my eyes. Seeing my emotion he waited a little before speaking, and then began to ask about my parish and my work. I told him. When I spoke of the Italians, he was glad to hear me say: "Holy Father, I find them sober, industrious and chaste. They do not kill their children." "That is good," he said. "In some nations they are destroying the population. A man with twelve children," said he, raising his hand and his voice, "is the glory of his nation if he brings them up good Christians."

"Holy Father," said I, "very much depends on the priest; and I have a good Italian vicar," and I began to quote the line 'Regis ad exemplar totus Componitur.' Before I had time to say the last word he said 'orbis.' "Yes, Holy Father," said I, "and the priest is the King." His Holiness evidently has not forgotten his poetic studies.

The rest of my interview would not interest the reader. We then left his private room and I went with him while he saw the hundreds who were waiting for his blessing in the outer room. To each of them he gave his blessing, said a few words to this one and to that one who had favors to ask, until we came to the one hundred and forty-four students of the American College lined up in the consistorial hall to receive him. To them he made a little speech. He is eloquent, clear in thought, fervid in expression. At the end, turning to me he said to them: "I hope that all of you young men, after you leave Rome will be able to come back after forty-seven years looking as well and strong as this one, your first priest." Then he asked me to call again.

His work is much harder than that of any civil ruler in the world, and his routine of ordinary work more arduous than that of any American parish priest.

I thought of two men as I left him: St. Francis of Assisi and Gregory VII. Pius X has the seraphic love of the one, and the fearless courage of the other. Love is his dominant note; but are not all the virtues dominated by love? Was not Dante right when he made hell the work of Divine Love as well as of Divine Justice? And is not Justice an immediately logical consequence of Love?

UMILTÀ.

Parliament Prorogued

LONDON, DECEMBER 4, 1909.

Parliament was prorogued yesterday afternoon—nominally till January 15th. But by January 15th the general election for a new Parliament will be half over. The dissolution is fixed for Christmas week. It would have taken place yesterday only that the result would have been to disorganize all our Christmas and New Year arrangements and to carry through the elections on an out-of-date register of votes.

We are supposed to be in the midst of an epoch-making crisis. Some of the newspapers that support the Government are talking of "Revolution" and "Civil War." I must frankly confess that it is the dulllest and least exciting crisis in the memory of living men. There is not a tithe of the excitement there was over Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule Bills and Mr. Chamberlain's quarrel with the Boers. One reads terrible things in the newspapers, but the man in the street and the man behind the counter and the man in the city office take it very quietly.

The lawyers are discussing the question of the rights of the House of Lords and Liberals are talking of their "usurping" the privilege of the Commons of defying the people. But such a sound Liberal as the late Mr. W. E. Gladstone laid it down that although the Commons had frequently declared that the Lords must not presume to amend financial bills, the Lords had never acquiesced in these limitations of their powers, and he went on to express approval of this attitude of the upper house in these remarkable words:

"I think they are quite right in declining to record against themselves this or any other such limitation of their privileges, because cases might arise in which, from the illegitimate incorporation of elements not financial into financial measures, it might be perfectly wise and just to fall back upon an assertion of the whole breadth of their privileges, according to the just view they have ever taken of them."

The whole point of the opposition to the Budget turned on this very "incorporation of elements not financial into financial measures." Mr. Asquith's government has shown a dangerous disposition to use administrative and financial machinery to effect what it failed to accomplish by direct legislation. It was claimed by both the supporters and the critics of the Budget that hidden away in its system of taxation there was the beginning of a revolution in the land laws and of a new legislation on the liquor trade. The Peers have not even ventured an amendment; they simply hang up the Budget. Their resolution says that the Upper House will not consent to it until it has proof that the majority of the people really desire it. The House of Lords is in fact using its powers to enforce a referendum and most men do not feel hurt at their opinion being asked. Mr. Asquith's resolution of protest was of course endorsed by a docile majority in the Commons, but it is worth noting that neither Mr. Redmond nor any of the Irish party voted.

I am told by those who are in touch with the lower grades of the workers that unemployment is rather less serious in London than it was last year. For all that, I am certain the most will be made of what unemployment and distress exists, for the Protectionist party—the Tariff Reformers—make a trump card of lack of work, and even argue as if it were unknown outside of England. Our Catholic Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress are already organizing relief for the hard days of winter, not by starting any new agency but by forming a committee to coordinate the operations and strengthen the resources of existing charitable agencies. There is a Catholic spirit in Lady Knill's appeal, not for "relief for the unemployed," but for "help for God's poor," the old brotherly phrase of Catholic times might have been used by such famous predecessors of Sir John Knill as William Walworth or "Dick Whittington," in the days before the horrible word "pauper" had been invented. The Archbishop of Westminster's name stands first on the list of the new central committee; associated with him are the Anglican Bishop of London and "General" Booth.

Writing in the Quarterly Review a few months ago Dr. William Barry after pointing out that in recent years there had been an increasing output in England of novels dealing with erotic subjects in an unduly outspoken fashion, expressed the opinion that it might be advisable to have an official censorship for the novel as well as for the theatre. A non-official censorship has been introduced this week by the joint action of the directors of the great lending libraries. It is through them best novels find their chief circulation. In a joint communication addressed to all the publishing houses the directors of the libraries say:

"We have determined in future that we will not place in circulation any book which, by reason of the personally scandalous, libellous, immoral, or otherwise disagreeable nature of its contents, is, in our opinion, likely to prove offensive to any section of our subscribers."

And they request that advance copies of new books may be sent to them one week before publication in order that they may be examined thoroughly before ordering in any quantity.

The step has not been taken a day too soon. There is, of course, an outcry from the purveyors of and the dabblers in this peculiar form of literature. One author not unknown to fame has already disgraced himself by a peculiarly silly utterance. He says the circular of the librarians is "an insult to London publishers, none of whom were capable of issuing an immoral book." As a matter of fact the libraries have already refused to supply several books, some of them by men of a certain note. I am sorry to say that in some of these cases neither author nor publisher has lost in the long run, for the fact that a book is vetoed by the libraries often produces a run to buy it. This cannot be helped. There is the solid gain that the book is not freely passed over the counter to all and everyone who asks for it. If people insist on having it they must go elsewhere to buy it. I do not suppose the standard set by the Librarians' Committee will be very high, but in their action we have a satisfactory sign that a revolt against the rising tide of foul literature has begun.

The Battle Continues in the French Schools

PARIS, DECEMBER 4, 1909.

The struggle continues in the French Government between the official teachers, and their pupils and the latter's parents, and, on the whole, the letter of the French bishops on the duty of Catholic parents has produced more effect than was, at first, expected. Knowing the indifference of the average French peasant to all that does not touch upon his material necessities and difficulties and knowing also his inborn respect for "le Gouvernement," it might be supposed that the episcopal circular would fall flat and that the bishops' appeal would meet with no response. Things have turned out differently; in many country villages, the children's parents have shown fight and, by their steady determination, have obliged the school masters to remove the obnoxious books. This is, in itself, a happy symptom: it goes far to prove that the commands of the Church, expressed by the voice of her pastors, still find an echo among the lower orders.

In the département of Vosges, the struggle has been particularly warm; at Thaon two hundred children deserted the Government school, where the teachers declined to suppress the condemned books and one little girl, being ordered, as a punishment, to copy a passage from one of the evil "manuels," bravely wrote out the Credo on her copy-book. The resistance of the children is prompted and encouraged by their parents. Three little girls having been expelled from school because they declined to use one of the prohibited books, their father wrote thus to the school master:

"You seem to forget that above your authority, legitimate as it is within certain limits, there is the authority of the heads of the family, whose delegate you are. When my daughters disobeyed you, they obeyed me; I regret that it should be so, but this painful conflict might have been avoided, had you attended to my lawful demands and not forced upon my children books that their conscience reproves."

In the same district, at Frain, the mayor of the village himself bought, out of the fund put aside for the schools, historical books, written in a good spirit that are to take the place of the "Manuel de Calvet," condemned by the bishops. A little girl, in the village of Souilly, also in the Vosges country, boldly answered the school mistress who was trying to force an evil book upon her: "We are living under a republic and you have no right to oblige us to use books, whose teaching is contrary to what we believe." In the Département des Basses Pyrénées, the mayor of several villages informed the school teachers that the books condemned by the bishops would no longer be paid for out of the school fund, and in consequence here, as in many other parts of France, the prohibited volumes have been withdrawn by the teachers themselves, many of them having realized that it was useless to hold out against the steady firmness of their pupils' parents.

A proof of the tyrannical spirit that reigns in the Government schools is afforded by the school mistress of "les Vignats," in Normandy. To the parents of her pupils, she sent a paper couched in these terms: "Do you desire your children to learn their history in the history of Calvet (condemned by the bishops)? If not, state your reasons. If you do not allow your children to use this book, you expose them to be expelled from school." The result of this imperious circular is that the over-zealous teacher's school is now empty, only three boys and one girl remain.

It would be vain and childish to suppose that this movement of resistance, hopeful though it is, can promptly change the spirit of the French schools. The evil is too deep seated to be thus speedily removed, but the bishops' letter has made Catholic parents realize that they possess certain rights, that these are being grossly ignored, and that their dignity as well as their sense of religion calls upon them to act. They have thus been led to unite their efforts, to band their forces and to make use of weapons that, from ignorance or apathy, they had hitherto set aside.

On Sunday, November 24, an assembly of unusual interest took place at the Hôtel Condé in Paris. This mansion, before the Revolution of 1789, the home of the saintly princess Louise de Condé, has become the property of one of the leading French Catholics, M. Ferón Vrau, director of the Catholic enterprise called "La Bonne Presse." The great hall, erected by M. de Vrau in what was formerly the courtyard of the hotel, is often lent by him for charitable purposes, and last Sunday, it was used by Dr. Boissarie, the far-famed physician, who so ably and wisely investigates the miraculous cures of Lourdes. Needless to say that Dr. Boissarie is a devout Catholic, but for this very reason, because he has Our Lady's honor so deeply at heart, his examination of the cases brought under his notice is severely critical and many months must elapse before he will make a statement as to the miraculous nature of the cures. Knowing this, it was with the fullest confidence that the spectators who, on Sunday, assembled at the Hotel de Condé, accepted from his hand, as undoubted miracles, the cases he brought to their notice. About fifty of the "miraculés" were present; they sat in groups on the platform, the Doctor in the midst of them, surrounded by many medical men, who added their testimony to his. Some of the cases thus explained and presented to the public were truly wonderful: thus Marie Lemarchand, now happily married and the healthy mother of seven children, is the woman of whom, under the name of Elise Rouquette, Zola gave so realistic a description in his book on Lourdes. Only, after describing at length how her face was eaten up by a hideous wound, he forgot to mention her sudden cure in 1892. Marie Lemarchand, with her youngest child in her arms, was led forward, a smiling, stalwart woman, with a rosy face, whose cure, as Dr. Van der Elst explained, could not have been the result either of hypnotism or of natural causes. In the course of a few minutes, after bathing in the pool of the grotto, her frightful wound was healed.

Another interesting case was that of Aurélie Huprelle, a tall woman in black, who, at Dr. Boissarie's request, sat in front of the platform, while one of the doctors explained her case. She was taken to Lourdes in the last stage of consumption, as the medical certificates prove; her condition was such that she received the last Sacraments before starting and, among those who loved her best, no one expected to see her again. She, too, was radically and suddenly cured and has now, for years, led the tiring life of a working-woman without a trace of her old trouble. And so it went on; one after another the happy ones came forward, too full of gratitude to mind being centres of attraction. Besides, here as at Lourdes, a family feeling prevails. The bright-faced "miraculés," on their raised seats on the platform, were genuinely glad to add their testimony to the concert of praise that rises round the Pyrenean shrine. To the spectators, they were the privileged ones, in whose favor obedient Nature has bowed beneath the Creator's mighty hand and the emotional crowd looked upon them much as the people of Palestine once gazed upon the lepers that were made clean by the Saviour during His mortal life.

AN ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

The Catholic Mission in Sweden

STOCKHOLM, DECEMBER 3, 1909.

Sweden, which Protestant authors cannot name without evoking the memory of Gustavus Adolphus and of the Thirty Years' War, has long remained hostile and closed to Catholicism. Although Queen Josephine, wife of King Oscar I, and grandmother of the king now reigning, was an ardent Catholic, and had at her court an official chaplain, the intolerance of the laws then in force was such, that in 1858 several ladies, known as having been guilty of becoming converts to Catholicism, were condemned to the confiscation of their goods, and to exile. This sentence aroused, we must admit, strong protests from all sides, and during the years that followed, Swedish legislation was remodeled in the direction of a greater freedom of conscience.

To-day the Catholic mission has churches at Stockholm, Gothenburg, Manö, Gefle and Norrköping. All these churches are of recent construction, for the splendid, the magnificent cathedrals, which bore such striking testimony to the Catholic Faith of our ancestors, fell, at the time of the Reformation, into the hands of Protestants.

The largest Catholic parish is that of Stockholm. It is Catholic, that is to say, universal in more than one respect, for not only is our Holy Apostolic and Roman Faith professed there, but also it constitutes the most variegated assemblage of all nationalities. Thus, besides the Swedes, it comprises Germans, Italians, French, English, Poles, Spaniards, etc. Even not long ago there were to be found in the Catholic Church of Stockholm Catholic Japanese and Catholic Negroes.

In Stockholm resides the Vicar-Apostolic, head of the Swedish Mission, Mgr. Dr. Albertus Bitter, titular Bishop of Dobiche, a prelate who has succeeded in winning general esteem and sympathy, not only among Catholics, but also among Protestants. He is seen often enough at the royal court of Sweden. As the sphere of Mgr. Bitter's activity is very wide, the Bishop and the zealous priests who help him are obliged to undertake many and long apostolic journeys.

Southern Sweden presents a peculiar character: thousands of Polish workmen labor there during a great part of the year in cultivating beets, and here as elsewhere these Polish workmen, by their fervent piety and their spirit of sacrifice, deserve to be held up as examples to all Catholics. In order to reach the nearest church they do not hesitate to spend in railway tickets a notable part of their wages. They have a warm and devout friend in the person of a noble and pious old man, the Reverend Count Bernard Stolberg, a descendant of the celebrated convert, Count Frederic Leopold Stolberg, distinguished author, poet and diplomatist.

As religious liberty is of relatively recent date in Sweden, and as the Catholics are few, it is easy to understand that we cannot yet have a very rich Swedish Catholic literature. However, we may say of that which exists: it is limited, but good. Besides some excellent catechetical works, we possess, in Swedish, an edition of the "Manual" of L. Goffine; one of "Philothea, or the Devout Life of St. Francis de Sales"; a prayer book called "Missale Romanum"; several small pious books; the excellent work of Cardinal Gibbons, "The Faith of Our Fathers"; "Edgar," by Father L. von Hammerstein, S.J.; a controversial catechism, "Catholicism and Protestantism"; and, finally, several small books of Mgr. de Ségur.

We hope that the Swedish mission will find the funds to provide the Swedish people with other works, as for instance, the "Imitation of Christ." At any rate, we cannot help paying tribute to the enlightened and indefatigable zeal of those who, in the midst of the greatest difficulties, have succeeded in endowing the Catholic Church of Sweden with inestimable spiritual riches.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

A Christmas Greeting

"In the forty-second year of the empire of Octavius Augustus, when the whole earth was at peace, in the sixth age of the world, Jesus Christ, Eternal God, and Son of the Eternal Father, desirous to sanctify the world by His most merciful coming, having been conceived of the Holy Ghost, and nine months having elapsed since His conception, is born in Bethlehem of Juda, having become man of the Virgin Mary. The Nativity of our Lord Jesus Christ according to the flesh."

Thus does the Roman Martyrology announce the blessed feast of to-day. It is a development of the message to the shepherds watching their flocks on the hills of Juda on the first Christmas night in the long ago. "For behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, that shall be to all the people. For this day is born to you a Saviour who is Christ the Lord, in the city of David." Tidings of great joy in truth:—it was the fulfilment of the promise made by God in the day-dawn of creation, the promise of the redemption to come through Him who was to crush the serpent's head. The patriarchs had longed for the coming of that day, the prophets had foretold its mercy and its love, and the hosts of the just of every kind and every degree in the Old Law who had toiled in "the shadow of the good things to come" had died in the blessed hope that has become for us a thrice blessed actuality.

Christmas, then, means more than a joyful salutation—more than the warm-hearted greeting of friend to friend in the cheery association "a Happy Christmas" implies. The true sense of Christmas is lost if the Child of Bethlehem be not in it. It is, then, in the spirit of Him who surrounds the day with an atmosphere of faith and hope and love peculiarly its own that AMERICA sends its greetings to its readers. May He pour out upon us His grace in this His own day that we may enjoy the fulness of the blessings His coming brought to man. A Happy Christmas to All!

"Christ is Born for Us"

"Christ is born for us." These words, repeated year by year for centuries, imply three facts: the reality of Christ, that He is born into this world, and that He is born for us. Christ is a reality, not a mere idea. He is what He proclaims Himself to be, what the Church has ever asserted Him to be, not what theorists think He may be. The predicates to be affirmed of Him are not supplied by biblical criticism, historical analysis or German philosophy: they have come down from heaven with Him and are not to be put aside. He is born. He is a member of the human family, and has his own definite place in it by the decree of His creation and not by man's concession. What that place is, is a fact clearly evident in the light of revelation, and therefore not given to man as a subject of speculation. He is born for us. The same divine decree that sent Him into this world settled the relations between Him and every human being, even more immutable than the most fixed natural law. How many to-day deny all this! And yet they say the world goes well.

Sursum Corda

The office of Christmas is not so much to cheer those who have already a fair measure of happiness as to sweeten the bitterness of weariness and discontent. Discontent seems to grow with modern progress; not the divine discontent of the eager idealist, but rather the dead discontent of exhausted pleasures on the side of culture and wealth and of baffled desires on the side of envious poverty. Between the extremes there will always be enough repining to preserve the descriptive truth of the phrase which calls this world a vale of tears.

The bravest and best among us have their hours when the high-tide of life recedes and in its ebb shows an oozy beach of ugly drift and shale. The hour of disillusion, the poets call it; the saints (the world and the saints never agree) have called it the hour of illusion. It is a time when the spirits of evil combine with circumstances of time and place and mood to rob life of its dignity and sweet significance, and to lash the reluctant soul forward into the sandy places where are recruited the enemies of God.

This is the hour when the battle of life is lost or won. A grim, desperate clinging—whate'er betide—to faith and hope and the things we knew before—this is the only safe and sane course to pursue until the normal conditions of life prevail once more.

"Do what thou wilt, thou shalt not so, Dark Angel! triumph over me."

Christmas is the strong arm of God reaching forth into the blackness of such hours. Who were the Magi? Out of the unknown they came; into it they disappeared. What had they done to win the recompense of greeting the Divine Child? Merely waited and hoped and clung to the dim faith in their souls, confident that neither time nor space nor dark angel nor their own weakness could defraud them of their hope and turn their faith into a mockery.

Peace of soul and salvation do not wait on circumstance. The sheep-herders on the lonely hills of night, with the monotony and dullness of life-long mean cares ever at hand ready to spring and clutch at the throat of their content, were called also with the three Kings to make their obeisance at the Crib. The work we have to do, the position we find ourselves in, will not in themselves save us or destroy us. This is one meaning, at least, of the Christmas gospel. In Bethlehem were those who had leisure and, perhaps, the duty to study and scan the sacred pages of the inspired writings; and yet, because they lacked what the shepherds and the Kings possessed, whilst they read on under the rush-light, the Creator was born into the world, unknown to them, outside their very windows.

Steerage Abuses

A report on steerage conditions, based on information obtained by special agents of the Immigration Commission traveling as steerage passengers on different transatlantic steamers was made public last week. Scarcely less severe in its arraignment of an existing abuse than was the report of the same Commission on the White Slave Traffic, of which mention was made in our issue of last week, the Commission's present paper describes conditions that are appalling in spite of the fact that in some instances the letter of the law was obeyed explicitly. Happily the work of the Commission is being well done, and there seems to be an assured purpose to put upon the statute books laws which shall be effective in eliminating the deplorable conditions. One phase of the wretched story merits a special word. Agents who investigated the experiences of immigrants at Ellis Island and on the Hudson River and coastwise boats affirm that the officers of the immigration service are all kind, considerate and humane. But when one has passed the boundary of the immediate jurisdiction and has to run the gauntlet of the sharks beyond, the story of petty annoyance and exaction, of cruelties, and wantonness is renewed. As reported in AMERICA at the time, the Commissioner of Immigration at New York last summer made open attack upon societies here whose purpose it is to protect immigrants from these abuses, and whose officials have ever been found zealous to safeguard the helpless aliens upon their coming to our shores. One might inquire how is it possible that Commissioner Williams, with the experience of his long service, could have been ignorant of the black pictures painted by the present investigators, when showing himself so ardent in the charges recklessly made last summer? Mayhap the report submitted to Congress will open his eyes to the real evils that exist within his jurisdiction.

German Colonists in Jamaica, W. I.

The story of the German element in Jamaica is sadly interesting. In the year 1834 several hundred German colonists were imported thither as "skilled agriculturists." They came principally from Hanover, lured to the tropical island by promises which were never fulfilled. Those among them who had means soon left Jamaica. The descendants of those who remained are wretchedly poor and are making no headway against adversity. On rented holdings of small area father and son, often mother and daughter, eke out a scanty living from the soil by the cultivation of yam, ginger, arrowroot and tobacco. The returns barely enable them to pay the rent.

In order to relieve the present distress the resident Catholic missionary proposes to start a home industry among these German families. The women could be taught to make so-called Panama hats. With two or three hundred dollars to begin with, straw could be bought and work rooms and lodgings provided. In six months twenty or thirty first-class hat makers could be trained and by that time there would be straw in abundance as it could easily be grown in the plots surrounding their little homes. The older women could teach the younger as they grow up. In this way the people would soon be self supporting and would be independent of their more wealthy dusky neighbors. The plan seems feasible. At all events something should be done to relieve the necessities of these poverty-stricken families.

True Christmas Joy

Joy is the dominant note of Christmas. For the worldly or the nominal Christian it shows itself in an increase of creature comforts, in a whirl of excitement or in mad-cap pleasure, without any realization of the cause of that true joy which Christ's birth brought to the human race. That cause is assuredly not an increase of comfort.

And yet very truly is joy the dominant note of the birth of Christ. As the shepherds were keeping the night watches over their flocks, "lo! an angel of the Lord stood by them, and the brightness of God shone round about them, and the angel said to them: I bring you good tidings of great joy that shall be to all the peoples. . . . And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly army, praising God and saying: Glory to God in the highest; and on earth peace to men of good will." When the shepherds had gone over to Bethlehem and found Mary and Joseph, and the Infant lying in the manger, they returned with hearts so full of joy that they glorified and praised God. A few days later, when the Wise Men came from the East and once more beheld the star, of which they had lost sight for a time, standing over where the Child was, we are told that they "rejoiced with exceeding great joy."

Now, all those who thus rejoiced were actually in great bodily discomfort, Mary, Joseph and the Shepherds from the pinchings of poverty, the Wise Men from the privations and fatigues of a long journey undertaken in spite of ridicule. What, then, is the secret of their joy and the only key that unlocks the treasure house of true Christmas joy? It is union with God, the only source of all real joy. For joy is nothing but the overflow of peace, and peace is the tranquillity of order established in the soul that is united with God, whose very essence is joy. Joy, then, is independent of material environment, as when St. Paul, whose life was one long battle, tells us that he exceedingly abounds with joy in all his tribulations. This is the secret of the glad renunciation of the poor in spirit and especially of those joyous heroes of self-denial, the saints, the closest imitators of Christ. That is why the Church prepares for the peace and joy that surpasses all understanding at Christmas by fasting, almsgiving and humble effacement of self, in order thus to be more surely filled with the ineffable sweetness of Jesus.

Death of the King of the Belgians

The King of the Belgians, Leopold II, died on December 16 in his seventy-fifth year. His father was that Leopold of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha who, as husband of the Princess Charlotte, had the prospect of being Prince Consort of England, who refused the crown of Greece, and mounted eventually the Belgian throne when in a year of revolution, 1830, Belgium threw off the yoke of Holland to which the Congress of Vienna had arbitrarily subjected her. Leopold I was a Protestant. His second wife, however, was Louise, daughter of Louis-Philippe, King of the French, and through her a Catholic dynasty was obtained for Catholic Belgium.

In 1853 the late king married Maria Henrietta of Austria, and he succeeded his father in 1865. He had three daughters, Louise, Stephanie and Clementine; the first, the divorced wife of Philip of Saxe-Coburg and the second, the neglected consort of the hapless Rudolph, Crown Prince of Austria. The scandalous family quarrels that followed the death of their unhappy mother need not be dwelt upon. Leopold's private life was the byword of Europe: as sovereign he was in the public eye in connection with the Congo, a matter in which he was more sinned against than sinning. He was brother of the ambitious Carlotta who had no small part in the persuading of her husband, Maximilian, to undertake the mad expedition to Mexico, and was the late Queen Victoria's first cousin.

He left no son, and as the Salic law prevails in Belgium, the crown devolves upon his nephew, Albert, born in 1875 and hitherto known as the Count of Flanders, who married Elizabeth, daughter of Duke Charles Theodore of Bavaria, lately deceased, the famous oculist of the poor. The royal pair whose domestic life makes a happy contrast with that of the late king, are much loved by their people. They have two sons, Leopold, born in 1901, and Charles Theodore, born in 1903, and a daughter, Marie José, born in 1906.

The Living Church (Protestant Episcopal) published a letter from Dr. W. H. Van Allen of Boston, in which he asserted that Brother Paul James Francis had appealed for funds for the establishment at Graymore in his church at Elmira and in doing so had stated repeatedly that all the property of the Society of the Atonement would be vested in the Bishop of Delaware. He added that many gifts were made under the influence of this promise, and that the late Bishop of Delaware had told him that he had striven without success to hold Father Paul to this promise. Brother Paul James Francis answered him in the following number to the effect that his preaching at Elmira was for the benefit of Dr. Van Allen's church and was done gratuitously; that the amount contributed there to the building fund of his convent was less than fifty dollars, of which most came as a thank offering; that a small stained-glass window put in the chapel, is at the disposal of the giver; that the Sisters' convent was built and dedicated before he went to Elmira; that he had never promised the Bishop of Delaware to vest the property of the Society of the Atonement in him, and that the Bishop had never written or spoken to him on the subject. Brother Paul is pursuing his studies at Dunwoodie Seminary, and he is still editing The Lamp.

The Flaget Council of the Knights of Columbus, of Chillicothe, Ohio, recently sent a delegation to the Board of Trustees of the City Library and presented a set of the Catholic Encyclopedia. The volumes of the Encyclopedia which have already appeared were duly installed in a special Catholic Reference Alcove prepared in anticipation of this gift after the Library Board had expressed their thanks. It is of course not very creditable to these gentlemen that they delayed obtaining so important a work of reference until it was put into their hands as a gift. But the generous action of the Knights is very suggestive to other Catholics interested in spreading the truth.

As a result of the meeting held in Zaragoza, Spain, more than a year ago, for the improvement of the Spanish Catholic Press, a telegraphic news agency of national and foreign news is now in full working order. Thirty-three Catholic newspapers are now receiving their news from this agency. Such a news agency was needed in order to combat successfully the Liberal and Republican "trust" papers with their frequent inaccurate and false statements of Catholic affairs.

LITERATURE

SOME CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

One of the joys of our first Christmases was the ownership of the annual "Chatterbox." We wish we had one of them by us now to discover in adult wisdom what it was which made the old-fashioned "Chatterbox" a fertile source of childish pleasure. There are no more "Chatterboxes," alas! And we suspect the present generation of children are, in consequence, all the worse off in the matter of infantile dissipation. Instead of the homely old wood-cuts which just met the artistic demands of babyhood, we have beautiful drawings and pictures that suffer from the sophistication of advanced notions and craftsmanship. The grown-ups admire; but the children suffer a certain mystification not unmixed with disdain. In the "Chatterboxes" they didn't talk down to the children. There is too much of that done now. Neither did they obtrude a certain alien cleverness and knowledge of the world which, when it does not leave children uninterested, makes premature men and women out of them to the disgust of everybody. We throw it forth as a gratuitous hint to publishers that they might find it profitable to bring back the old "Chatterboxes" into the stalls of the book-sellers.

The nearest approach to the "Chatterbox" which we recognize among Christmas publications is the "Catholic Home Annual" of the Benzigers. It is full of pictures, stories and all sorts of odds and ends, with which children like to surround themselves. And everything is done seriously as if a child were the most important thing in the world—which, of course, he is.

The Macmillans have made a large contribution to the Christmas spirit in publishing "The Book of Christmas," with an introduction by Hamilton W. Mabie and an accompaniment of drawings by George Wharton Edwards. This is the best collection of literary extracts in prose and verse about Christmas that we have seen. The choice is very inclusive, and ranges from medieval ballads to Rudyard Kipling and Jacob Riis. We think the collection would have been more complete and excellent if the modern Catholic literature of Christmas had been more carefully gone over. We count it a real fault that Robert Southwell's "Wassailer's Song" should find a place here whilst we look in vain for his lyric masterpiece, "The Burning Babe." Still we agree with Mr. Mabie that the "'Book of Christmas' is a book of joy in the sadness of the world, a book of play in the work of the world, a book of consolation in the sorrow of the world."

Another new book which we are sure children will be pleased with, as well as their elders, is "The Red Book of Heroes," by Mrs. Lang, edited by Andrew Lang. (New York: Longmans, Green & Co.) That "Kind Magician, Andrew Lang," has deserved much in the past from the boys and maidens of English-speaking lands, and this work lays them under further obligations to him. Some of the heroes in this volume are heroines, of course,—Florence Nightingale, for instance—and their stories are told in a pure yet homely style which will charm readers of every age. There is, it seems to us, a peculiar catholicity of taste in the choice of Mere Angélique and Bernard Palissy for enrollment among a select gathering of the heroic type; but, we suppose, it is necessary as a kind of off-set to the beautiful and sympathetic narratives of Father Damien and Blessed Thomas More.

Michael Earls, S.J., has touched the right chord in the collective Christmas heart by the publication of an exquisite little Christmas play, "The Chorister's Christmas Eve, a Little Play for the Christmas Days with a Modern Legend, and the Old Christmas Carols." (St. Louis: B. Herder; London: Sands & Co.) Here young people have all the material for a happy evening during the holidays. The collection of carols is a treasure in itself, and the author's brief directions about the music give his contribution to the season's literature a practical and instructive turn.

"Our Little King; the Childhood of Christ," by Katherine Frances Mullany, (New York: The Sunday Companion Publishing Co.) has come out for the holidays in a second edition. The story of the Divine Infant is told here in the language of a mother chatting with her child. The apocryphal touches do not mar the beauty of the original story, and serve merely to stimulate the childish imagination in catching the bearing of that story upon its own young life. It is a book for mothers to read under the lamp-light to their little ones.

The Picturesque Hudson. Written and Illustrated by CLIFTON JOHNSON. Picturesque River Series. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price $1.25 net.

An introductory note informs the reader that the volumes in this Picturesque River Series are prepared so as to make them in form and matter distinctly valuable as guide books. In the present volume the Hudson's "more striking features—picturesque, historic, literary, legendary—have received ample attention." Bits of folk-lore, choice morsels from the "Sketch Book," and incidents of Revolutionary history form a pleasing digression in the less romantic description of successive points of interest. There is no lack of illustrations, and they are all good. We would call the author's attention to the omission of the many Catholic landmarks which to-day form a very striking feature of Hudson River scenery. There is no mention of Forrest Castle, once the residence of the great tragedian, now Mt. St. Vincent, below Yonkers; nor of the old church of Our Lady of Loretto at Cold Spring, dating from 1834, which forms one of the prettiest pictures on the Hudson; not a word about the former hotel at West Point, the famous Cozzens', now known as Lady Cliff, nor of the splendid buildings of the Redemptorists and the Jesuits at Poughkeepsie and Esopus—and others we might name on either shore from the imposing St. Michael's Monastery of the Passionists opposite Manhattan to the architectural attraction of the Sacred Heart Convent, Kenwood, near Albany. These are points of interest which awaken the curiosity of every traveller along the Hudson, and failure to notice which in the present volume will cause nothing but disappointment.

E. S.

A Journey in Southern Siberia, by JEREMIAH CURTIN. Little, Brown & Co., Boston, 1909.

Siberia is an immense region. Mr. Curtin travelled only six hundred miles from Irkutsk via Usturdi and Baiandi to the island of Olkhon in Lake Baikal and back. Had he been an ordinary traveller his journey would hardly be worth a book of 300 pages. But he was no ordinary traveller. On the shores of that great lake is to be seen what goes contrary to prevailing notions of Russian methods of dealing with the aborigines, a Mongol people, the Buriats, for there is the very cradle of the Mongol race, with Russian civilization, bearing Christian names, Andrew, Michael, Basil, etc., compounded in the usual Russian way, e. g., Andrei Mihailovitch Mihailoff, yet not even nominally Christian, but pagan, practising openly its ancient Shamanism. To study this people, their religion, customs and traditions Mr. Curtin undertook his journey, the results of which he gives in a most interesting volume. Catholics reading it will grieve to see him forgetting the faith of his fathers so as to think it profitable to devote five pages, 61-66, to the barren reflections of a night journey, and to judge it right to congratulate the Buriats on having stuck to their heathenism. Those that like a problem may try to solve this. Did his wife accompany him? On page 56 he speaks of "my wife." This may be a misprint, as it is the only mention of such a person. On the other hand, the plural number is often used in a way that seems to indicate a companion closer to the traveller than his attendants. Charles W. Eliot writes a prefatory note to tell us that Mr. Curtin is the translator of Sienkiewicz and learned in matters ethnological, to make a synopsis of the work, and to give us out of his stores such jewels as: "Lake Baikal is the largest body of water in the old world." But as these things are not hidden from the vulgar or else plainly appear in Mr. Curtin's pages, one will lose nothing in skipping them and, after pausing for a moment to wonder what manner of men Dr. Eliot has been in contact with at Harvard during all these years, if he thinks such puerilities timely, coming directly to Mr. Curtin's interesting book.

What Have the Greeks Done for Modern Civilization? The Lowell Lectures of 1908-9. By JOHN PENTLAND MAHAFFY. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Greek studies are in such a state at present that he who could do them a good turn would be welcomed as the man of the hour by all who love them. Here was opportunity knocking at Dr. Mahaffy's door. Everything helped to centre attention on their spokesman. The fame of the lecturer, the institution where he holds his chair, the tradition for which he stands, the nation which sent him forth, the representative character of the audience in the nation which received him, all conspired to get a fair hearing for the land "where grew the arts of war and peace."

But we must confess our keen disappointment. We miss that tone which rings in so many English writers who have fallen under the spell of ancient Greece—De Quincey, for instance, or Newman (whose lecture on Athens, alone, ought to correct his notion that "our Newmans, if they attempt the period, are neither melodious nor clear"), or Bishop Wordsworth, or John Addington Symonds.

So much for the manner. As for the matter, we are forced to believe that the lecturer was not at any great pains to be accurate in his statements. For instance, before advancing the theory that the Greeks avoided the arch for the reason that the associations of domed or circular buildings were gloomy, because appropriated to tombs, he ought to have reflected that Athens alone furnishes enough to refute this notion, the tholos, for example, or the Odeum, or the choragic monument of Lycrates. When he carries his generalization further and asserts that this custom was well nigh universal, the pyramids are certainly large enough example to the contrary to come into view.

This is a mere detail—one of many of a similar kind—and as such might be no more than a flaw which it were ungracious to pick from out of an abundance of surrounding excellence. However, without denying that there is much worth saying and well said (it would be a pleasure to point it out in detail, but we may mention, in passing, his treatment of sculpture or of mathematics), there is something more serious to be considered than mere matter of detail or literary expression. The plain reason why we fear that this book may prove harmful to the cause of Greek is that it takes a position which is indefensible. The claims of Greek rest on grounds which are too secure to make it wise to weaken those claims by exaggeration. Much as we owe to the Greeks we do not owe everything. The Greeks were a wonderful people but they had serious and deep-rooted defects.

We should scarcely be doing Professor Mahaffy an injustice if we were to say that his thesis amounts to claiming for the Greeks whatever we possess worth having. If this were a tour de force, like Wendell Phillips' "Lost Arts," and done with equal brilliancy, we might be amused and let it go at that, for we have enough of the Greek in us nowadays to admire the pranks of genius; but from a scholar we look for measured statements. Publicists do not go back to the Athenian Assembly for the origin of our free institutions, but to the folk-moot. The fact that Shakespeare got some of his plots from Plutarch did not save him from being called a barbarian by those who had no standards but Grecian to go by. The novel is not of Grecian origin even if the literature of Greece in its decadence shows contact with the home of the Arabian Nights. The fact that Isocrates did, as far as he could in his day, what our modern orators do, namely, "speak to the press," does not make essay-writing out of public speaking.

And so we might go on. But before we stop we shall call attention to one passage in particular, because it is at the same time a flagrant instance of the Trinity scholar's method, and likely to prejudice important interests from the application he makes of it. In his review of Greek philosophy he devotes considerable space to those thinkers who let their intellects run riot in the wildest speculations. This were well enough if his object were only to show the subtlety of the Greek intellect. But when this is set forth as sound thinking the case is far otherwise.

Aristotle, the keenest intellect of the Greeks, who bent all his matchless powers on the serious search after truth is dismissed in a short paragraph headed, "Need I pass on to Aristotle?" but room is found more than once to make the statement about him that "he narrowly escaped being canonized as a saint." Professor Mahaffy adds that he was not understood by the Middle Ages. But what does he know of Scholasticism? Has he ever heard of Sylvester Maurus? He holds up the atomic theory of Democritus to admiration and asks us to throw scientific methods to the winds, because here is the theory of modern science arrived at by abstract thinking without investigation. This is saying something the wisdom of which it requires no deep thought to measure; and what the intelligent man of to-day will answer is not "Away with our scientific laboratories," but "Lock the door of your Greek lecture-hall if this is all you learn there." Does he really mean to say that the arguments of Democritus for his theory are as satisfying to the normal intelligence as those of the chemists for theirs? We are told that a Dutch almanac-maker, who was the Bickerstaff of his day, made a slip of the pen and predicted snow for a day in July. The printer brought back the sheet to call his attention to the mistake. But Hans never acknowledged himself in the wrong, so he thundered out, "Print what I gave you." Snow fell on the day set. Are our weather bureaus therefore of no use?

It was not a pleasant task to have to speak thus of these lectures; but they ought not to be allowed to pass as the views of all who are in favor of retaining Greek in the curriculum.

Kyriale seu Ordinarium Missae juxta Editionem Vaticanam transcribed into modern musical notation by Dr. F. X. Mathias. Pocket Edition 32°. Flexible cloth binding. 15 cents net. New York: Fr. Pustet and Co.

The demand for a cheap and handy form of the Vatican Kyriale in modern musical notation is well met by this edition. As a book to be put into the hands of our schoolchildren, or to be used still more generally for congregational singing, it deserves special recommendation. The editor is an acknowledged authority in the transcription of plain chant, as even a cursory glance at his work will manifest.

CHRISTMAS IN MAGAZINE-LAND.

The Editor of the English Bookman observes that "in the matter of Christmas, editors and reviewers are twice blest (though they do not always appreciate this): they eat their cake and have it. All through November we have been looking at, reading, and thinking, talking, writing and reading about nothing but Christmas books, until we come to breathe the very atmosphere of Christmas. . . . Then, in another few weeks the real Christmas, with real snow and real pudding and beef and holly, is upon us, and we realize that before we were only dreaming and now have wakened to find our dream come true."

That editors eat their Christmas cake and have it is a cheerful thought for the editors; but we wish they would not eat it so far in advance of the time when they have it. Every year the Christmas magazines come out earlier than the year before. If we are not mistaken, the Christmas number of the Cosmopolitan appeared during the first week of November! And the weeklies are, in this respect, following the example of the monthlies. Collier's led the Christmas pageant of weekly popular periodicals, in gorgeous colors and appetizing yule-tide fare, fully a fortnight before Christmas day. Then the public has to wait from two to six weeks after the first course of its Christmas menu is served before the remaining courses—the substantial ones—are placed upon the table.

Does it take so long to create, so to speak, the proper atmosphere and spirit for Yule-tide after a year's submergence in the practical concerns of life? Or, is it to get the literature of the season in time to lonely exiles in the antipodes? Or, is it to help the booksellers and the shop-keepers?

After all, the inquiry is unimportant. The fact that the immense periodical literature is saturated through and through with Christmas spirit is a pleasant omen.

We read in Captain Townshend's "A Military Consul in Turkey"—a very interesting volume—that, at Mersina, there is a branch of the "Reformed Presbyterians of Philadelphia." Among other Christian ideas which the mission teaches, according to the Captain, is this: "that it is wrong to observe Christmas Day, which is a pagan festival." It is a bit of curious information to know that there still exists a grim survival of Puritanism in some of our large cities. Instead of sending its dying message to unregenerate Turks, why does it not deliver it at home? Judging from the magazines, which always cater to the public's desire, the American people have forgotten, in the course of the last hundred years, that "it is wrong to observe Christmas Day, which is a pagan festival." Happy oblivion!

But danger menaces Christmas now from an entirely different quarter. The excellent and charming Paris correspondent of the New York Evening Post, who signs himself "S. D.," tells us that the old French Christmas is rapidly disappearing. "Here in France," he writes, "with the decay of public religion, little is left but the children's persistent cry to keep the old Christmas alive." And he adds, with sinister significance: "The new Christmas, where it exists, is not for children." The whole fascinating letter, which was printed in the Post of December 11, is replete with interest; but its saddest note is struck in the admission that "among the educated younger generation, many have only the vaguest idea of what Christmas meant in the religion of their fathers. And this is the negative character of the new Christmas—it is not religious, even by song."

We have at least the consolation of feeling assured that, whilst we have escaped the white-washed dungeon of Puritanism, we have not yet entered into the soulless ice-fields of religious negation. Our doctrinaires in the universities and our "progressive" thinkers in the pulpit may speak and write patronizingly of Christianity and minimize until there is nothing left of it, but the rank and file, the solid bulk of the nation makes allowance winkingly for the love of big words, the ambition for academic distinction; suffers good-humoredly the weaknesses of Dry-as-dust in the closet and bumptious youth in the press, and goes on its way—soldier and politician and statesman, and business man and weary toiler—with a good, old-fashioned belief in Christianity of one kind or another and a strong loyalty to the great central religious festivity of the Christian era.

How else can we explain the expensive and elaborate Christmas numbers of the secular magazines? With few exceptions they have something which appeals not merely to the social side of Christmas but to its religious feeling as well. Thus in Collier's we have on its first page the story of Christ's birth from the Gospel of St. Luke. The cover design of the Century is a picture of the Three Kings. The Christmas Harper's Magazine, it is true, has not much, outside of the white and gold of its cover, to remind one of the season; its best bit of Christmas literature appeared prematurely in the November number and was entitled "The Little Romance," by Norman Duncan. Scribner's also has a cover design of the Three Kings and is perhaps the most lavish in Christmas fare. The American and McClure's call off their dogs of war in their battle with political abuses to tell a Christmas story and sing a Christmas carol. The American sings a very sweet one in its opening verses.

It is true, there may not be much of the inner religious meaning of the festival in all this. But there is enough to show that editors and publishers recognize the existence of a wide religious belief in the mystery of the Incarnation, which they make an effort to satisfy. Their attempt is not always very successful, but the fact that they make it at all is not without a cheering significance in an age of religious pessimism.

It is a matter for surprise that the Catholic magazines have not been at pains this year to give a more distinctive coloring to their Christmas numbers. Benziger's we exonerate from this charge, and, let us also add, the Catholic World, which barely escapes our censure, with a delightful article on "The Nativity in Early Pageants," two Christmas poems and one Christmas story. But the Ecclesiastical Review, otherwise most approvable, devotes only one of its articles to the season, "Christmastide," by the late Dom Feasey, O.S.B. What hurts us most is that the dear little Irish Monthly has one, single, solitary poem on "Bethlehem," and nothing else to remind us of the coming Feast. The other good things do not console us at all, and we level a glance of sad reproof at Father Russell.

Mentioning the death of the gifted Father Tabb some weeks ago we quoted from the Atlantic Monthly his poem on his blindness. An error we are ashamed to qualify, found its way into the quotation. We printed:

Back to the primal glories
Where life began,"

and have felt mortified ever since. Our readers, with few exceptions forebore to take us to task, a condescension we hardly dared to hope, still we owe reparation to the departed poet, and fortune treats us better than we deserve by making an occasion to go back to the matter. A transatlantic contemporary justly famous for culture and literary skill, with the idea, no doubt, of comforting the sorrowful, copied our quotation and its blunder without remark, and, what seems the height of delicate compassion, without mentioning our name. To say that we are profoundly grateful would not begin to express all we feel.

We take occasion from all this to print the poem correctly:

Back to the primal gloom
Where life began,
As to my mother's womb,
Must I a man

Return:
Not to be born again
But to remain;
And in the School of Darkness learn
What mean
"The things unseen."

FOR HIDDEN SWEETS.

We thank thee, graceless Bethlehem,
That thou didst find no room for them,
Since thy so ruthless spurning
Reveals, to our discerning,
The pleading love which bore the bitter part
Of every disappointed human heart.

We thank thee, stable, dank and drear,
That thou didst have no hearth-stone cheer,
For, by sweet Mary's grieving,
Are we the more believing
That they who lack life's solace, nor complain,
Shall know possession and eternal gain.

We thank the beasts of gentle eyes
For that deep trust which in them lies,
Because such mute divining
Rebukes the false repining
Which, as the offering may not royal be,
Declines to offer simple loyalty.

We thank the shepherds, roughly clad,
Who hasten, wondering and glad,
Nor pause for their unfitness,
But bear their humble witness
Of answering love, that hears the heavenly call,

And, having naught to give, yet gives it all.

SOCIOLOGY

On Sunday, December 5, delegations from the various Catholic societies of the Diocese of Barcelona waited on Bishop Juan J. Laguarda to congratulate him on his appointment, and to assure him of their loyalty and respect. Every Catholic organization, from the humblest to the most distinguished sent its representatives. As only a small fraction of the delegates could be crowded into the episcopal residence, Bishop Laguarda descended to the courtyard, where the Marquis de Pascual delivered an address of welcome. After a hearty expression of gratitude for their good wishes and protestations of fidelity, the bishop gave free rein to his eloquence and, laying before his enthusiastic auditors his plan of campaign, called on them to give it generous support.

"With an air of expectancy, you seem to ask, 'What are we to do?' As a father addressing his children, I will tell you in language that is plain, frank, and sincere. The Committee on Social Defense has worked successfully but all has not been done; it may be that too much attention has been given to small matters, to the neglect of the great social problem which confronts us and demands solution. We have believed that we ought to seek out the humbler classes and draw them about us; we have founded our centres of action, but we have failed to shape them according to the needs of the times. What have we done for the laborer? Have we done anything worth while? Literary and musical entertainments, and conferences, perhaps musical too. In a word, we have given a little music to workingmen who knew the importance of the social problem, who were clamoring for justice, who withdrew from us little by little because they did not find what they sought, and went to swell the ranks of armed resistance to law and order. In my audience with the Holy Father before coming to take charge of this diocese, he exhorted me to employ a great deal of charity. Charity, love for our fellow-man, is a beautiful word most rich in practical applications. What, then, are we to do? We are not going to do wonders, new and unheard of things, but let our first thought be how to raise every parish to the level of society as it is to-day. The parish is of the utmost importance; it must be able to meet the demands of the epoch of life in which we find ourselves. Let the pastors be centres of light. Let us love the light and prove that where the centre of light is there is the centre of piety and of Christian education. The parish must be, moreover, the centre of ample and generous protection for the poor. Parochial beneficence has to be so organized that no form of spiritual or corporal wretchedness may go unrelieved. The parish, finally, should be the centre of those social works for the betterment of the material condition of the poor,—works encouraged and blessed by Holy Church.

"The spirit of individualism has given away to the spirit of association; society will soon be simply a collection of associations. The work that I purpose to undertake is to organize and systematize parish work, along the lines that I have laid down, and devote myself body and soul to raising the laboring man and securing for him all that is his by justice or heavenly charity. I shall organize for Catholic action in Barcelona. On my banner there are three words. The first is Union. Whatever be your politics, rally to the support of your faith; there is a place in the ranks for every Catholic. The second word is Work. The important thing, the right thing, is not speculation nor ideas, but action, work, for the individual and the common good. I claim in particular the cooperation of those whose social position, leisure and means facilitate the aid that they can give to the cause.

"What will be the result of this organized Catholic action carried on with energy? That I cannot say. Hence, my banner has the motto 'Depend on God,' whose Providence rules the destinies of nations. Let us labor not so much to obtain worldly success as to satisfy our consciences and fulfil our bounden duty. Even when revolutionists or institutions embodying their principles persecute us, and trample on us and try to bring our work to nought, let us not lose heart. We may be overcome by force, but the brightness of our principles will not thereby be obscured or tarnished. Catholic social action is the watchword; Catholic societies are the life and strength of the diocese. What I ask is liberty to do good, and I ask your organized help in the same great undertaking."

In response to the call of Dr. Hofmannstahl, one of the most enthusiastic workers in Austria for the suppression of duelling, a convention of anti-duellists assembled last month in Würzburg, Bavaria. One hundred and sixty-one delegates attended from various German student bodies. It was resolved to call a general convention for March, 1910, with the object of forming a National German Anti-duelling Society, thus uniting the forces of the several private or local associations having the same laudable aim.

ECONOMICS.

An interesting appeal from Australia has been decided in England. A ferry collects its fares at one end only of its route. Those going one way pay the fare, a penny, on entering the wharf; those going the other way pay in the same place, on leaving it, and a placard notifies the public that none may enter or leave the wharf without paying a penny. A person who had paid his penny and gone on board the ferry-boat, finding that it was not to start for some time, changed his mind about going and attempted to leave the wharf. He was asked at the gate for the penny for leaving. He refused to give it on the ground that he had paid to cross the ferry, and having changed his mind, had a right to leave the place. The officials attempted to prevent him, but he fought his way out and brought suit for damages. He won his suit in the lower court. The ferry company appealed to the supreme court which let the decision stand. They carried the matter to the Australian Court of Appeal, which reversed the decision of the lower court. The aggrieved person then appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which confirmed the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

The import of rubber into the United States in 1889 was 32 million pounds worth, at 39 cents a pound, 12½ million dollars; in 1899 it was 55 million pounds worth, at 60 cents a pound, 33 million dollars; for 10 months of 1909 ended Oct. 31, it was 73 million pounds worth, at 85 cents a pound, 62 million dollars. Thus in twenty years the import has more than doubled both in weight and in price per pound. Brazilian rubber imported during the ten months amounted to 34 million pounds; Mexican, to 15 million pounds; but the former is worth 90 cents a pound, while the latter is worth not quite 37 cents. From England came 9 million pounds, worth a little more than $1.16 a pound. This was African and East Indian rubber. The difference in values is due to the difference in origin of the rubber; not all that goes by that name to-day comes from the India-rubber tree.

A new metal has been compounded in Germany, to be known as Electron. It is described as an alloy of magnesium which can be cast, drawn, pressed and rolled. It is lighter than the lightest metal hitherto known, having a specific gravity of from 1.75 to 2. In color it is silver-white and lends itself to a brilliant polish.

SCIENCE

The idea is common that the marine turbine engine is as near perfection as any machine can be. Mr. George Westinghouse shows that such is not the case. The reason is that the turbine is essentially a quick-turning machine, while the propeller is a slow-turning one. That is to say, the maximum of efficiency calls for a different rate of revolution in each. The consequence is that in such ships as the Mauretania concessions have to be made on both sides. Mr. Westinghouse judges that only 55 per cent. of the Mauretania's 70,000 horsepower becomes effective at the small and rapidly revolving propellers. Could the speed of these be reduced their diameters could be increased to give the maximum propeller efficiency in terms of diameter, pitch and revolution per minute. He asserts that in conjunction with Rear-Admiral Melville and Mr. John H. McAlpine he has invented a reduction gear to pass from the quick revolution of the turbine to a slower speed of the shaft, that will, in the first place, increase the efficiency of the propellers to 65 per cent., and by allowing a more rapid revolution of the turbine either decrease the coal consumption by one-fifth or increase the power of the engine correspondingly and consequently the speed of the ship.

An important invention, which will add greatly to the dangers of naval warfare, has just been successfully tested by a Stockholm engineer named Angrell. It consists of a movable submarine mine which can be controlled from the shore or from shipboard up to a distance of six miles. The mechanism is controlled by an electric button, and small electric lights attached show by their color the depth the mine has attained. It sinks at the rate of three feet a minute, and rises at a mean rate of ten feet per minute. Its propeller is actuated by a one-sixth horse power motor, which obtains its power from an accumulator on the shore or on ship board. Each mine costs in the neighborhood of $300.

Dr. V. A. Moore, director of the New York Veterinary College, reports that rabies is rapidly spreading in the United States. For the year ending October 1, 1909, 588 specimens were received in his laboratory, of which 295 gave positive evidence of inoculation. These figures are in excess of the totals for the preceding ten years. The losses from the disease in animals are estimated at a very large sum.

EDUCATION

In preparation for the next annual meeting of the administrators of the twelve eastern colleges of the Jesuit Order, a committee on athletics, composed of President Joseph R. Himmel, S.J., of Georgetown University, President Daniel J. Quinn, S.J., of Fordham University and President Thomas E. Murphy, S.J., of Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., held two conferences recently for the discussion of the football problem and college athletics in general. Although the meeting was private and no definite line of action for immediate introduction was either planned or formulated, yet, in order to prevent speculation and possible misapprehension, and to give assurance of intense interest in the question, combined with confidence in the intercollegiate committee entrusted with reforms in playing rules and the hope that such reforms may be effectual, the following statement of the result of the conference was made public:

(1) It was agreed that, while it did not seem opportune to announce, as a policy for all these colleges, that the game of football would now be abolished, yet the objections to the game so greatly outweigh the advantages, that unless necessary and hoped-for reforms are soon instituted, these colleges would feel obliged to discontinue the game.

(2) All agreed that, while public agitation had drawn general attention to the great risk of bodily injury in football, yet sufficient emphasis had not been placed on other evils common to football and other college sports. It was felt that reform of evils tending to injure character and moral growth deserved equal if not greater consideration than the reform of plays leading to bodily injury.

(3) To bring college athletics back to their proper place as a college pastime or a physical exercise, it was considered most desirable that college faculties retain or regain entire control of all college sports.

(4) Some of the evils specified as most urgently needing reform were: Questionable practices in the administration of college athletics; for instance, in methods used for procuring players or for circumventing eligibility regulations, and in apparently conniving at various forms of circumvention; dishonorable practices of players in various college sports, excessive interference with study and, in this connection, exaggerated prominence of the athletic hero, inordinate importance of coaches and trainers and extravagant growth of the training department.

As the correction of such evils as these will prevent injury to the student's character and the lowering of educational ideals, it was considered deserving of even greater emphasis than the needed reform of playing rules for reducing the risk of bodily injury. The hope was also expressed that as strong a public sentiment might be aroused in favor of the one as has already been started in favor of the other.

Many justify the sending of Catholics to Protestant schools and universities on the ground that old prejudices are dead and therefore the danger to faith has passed. Granting that the old are dead, we know, nevertheless, that new prejudices have taken their place more dangerous to faith than they. Catholics would be offended but perhaps not troubled in their faith, if they heard teachers proclaiming Elizabeth, the good Virgin Queen, and Mary, a bloody-minded persecutor of the just, or saying that we are idolaters, adoring images and putting Mary in the place of Christ, etc. Methods have changed but not improved. Evolutionism permeates every branch of teaching. In everything is found the forward movement, in things physical, moral, social and supernatural. When this notion has been hammered into a child's mind, there is tremendous danger to its faith in such suggestions as these:

"Try to draw some comparisons between the fate of the monks, and

(a) The downfall of the Romans.

(b) Nature's removal of organs which have become useless, e. g., the vermiform appendix in man, thorns in cultivated plum-trees, eyes in subterranean fish, and, to some extent, in the mole, etc.

Brooklyn College, now in its third year of existence, has an enrolment of 440 students. The new Hall will be ready for use at the reopening after the Christmas holidays, when the enrolment is expected to reach 500. Among the recent endowments are the Frost-O'Grady and Clarry-Callaghan scholarships of $2,000 each, and an eight years' scholarship by the Knights of Columbus.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

On the initiative of Mr. P. H. Rice, State Deputy of Georgia, the Knights of Columbus of that state have undertaken to maintain one missionary priest who shall visit the outlying and unprovided districts of the Savannah diocese. Rt. Rev. Bishop Keiley has approved the plan, and to prepare for its proper execution, is now going over the diocese, giving missions of two or three days, until every town and hamlet shall be reached. Augusta, Mr. Rice's home council, has guaranteed more than half the required amount annually to the missionary fund, and the zealous State Deputy has further arranged that the members of each council shall send what Catholic books, newspapers and magazines they can spare to the Secretary, who shall forward them to the Chancellor of the diocese for transmission to Catholics in isolated districts.

The church erected in England as a memorial to Cardinal Newman, was opened on December 8 in the presence of a distinguished gathering of prelates, priests and laymen. The site selected is the Oratory of St. Philip, Edgbaston, Birmingham, the scene of many fruitful years of work of the distinguished Cardinal after his reception into the Church. The edifice is 184 feet in length, and 70 feet 6 inches in width. The nave is 88 feet long and 34 feet wide, with an extreme height of 40 feet 2 inches. The work in the interior is not yet complete. The altar of Our Lady will be placed in the north transept, and an anonymous donation of $10,000 recently received will be used to enrich the apse and sanctuary with marble and to decorate the sides of the church.

The Society of St. Vincent de Paul of New York has just issued its report. During the year 50,009 visits were made to the poor in their own homes. 9,603 families, representing 35,424 persons were assisted. In this work $88,499 in cash and large quantities of food, fuel and clothing were distributed. Moreover, the Particular Council disbursed for special works $39,515.20. These works are St. Elizabeth's Home for Convalescent Women at Spring Valley, where 525 were received for two weeks each during the year. $10 will pay for one such case; The Catholic Home Bureau, which found homes for 335 orphan children and made 3,105 visits to children placed in previous years; The Boys' Clubs of which three are maintained, at 446 West 56th Street, 312 West 16th Street and 60 Macdougall Street. The Society has no bank account; every dollar contributed goes to charity, and it makes a most earnest appeal for these special works. Checks may be sent to Mr. John J. Barry, Treasurer Finance Committee, 375 Lafayette Street, New York City.

According to the Philippine Catholic, six priests and four brothers, missionaries of the Sacred Heart from Tilburg, Holland, and six priests from the Mill Hill Congregation, England, of whom four are also natives of Holland, have arrived at Manila to take up the work of attending to the scattered congregations of the Filipinos. Nearly all speak several languages, and those from Tilburg had with them various outfits of tools and implements for building and agricultural purposes, with which they intend to start schools and classes for the instruction of the natives.

The Confraternity of Christian Doctrine of the archdiocese of New York will hold its annual convention on Dec. 28 and 29. In addition to the reports from the different confraternities there will be short addresses by priests and laymen. All the Catholic schools in the archdiocese and all the Sunday Schools have been united to present samples of the written work in Christian Doctrine done by the children in these schools. The exhibit will be open to the public.

By the will of Eleanora A. Beaty, the Church of St. Ignatius Loyola in this city receives $10,000, which is to be used in the decoration of the church. The House of the Good Shepherd receives $500 and the residue of a trust fund, the amount of which is not stated, is divided among several relatives, St. Joseph's Hospital for Consumptives and the Sisters of Charity in charge of St. Lawrence's Academy.

Bishop Beaven, of Springfield, Mass., has been invited to offer the opening prayer at the session of the Massachusetts senate next January. It will be the first time in which a Catholic prelate has officiated in such a capacity in the old Puritan stronghold.

Ten thousand pilgrims from the State of Hidalgo, the largest number ever assembled there at one time, visited the Shrine of Our Lady of Guadalupe, Mexico, on December 12.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Felipe Lumain, one of the Filipino students sent to this country by the late Rt. Rev. Thomas A. Hendrick, Bishop of Cebú, sent to the Rochester Union the following modest and affectionate tribute on the occasion of the death of his benefactor:

"A sense of gratitude urges me to express the great loss that has befallen the Filipino people in the death of our beloved Bishop Hendrick. From the fact that he was greatly respected and beloved by his diocesans, his death has brought deep sorrow to all. We feel that we have been bereaved of a father, for such indeed he was to us. Too much credit can hardly be given him for the greatly improved condition of the diocese of Cebú. Bishop Hendrick was a restorer and guardian of peace among the Filipinos, and worked earnestly for the best interests, both spiritual and temporal, of his people. He established many schools where children, rich and poor, might have the opportunity of acquiring elementary training. To give a further idea of the remarkable change that he wrought in the islands of his diocese, I recall the fact that when the Revolution of 1898 broke out against Spain the Spanish priests were compelled to leave the islands. The Filipino priests were very scarce and could not supply the vacancies made by the withdrawal of the Spanish clergy. Consequently thousands of people were left without spiritual ministrations. In face of this great scarcity of priests, Bishop Hendrick, prompted by apostolic zeal, afforded to the young Filipinos who aspired to the priesthood every facility to prepare themselves for continuing the missionary work so fruitfully carried on in the past by the priests of Spain.

"Bishop Hendrick had a large number of ecclesiastical students in his diocesan seminary. Four of these he sent to this country. One was ordained two years ago and was made his private secretary; another is at the seminary of Belmont, N. C., and the other two are at St. Bernard's Seminary, this city, of whom the writer is one. The other two American Bishops in the Filipinas have also sent students to St. Bernard's Seminary.

"The memory of this good and self-sacrificing Bishop will long remain among the Filipinos, and will be deeply cherished by them, especially by us, the students whom he has guided with such fatherly care in our studies."

In a symposium, "Christmas Memories Told by Grand Opera Stars," the New York Tribune gives this Christmas reminiscence by Madame Gadski, of how, through force of circumstances, she and her German maid were obliged to spend the happiest day of the year away from home and friends, in a big Western town. It was a cheerless dinner they sat down to in their rooms, and when the meal was over the prospect of the long afternoon was disheartening.

"When I could stand it no longer," she says, "I felt there might be some relief out of doors. Lottchen and I bundled up and started for a walk. The streets were deserted. Everyone was enjoying themselves indoors with relatives and friends. That consciousness of walking alone and unhappy down a deserted street, knowing that behind the walls of every house happiness reigns supreme, is absolutely overwhelming.

"After some time we came to a great building within an enclosure. It looked to me like a convent. And then I had an inspiration—why not go in and sing for the nuns? We entered the gate and asked at the door for the mother superior. A sweet-faced woman came to greet us, and from her I learned that the community was the cloistered Order of the Visitation Nuns. Its members were shut away from the world, and only the faintest echoes of what we call its joys and glories penetrate their simple, holy lives. I told the mother just how my day had been spent and asked her if it would please the nuns if I sang to them. She was graciously pleased, and brought a young sister to me to talk over what accompaniments she could play, while the mother summoned the community to the assembly hall.

"I began with Gounod's 'Ave Maria,' and it was so beautiful to finish amid perfect silence and yet feel that silent message of mental satisfaction that came to me from those black-robed listeners! I sang on and on, with more happiness in my own singing than I had ever felt before the most enthusiastic worldly audience.

"And then, when twilight came and it was time to end, the mother had one of the nuns sing for me, a girl as beautiful in features as one of Raphael's Madonnas and with as sweet and pure a voice as I have ever heard. What could she not do with such a voice in the world? I thought. And then it came to me that she, behind these convent walls, was far happier and more content than I with my entry to all the opera houses of the world.

"And the great secret of her happiness was that she had devoted her entire life to giving happiness to others. I caught just a little of the sweetness of that joy in the pleasure I had found in singing to the Sisters that Christmas afternoon."

Never in the history of the Vatican, it is declared from Rome, have official secrets been so well kept as at present. This is taken as an evidence of the splendid administrative ability of Pius X.

PERSONAL

An appeal for subscriptions to the Father Lafont Memorial Fund is being circulated in Great Britain and India. The appeal, which is signed by a number of prominent personages, states that "it has been proposed by many friends and former pupils of the late Father Lafont that a memorial should be made to cherish his name and his long, honorable connection with the St. Xavier's College. The late Father Lafont was connected with the St. Xavier's College from the time that he landed in India, in December, 1865, for forty-three years, and he secured for the institution the high reputation as an educational establishment which it at present holds. It has been suggested that a fund should be raised to commemorate his name, either in the form of scholarships to be held at the college or in some other suitable way." The fund is under the patronage of the Lieutenant-Governors of Bengal, the United Provinces, and Eastern Bengal and Assam.

A number of representative physicians met on Wednesday evening at Cathedral College, this city, and organized a Guild of St. Luke, to be in affiliation with similar societies in France, England and other countries. The object of these societies is the study of the ethical and moral principles involved in the practice of medicine, and of the history and development of medical science. Dr. Charles E. Nammack was elected President of the new organization; Drs. Thomas Addis Emmet and José M. Ferrer, Vice Presidents; and Drs. James J. Walsh and Thomas F. Reilly, Secretaries. Dr. Walsh read a very interesting paper on "St. Luke as a physician." The next meeting of the Guild will be held on the evening of Ash Wednesday.

Ho Wing Lee, a Chinese youth of exceptional ability and a nephew of the former Chinese Minister, Wu Ting Fang, was received into the Church at St. Paul's, Washington, D. C., on December 3, taking the name of Francis Xavier. The new convert was born in Hong Kong, where his father is a distinguished and wealthy merchant, in 1894, and he has been in this country studying for the past two years. He is now going back to his native city and next year expects to go to Oxford, in which university his father was also a student.

George Crocker, of California, who died lately in his New York house, of cancer, has left real and personal property to found a Cancer Research Fund. The property is to be sold, and it is expected to bring $1,500,000.

DRAMATIC NOTES
